"Resolved, That the compensation of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be $120 per annum; and that he be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a superintendent of the folding room, at a compensation of $1,200 per annum; and that he may employ, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts of the House of Representatives, such number of folders and laborers as may be deemed necessary to perform the work; and that he may employ, under the direction of the aforesaid committee, two boys, during the session of Congress; and that he may receive a suitable allowance for expenses in sending messages and dispatches by messengers and pages. And it is further resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be paid, for each year, not to exceed fourteen messengers, at a compensation of $2 per day each per annum; and not to exceed eleven night messengers, at a compensation of $3 each per day during the session of Congress; and not exceeding four laborers, at a compensation of $1 50 each per day during the year; and not exceeding twelve pages, between the ages of sixteen and twenty years, at a compensation of $3 per day each during the session of Congress."

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the object of this House in passing these resolutions? It was that we might know the number of these employes, and that the law might be made in accordance with the resolutions, and those men who accepted office under it knew the compensation to which they were entitled.

Mr. SPINNER. They knew they were entitled to the rate of compensation provided by the law, to the rate of compensation. The law entitled to the compensation fixed by the resolution, and they have received every dollar of it. Many of them have already left the city of Washington, and yet, by this resolution, the gentleman from New York proposes not only to increase the number of those who may be employed by the present session, but to go back and give to men who were employed at a rate of pay which they have received and which they were satisfied with, additional compensation. I believe he calls it extra compensation. I believe he calls it an increase of pay. These men are entitled by law to the compensation provided for in the joint resolution of 1854. If that be so, I appeal to every gentleman of candor to know why it is that this resolution is to be passed to give them the rights they are already entitled to, and that the law now, sir, I have been endeavoring, with others, ever since I have been here, to cut down the number of employes around this Capitol; and I submit to the House that, when we have, by our order, limited that number, the Doorkeeper has no right to go beyond that order; and if these persons hold office by appointments which he was not authorized to make, it is their misfortune, and not our fault.

I can only regret it, when they appeal to us to pass resolutions for the relief of these little boys who sit on the floor of the House, that we should be willing to go as far as he who goes the furthest towards relieving the wants of the boys who have rendered service here; but, sir, when they undertake to put a bill through for paying a boy, in that appealing to our sympathy, I do not want to include all the employes under the Doorkeeper, and enable the present Doorkeeper to increase the salaries of those whom he may appoint and the number of the pages upon this floor. For one, I will not vote for it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is a question which ought to occupy so much time. There are two resolutions; and I presume that the question can be stated separately on each, that the latter one is not to drag through the former one, unless it has merit. Let any gentleman who dislikes one resolution call for a division.

The first resolution, sir, does what? Repeals a resolution of this body, which showed its ignorance of law. There is a law, sir, which no resolution of any House can repeal, and which it is useless to attempt to repeal upon the House, and the House that they should ever have attempted to repeal it. That law fixes the compensation for the employes of this body, as well as of those of the other body; and by what authority does the House undertake, by its own single resolution, to repeal a law of the land, not respecting the joint action of the Legislature and of the Executive, and putting men out of what the law gives them? Why, sir, no lawyer would advocate such a doctrine as that. That first resolution is not in order to enable these gentlemen to get their compensation; but it is necessary to vindicate our own intelligence, and to let the country see that we do not attempt to direct the Committee of Accounts to go contrary to the law, and thereby to deprive men of this which is honestly their due. You would say well, pass a resolution to let those men who contracted to build the dome for this Capitol should not be paid more than one half of, that they contracted for; and, if hereafter the contracting parties were to go on under the old law and make contracts, say that that was valid. You would say, if it is not so, it is therefore a repeal of the law upon us, in my judgment, to say that those who have acted by authority of this House, and by authority of law, shall not receive the compensation which that law gives them, and that we should put ourselves in some branch of this legislation to cut them out of that which is their due.

It is due to us, then, sir, to repeal a nullity for the purpose of wiping it out, and preventing it embarrassing the committee. I know that the Committee of Accounts ought to pass them under the law, not under this resolution, and I have no doubt the administrative department would say it according to that law; but do not let us embarrass it.

That is the first resolution. Let us take a vote upon that. If gentlemen are afraid that the boys will drag that through, let them take a separate vote upon it, and let us see who will stand by a repeal of the law, and let us see who will not.

The second resolution, sir, is in reference to these boys. I do not make any appeal in favor of boys because they are boys. You have agents, you have adult agents employed by this Government, and they go on and employ minors; the sons of widows, the sons of poor people, to do work. These minors know not what the law is; they are not bound to know what the law is. We accept their services, permit them to remain here with our eyes upon them, looking upon them every day, and yet when they are employed by one of our agents, and we accept their services, and they come to ask for their pay they are told, "no; you should not have worked, for there was no authority for you to do so." Why, sir, if I saw a man building a house upon my land, and he tells me that he has built it, and he has done nothing, and he goes on and finishes it, cannot I be compelled under the law, as a quantum meruit, to pay for it? I ought to have objected to it if I did not want it. By consenting, in looking on and seeing my agent employ these boys, I think, sir, do not mean any reflection upon any gentleman—that I could never agree to vote against paying lady who have been here spending their time; perhaps dressing themselves to appear decently, when their mothers at home were hardly able to supply them with the necessaries of life, when they come to, to turn them out, and say there was no authority for it. Not having troubled the House much, and at the request of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, I call for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw it, to allow me to say a word or two.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I hope that it will not be withdrawn, for I think that we already have heard enough of this question.

Mr. BURNETT. I raised the question of order I raised? I raised it at the beginning of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides against the point of order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, in order to let the gentleman from Virginia make his remarks, provided he will renew the call when he has concluded what he has to say.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from North Carolina further, in reference to this point of order, that, as the question has been entertained and discussed, it is now too late to insist upon that point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the House very briefly, what, perhaps, is known to many of the members, if not to all, that we have been trying, during several past Congresses, to control and limit the number of employes of this House. We have passed a joint resolution; we have had reform bills, and passed up to that date. We have passed subsequent resolutions, all of which were designed to restrain the discretion which the officers of this House have undertaken to exercise upon former occasions, and to confine them to the specific compensation allowed by law, or to the compensation of the usual extra allowances made at the close of each Congress; which extra allowances were generally made under the exhalation of an adjournment, when everybody was in a good humor, and disposed to be liberal to those who had been in attendance upon the House. That was the object of much of the action of the three Congresses that I have been here; and, sir, I ask whether that object is not worthy of our adoption? I ask this House to decide whether the policy I have pursued is not one of manifest prudence. Without undertaking to expand upon that subjeet, and having merely stated the general purpose which has been entertained, growing out of the necessity of reforming past abuses, I now address this Congress, and bring their attention to this same consideration. I will read now this first of these resolutions:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed May 17, 1858, as relates to the compensation of the Doorkeeper of this House and his employees, is hereby rescinded and declared inoperative from the date of its passage, in far as the same conflicts with the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, passed July 1, 1854.

Now, the resolution of May 17, 1858, is valid, or it is not. If it is valid, we cannot set it aside without having good reason for it. If it is invalid, if we cannot set upon the joint resolution of 1854, why this effort at this time?

Mr. SPINNER. I will answer the question. I have already stated that the committee considered the resolution directory upon the committee; and not choosing to disregard the order of the House, though illegal, they desire that it should be repealed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then the committee are more obedient to law than the servants we employ.

But I have come back to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STAYES], that he says the resolution is a nullity. If so, then I ask why these employes have not received the compensation provided by the joint resolution of 1854. Every lawyer knows, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows well, that it is perfectly idle to pass this resolution if it does not obstruct the action of the joint resolution of 1854. Why pass it? There must be some reason for it. We do not do a vain and idle thing. Why, I say, pass it? That is the question. The gentleman [Mr. STAYES] has the reputation of being one of the best lawyers in Pennsylvania—and I do not say it in a mere complimentary sense—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will simply say that the committee of the House feel compelled by the resolution of May 1858 to consider entering it directory, but not binding; and they desire to be left free to act under the existing laws.

Mr. BLAKE. I am one of the Committee of Accounts, and I desire to explain one point. The two individuals who are named in the resolution are entitled to the pay they ask. This resolution only relieves the committee from the embarrassment they feel from the directory resolution of May, 1858. Now the joint resolution of 1854 could be repealed by a simple majority of this House. The persons now asking pay entered upon their employment during the last Congress under the joint resolution of Congress, and they are now before the committee asking pay under that joint resolution. The committee are of opinion that they are entitled to that pay; but inasmuch as this House passed a resolution which the committee regards as directory to them, they ask that it shall be removed in order that they may be relieved from that embarrassment.

The resolution does not apply to the present employes at all. This is another Congress; and I apprehend no lawyer will maintain for a moment, that a resolution of the last Congress can bind this House or its employes against law and justice. The joint resolution of both Houses by them and signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The joint resolution would undoubtedly control the compensation due to the employees of this House in the absence of any action of this House. If we said nothing upon the subject, the joint resolution would be the measure of compensation. I repeat, and I desire to have it remembered, that, in the absence of any action of this House, the joint resolution would be the measure of compensation to which our servants would be entitled. But, sir, I say here, in the face of this House and the country, that when this House chooses to employ persons at a specified price, and persons come into our employ under that agreement, both parties having conferred—both parties are bound by the plainest principles of common sense, common law, and equity. A joint resolution is passed fixing the compensation of the employees of this House before the House employs anybody, except to them, that, in the absence of our action, they shall be entitled to such and such compensation. But we say to them, when we employ them, that the compensation thus fixed being too high, we will not employ them unless they agree to serve us at a specified compensation less than that set in the joint resolution. Are they not bound by that agreement? We elect a Doorkeeper. The law, as it stands, in the absence of any specification upon our part, fixes his compensation; but we set on our hands, we will not pay this high price, but we will pay him a certain sum, and no more. Can it, upon any received legal principle known to man, be said that the agreement is not a compact which can be enforced? I ask the question: what law will say that if two persons make a contract to do work for a specific sum, that the agreement is not to be enforced as between them?

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York whether the resolution of the House, which interferes with the joint resolution, was passed before the employees of the last session were employed? Or was it passed during their service? If it was passed before they were employed, then the question arises whether a resolution of this House can override the joint resolution of the two Houses. I say it cannot. I want to know these facts before I am called upon to vote against it. I believe in the joint resolution, I believe it is binding upon this House, and the employees are entitled to the pay they claim.

Mr. SPINNER. The resolution of this House was not passed until nearly six months after these persons came into the employ of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is some adroitness, to be sure, in the discrimination drawn by the gentleman from Alabama, but the utmost extent to which he has expected me to go in this period anterior to the passage of the resolution of May, 1858. Bear in mind, that when we elect a Doorkeeper, or any other officer of this House, we elect him at the pleasure of the House. We can dismiss him at any moment. If we declare that we will continue the rate of compensation we have before paid, that we will pay a certain specified sum and no more, and that officer continues in our service, he is bound by that determination as completely as though the entire resolution had been passed before he commenced his service at all.

Mr. COX. I desire to know if the gentleman considers the joint resolution as having any effect upon this House?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have stated that the joint resolution governs the case in the absence of any other action by the House.

Mr. COX. Is the joint resolution still in force?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I say it is, so far as the employ of this House are concerned, unless it is interfered with by a resolution of this House.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will remember that, at the last session of Congress, the Committee on Accounts brought in a large resolution, to the whole matter, and, by the joint action of the two Houses and the signature of the President, to reform this matter, and to repeal the joint resolution. That bill never passed. That was the proposition. I readily concede that I ask the gentleman from Virginia whether that was not the only way in which we could get rid of the effect of that joint resolution?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. One of the faults that exist in the dispatch of business here is the large number of members who are absent. I said that the joint resolution of 1854 fixed the rate of compensation of the servants of the two Houses, when there was no action by either House upon the subject. It furnished the basis here for the adoption of this resolution, and I recognize it as in force, in the absence of any specific action on the part of either House.

Mr. COX. Do I understand my friend to admit that the joint resolution is now in effect; and that, then I ask him, which is the superior, the joint resolution or the resolution of this House?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Ohio give me his attention for one moment?

Mr. COX. Well, I want you to answer me that question, and to satisfy me on that point.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will answer it.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I said, and I say again, that in the absence of any action by either House upon the subject of compensation, the joint resolution is in force. That joint resolution is in force now, and is paramount, of course, as a measure of joint action. But I say this, and I repeat it, that when either House undertakes to act upon the subject, and says to a man, when it employs him, I will employ you, but we will give you no more, and I will not accept of it, that man agrees to take the remuneration specified, I say it is a contract reciprocal in character, and mutually binding on both. That is what I say.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to suggest one thing to the gentleman from Virginia. It is that three officers were appointed upon the joint resolution, with the understanding that they were to get pay as fixed in that joint resolution; and it was after they were appointed that the House passed that resolution.

Mr. RUFFIN. And they accepted the pay as fixed in that resolution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I merely want to know whether the gentleman contends that, after the Doorkeeper for the last Congress was elected, and elected for the whole Congress, he could be considered as having been employed by that resolution of the House?

Mr. COX. I want to ask my distinguished friend from Virginia one question more—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let me answer one at a time if you please. [Laughter.] I want the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and of the gentleman from Ohio, and I will answer both. Now, I repeat this question. You know that the law in many of the States—in Virginia, in Ohio, in New York, and elsewhere—fixes the rate of compensation for the use of money. Well, gentlemen listen—I do not wish to be asked another question. [Laughter.] I say, the law in Ohio, as it does also in Virginia, fixes the rate of interest at six per cent.; in New York, I believe, is fixed at the rate of seven per cent. Now, while that is the law, cannot I ask, in an agreement between themselves, agree to take five per cent.? Now, I put that question. I ask, would not such contract be valid?

Mr. COX. I will not say whether or not whatever between such a case and this. I think I will convince my distinguished friend that he is mistaken. He says that the House, by its separate action, can repeal the joint resolution. He must, also, by the same action, repeal the law of the State, by its separate action, could also repeal this joint resolution. Now, if so, what is left to President Buchanan to do, in carrying this legislation into effect?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Ohio bear in mind that I concede the joint resolution of 1854 to be in force in the absence of all action? But I ask the gentleman, and I ask the House, with confidence, whether, while this is so, and while the law of the State fixes the rate of compensation of the servants of this House by itself, or the Senate by itself, cannot enter into a new compact with the servants whom they choose to employ?

Mr. SPINNER. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SPINNER. I ask the gentleman from Virginia whether, if he considers the resolution of the House as not binding upon this House, this effect would not be that the present employes would get the old compensation, while the old ones would be cut off?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would consider the joint resolution as binding until it was repealed, and I am of that opinion.

Mr. SPINNER. I mean the resolution of this House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am speaking of the resolution of this House.

Mr. SPINNER. You say the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I say that when this House fixed the rate of compensation—

Mr. SPINNER. Against the law?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I deny that it is against the law. I will not say, again, that the legal rate of interest is fixed at six per cent., to give but five per cent.

Mr. SPINNER. But if you bargain for six per cent. can you cut it down to two?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly, if we bargain and agree to do so; it is done every day in New York.

Mr. ASHMORE. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.
Mr. MONTGOMERY. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman from Virginia be allowed to go on and conclude his speech, and that we vote upon the question. I am opposed to these interruptions; they are out of order. I think that there are not twenty members in this House who will not support this report of the committee. I am glad that this is the state of sentiment in the House, and I hope that the gentleman from Virginia will be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. ASHMORE. I would have been through by this time if I had been allowed to go on. I ask the gentleman from Virginia how he gets over the Constitution here in reference to this question of law. I will read the clause of the Constitution:

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate or the House of Representatives may be necessary, (except on a question of adjournment), shall be presented to the President; and he may, on his objection, the same shall take effect, and shall be approved by him; or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in the rules of limitation prescribed in the case of a bill."

In 1854 a joint resolution was passed, receiving the signature of the President. It was not vetoed, and consequently not returned for a two-thirds vote; but because a fixed salary was made it was irrepressible but by the joint action of the House and of the Senate. This House, at its last session, undertook to render that resolution nugatory and void, and of no effect, by passing a resolution which would affect the pay of many of its employees. This was not only a violation of the law, in my judgment, but it also makes a very serious and unjust discrimination between the employees of this House and those of the Senate; and that is what this House has no right to do, unless the Senate will unite with them in the repeal of the act of 1854, which I assume, the Senate will most decidedly refuse to do.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to elaborate this question further. But I will repeat, and I trust that I will be understood; and whether I am right, or whether I am wrong in my position, I shall at all events have common sense to back me. There is a law which regulates the compensation of the employees of the two Houses in the absence of any particular agreement; and if nothing is said by either House, then that law stands in the rule of compensation. Well, sir, I agree to that part. Now comes the question. I repeat it, that this House and the Senate may either, of themselves, deal with their employees, and enter new stipulations for modified compensation. I say, sir, that it is just as much a right to enter into a compact of that sort, not interfering with the law, as it is for two parties to agree to take less than the interest, which the law says shall be paid, where nothing is said about it. That is what I say upon that subject; and I say that there is not a plain man in the country who would not support this joint resolution as simply intending to make a rule of compensation in the absence of the specific action of either House, and as not designed to diminish the rights and powers of this House to deal with its servants, and to fix a modified rule of compensation.

I have said this much on that resolution. I understand the gentleman from New York to take the ground that this resolution, that he seeks to repeal, does not bind this House. These great gentlemen, these great statesmen, these great men are to watch over the Treasury, are already beginning to open the sluices to let the Treasury flow out. Yes, sir, this retrenching gentleman, the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, has already made up his mind that, although he asks that this resolution of the House shall be repealed, he, as one of the committee, will pass the accounts of the officers of the House under the joint resolution of 1854. Here are these economists commencing a system of extravagance at once. I call attention to it; and leave it to the gentleman from New York to deal with the question as he may see fit.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to say that, although we are for economy, we do not mean to steal to fill the Treasury.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman, I suppose, thinks it necessary continually to talk about his honesty; otherwise it might not be remembered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I never spoke of my honesty.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. You boast of not stealing.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has said I had better not talk of these small things. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Gentlemen are perfectly willing to pay these liberal rates of compensation in order to pamper persons around this Hall. That is it.

Let me dwell upon that subject, but as follows will proceed to the next resolution. It is as follows:

Resolved, That as much of said resolution as limits the number of pages to twelve, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Why repealed? I ask the question.

Mr. SPINNER. I will answer it. In the old Hall we had twenty pages, though everything there was compact, and the committee-rooms close around the House; but now they are scattered around the Senate is far from us, and we only ask that the same number may be appointed that we had then.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, I expected that these economists would begin to make us sit upon ourselves, pretty much. In the last Congress twelve pages were thought to be sufficient to perform the necessary duties that members called upon them to perform in this Hall. The gentleman will recollect that when that number was fixed it was after this Hall was occupied, or in view of its occupation.

I say, then, that here we see a beginning of that "economy" which works backwards. But I have yet to learn that twelve pages are not sufficient. I say that they are amply sufficient; and that even twelve pages are unnecessary. They have been such a very frequent "Twelve," however, in an abundance, at my rate. Let this House commence its career of reform by doing a little for themselves, and at least trying the number of pages that a former Congress—a Democratic Congress—fixed as sufficient.

Mr. SPINER. They paid twenty pages.
Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, if they did, they did no more than you are attempting to do now.

Mr. BLAKE. The gentleman from Virginia seems to be under a misapprehension in regard to this whole matter. The pay sought now to be given to these employees, is to employees of the last Congress—men who went to work under the joint resolution passed by both Houses of Congress; and the pages who are now asking for their pay are pages who were employed by the Democratic Doorkeeper of the last Congress; and so clearly just did their claim appear to the Committee of Accounts, that they unanimously agreed that they ought to have their pay. So much for economy!

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact, that after the resolution which has been referred to, specifying the number of these employees and fixing their pay, was passed by the last House, the appointments were made anew, and were accepted with the compensation fixed by that resolution?

Mr. BLAKE. I am unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. RUFFIN. I can inform the gentleman that that is the fact, and he will find it so if he will make matter.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to say to the gentleman that those men who were employed under the joint resolution during the last Congress, are now before the Committee of Accounts, asking their pay; and so clear and just did their claim appear to the mind of every gentleman who had given the subject consideration, that the committee unanimously agreed that they ought to have their pay.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That thing has been said so often that I suppose the House certainly will not mind it now; but it is very singular that gentlemen occupying the position of the majority of the Committee of Accounts should have a livelier appreciation of justice to Democrats than Democrats themselves have.

The resolution goes on:

And that the Doorkeeper be authorized, from time to time, to employ, under the direction of the Committee of Accounts, not exceeding twenty pages, between the ages of ten and sixteen years, at a compensation of $9 a day for each, during the session of Congress.

How many pages are there here now? They have not waited for the adoption of this resolution. No, sir; there are at least twenty on this floor now.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly.
Mr. CRAWFORD. The second resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts provides for an additional number of employees under the Doorkeeper—an additional number of pages. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can tell how many employees there are now under the control of the Doorkeeper of the House?

Mr. SPINNER. I cannot.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask if he can tell how many employees there are under the Clerk, under the Sergeant-at-Arms, or under the authority of any other connected with the House of Representatives?

Mr. SPINNER. I cannot.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I presumed that he could not, and I apprehend that there is not a member upon any one of this House who can get up and place now and state how many employees there are in the various departments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPINNER. The information is within the reach of every gentleman, and can be obtained in five minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I doubt it. I question whether a man could in one day ascertain the number of employees under the various officers of this House.

Mr. SPINNER. I want to say one thing to the gentleman. I have looked into this matter, and I find that the pay of employees amounts to but $300 for each member of the House, while it is over a thousand dollars in the Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to say that the number of persons employed under the different officers of the House of Representatives is one hundred and twenty-three. One hundred and twenty-three persons are absolutely employed in the various offices of the House, excluding the number in the folding-room below; and before I resume my seat, I will state the number employed in each department.

In the Clerk's office there are forty-six. The Sergeant-at-Arms has four. The Postmaster of the House has ten. The Doorkeeper has now, with the number of pages at twelve, forty-eight persons under his control.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman from Georgia, whether that number in the Clerk's office, does not include those called "land clerks" who are not properly connected with the service of the House?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No, sir. And then there are fourteen clerks to committees, making in all one hundred and twenty-three besides those engaged in the folding-room.

Now, I for one, never will vote for the second resolution, as reported by the Committee of Accounts, for the reason that I think they have employees enough. I thank the gentleman from Virginia for yielding me the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman from New York says that the expenses are over the House, and that it is not as much as in the Senate. Do I understand that gentleman, then, as inclining up to the standard of the Senate? Does he wish to put the expenses of the House upon that high standard? The gentleman says not at all.

Mr. SPINNER. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have instituted comparisons between the two political parties, and it was for that reason I made reference to the Senate. Every one knows which party has the control of that body, and which of this.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as these little boys are concerned, I know exactly how they are got upon this floor. Members of the House are in the habit of getting them permission to run upon the floor, and they are then regarded as having a preemption right. I had the chance of getting out here myself in that manner, but I would not do it. The reason why they wished to secure this preemption right, at the commencement of the present session, was that they did not expect the House to be organized in such a manner as it has been. Their reverence for the conservative sentiment of the country was too great to allow them to believe that the House would be organized as undoubtedly it has been. They wanted, therefore, this preemption right, in the expectation that they would be paid for it some day by the House.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire of detaining the House longer. I promised the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I would call the previous question before sitting down. Before doing so, however, I will present the following resolution, which has been handed me by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD], and offer it as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Committee of Accounts.

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts be authorized to audit and allow to the paymaster as each of the eight extra pages, lately employed on the floor of the House, for the time they actually served.

I now call the previous question.

Mr. SPINNER. It was my understanding that the gentleman from Virginia obtained the floor for the purpose of submitting some remarks with the promise to renew the demand for the previous question, but not with the permission to offer any amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. When I withdrew the demand for the previous question, at the request of the gentleman from Virginia, it was certainly with the understanding that it was for him to make a speech and then renew the demand for the previous question, but not to move any resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, I have read the resolution for information, and if the gentleman thinks it is in violation of the understanding, I will not offer it.

Mr. GARRELL. Will the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question, to permit me to offer it?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have certainly no objection, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Very well. I will not offer the resolution, or withdraw the demand for the previous question, if the gentleman does not give his consent.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The first resolution was then read, the question being on its adoption.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays upon that resolution.

Mr. BURNETT. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution was then adopted.

The question recurred on the adoption of the second resolution; which was read.

Mr. RUFFIN. I hope the House will give as the yeas and nays upon that resolution. I call for them.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The second resolution was then adopted.

Mr. SPINNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay this motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was upon the latter motion.

Mr. BURNETT. If gentlemen are not afraid of being placed upon the record, I ask them to give us the yeas and nays upon this resolution. I call for the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 38, noes 106.

Mr. TAPPAN demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BONHAM and TAPPAN were appointed.

The question was taken; and the yeas and nays were not ordered, the tellers having reported—yeas 38, noes 109; (one fifth not voting in favor thereof.)

The question was then taken on the motion that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table; and it was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 26) to extend the provisions of "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits, and for other purposes," to Minnesota and Oregon; when the Speaker signed the same.

CODIFICATION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. GURLEY. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed five hundred extra copies of the bill of the House (No. 13) entitled a law for the codification and compilation of the existing revenue laws of the United States, for the use of this House.

Mr. GURLEY. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the resolution was adopted, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GURLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUSE PRINTING.

Mr. GURLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report to the House a joint resolution authorizing each House of Congress to employ its own Printer to execute its own work.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title.

The resolution was then read in extenso. It provided for the third section of the act entitled

"An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1860," approved March 3, 1859, be repealed; and that the Printer of the Senate and the Printer of the House and its Representatives be directed to cause to be printed such regular and extra number of copies and reports as may be required by their respective Houses of Congress; provided that the Printer of each House shall be allowed one half the rate now allowed for composition, and no more; and that compensation in no case shall be paid for without satisfactory evidence is furnished to the Superintendent of Public Printing that said composition was necessary to the printing of the documents and reports, and that it has actually been executed.

Mr. GURLEY. I demand the previous question on the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. We cannot be asked to put a bill of this sort on its passage, without having time to consider it.

Mr. NOBLE. This is a bill to all intents and purposes, and does not come here, I think, as a privileged question. The joint resolution, I understand, comes here as a privileged question, and that it gets before us alone in that way, and I have therefore raised my question of order.

THE SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing have a right to report at any time, and this joint resolution comes before the House as a report from that committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to put a question to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GURLEY. Let me first make an explanation of the objects designed to be accomplished by the joint resolution.

Mr. CURRY. I object to any explanation of the bill, unless the demand for the previous question be first made.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The object of this resolution seems to be to plunder the Treasury for the benefit of the Printer of this House. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. GURLEY. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

THE SPEAKER. Discussion, then, is not in order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to put a question to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GURLEY. I withdraw the call for the previous question to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is not the third section of the law of 1859, which it is proposed to repeal, the section that provides that the Printer of the House shall not underlet the work of the public printing to other parties, but that he shall do it himself?

Mr. GURLEY. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. That was the act passed at the last session of the last Congress?

Mr. GURLEY. Yes, sir, I so explain.

Mr. MAYNARD. And is not the section that it is proposed to repeal, the section that provides that the first House, whether Senate or this House, that orders the printing of a document, shall do the printing of all the copies of that document to be ordered by both Houses? It does that, I understand, and it does furthermore provide that no member of either of these Houses shall underlet the work given to him to be done by other parties.

Mr. GURLEY. I will explain.

Mr. CURRY. I insist on my point of order, that the gentleman shall not proceed unless he call for the previous question as withdrawn.

Mr. GURLEY. I have already withdrawn my call for the previous question.

Mr. Speaker, the object of my resolution is this: it is to give the House the control of its own printing, and to enable it to place in the hands of its own Printer the work which properly and legitimately belongs to him. That is the main object of this joint resolution. As the law is now, the Printer of the House is ordered to print a document to be printed does the entire work on this document for both Houses; and the result is, this year, that the Senate Printer has nearly all the printing to do. That body has ordered the printing of the President's message and the accompanying documents, the Patent Office report, and various other documents, and the printing for this Congress so far has become a complete monopoly with the Senate Printer. What has been the effect, so far as the members of this House themselves are concerned? That this House cannot get its documents at the proper time, or as required by high authority from the Senate last week that the President's message and the accompanying documents, although they have been ordered to be printed for forty-five days, are not yet one half in type. Members every day want these documents to enable them to transact the legitimate business of the session.

There is, sir, no extra expense incurred by this resolution. It provides that the Printer of the House shall be allowed only one half the price for composition, and the work that is done by the House, and the printing has first been ordered by the Senate. It simply gives each House the control of its own printing, and it does not add one dollar to the present printing expenses of the Government.

Mr. STANTON. Will it impose upon the House the necessity of paying for double composition?

Mr. GURLEY. No, sir. It is specifically set forth in that joint resolution that the Printer of this House shall only have one half of the price for composition upon a work that may have been already ordered to be printed by the other House. It does not affect the amount which is now paid at all; it does not, as I have already stated, add one additional dollar to the present expense of the Government. One printer has been ordered by the Senate.

Mr. STANTON. By what warrant can the House Printer be entitled to half the price for composition of matter which has been set up by the Printer for the Senate? I do not understand how that is, and I would like to have it explained.

Mr. GURLEY. The resolution does not direct what is paid; but, on the contrary, has only a prospective operation.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is not the law, as it now stands, so that the Printer of the House as it is for the Printer of the Senate? In the event the House first orders the printing of a document, does not the Printer of the House, under the present law, get all of the work on that document which may be ordered by both Houses, and does he not receive full compensation for the whole of that work?

Mr. GURLEY. He does. But the result this session has been, that the Printer for that body has the printing of nearly all the reports and documents to be done for both of the House and Congress. Of course, he has very little to do; and the members of this House, sir, are now waiting.

finds that he has nothing to do; that the Printer of the Senate, who is a Democratic official, has anticipated him, and that, in truth, he will have but a very small proportion of the profits of the public printing. In that state of the business, the gentleman from Ohio comes forward, and proposes a bill, the effect of which is this: that the Printer of the Senate, although he acts under existing law, and in pursuance of law, shall be compelled to divide his profits with the Printer of the House.

That is perfectly apparent. But, Mr. Speaker, there is another objection to this bill. As I understand it, this joint resolution repeals the law by which the public printing is now conducted. One provision of that law is, that the printer and jobber of Public Printing shall be transferable. Well, sir, it so happens, that these gentlemen on the other side have elected a Printer of this House; a statesman, perhaps; an ex-governor; probably a man of large influence in the politics of the country, but who knows nothing about public printing, and who is, as I understand, destitute of the capital with which to establish a printing office in this city. Under these circumstances, he is anxious to transfer this job and business to a Public Printer, and to enjoy the profits; and this bill is in motion to repeal the law which forbids such transfer, so as to give the Republican Printer of this House an opportunity of securing a portion of the spoils monopolized by the Printer of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Virginia permit me to say a word here?

Mr. PRYOR. Certainly. Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to say that there was not in the House when this joint resolution was introduced and read; but hearing from some gentleman that it contained a provision repealing the law which forbids the transfer of the public printing, I moved to recommit the bill. My object in that motion was to refer it to the committee so as not to interfere with that portion of the law.

Mr. PRYOR. We tried to have the bill re-committed, but the gentleman who introduced it refused our request.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I did not know anything about that.

Mr. PRYOR. Well, I am speaking directly and pointedly to the merits of the bill. Permit me to say that the bill which has been thus covertly introduced into the House this morning, is in keeping with the bill that was introduced in the House yesterday. The gentleman who is, in fact, the author of the measure now under discussion, brought forward yesterday that bill with a pompous and taking tide. It was a bill professing a radical and complete reform of the enormous abuses of the public printing business. For myself, I confess that I was captivated by the title of the bill; captivated by the principle and policy of the bill; and would have given it my hearty concurrence and support. But let what revelation was made in the progress of the discussion? Why, that this bill, thus proposing this radical and complete reform of the abuses of the public printing, is operative only in so far as it destroys and cuts down those things which might be the basis of the Democratic Printer. That is to say, that so far as the bill touches abuses in the executive printing—the Democratic printing—it goes into effect with remorseless and immediate operation; but so far as it affects the interests of the Printer of this House, its operation is postponed until March 1861. Now, I appeal to the candid gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, if they will connive at any covert attempt of this sort, under the specious name of reform and retrenchment, to inflict not only a personal injury, but an illegal and most unwarrantable injustice.

Mr. HOUSTON resumed the floor. Mr. STANTON. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly. Mr. STANTON. I desire to say a few words in regard to this bill. I do not precisely understand the effect of it, so far as it proposes to change the mode of making payment for the public printing. It operates on the money already ordered, and already in the hands of the Senate Printer, it is most manifestly unjust. As a matter of course, nobody would ask the Senate Printer to divide the profits of the work which he is already engaged on, with the House Printer, who has done no part of it. If it is intended to operate only prospectively on such printing as may be hereafter ordered by either House, I cannot see that it to have any very serious effect on the business of the printing for both Houses; for it may be taken into consideration by this House, and be as ready to order its printing speedily as the Senate; and the House Printer will thus receive his fair share of the work.

I know it is said that the executive department is inclined to dispose to favor the Democratic Printer of the Senate, makes its communications of documents to be printed first to the Senate, and that therefore the Senate Printer ordinarily secures the first of the public printing. Now, if that be so, let it be so. I would not, for a moment, be so indiscreet as to propose that the House Printer be changed with the next presidential election, change an existing law. If the law is sound in principle—that the Printer of the House who first orders documents to be printed shall have the printing of them—I would not change it for any convenience it may create during the existence of the present Congress. I hope to elect a Republican President, and if there is to be any such favoritism, why the next President will send his documents first to the House, and the House Printer will get the printing. These are accidental and occasional effects of the operation of a general law that cannot be changed to meet temporary exigencies, and I think it is wrong to attempt it.

Let it be so, by any means, before the protest to the law of last session which prohibits any man from transferring the office of Public Printer, because I believe it to be a sound principle that who shall elect no man as Public Printer who is not first prepared with means to execute the public printing, and if we have got our foot into it on this occasion, let us get it out the best way we can. That is all there is to be said about it. I would not authorize the Printer to transfer the printing, no matter what his circumstances or qualifications.

Why, what gave rise to this law of the last session? The other side of the House elected a gentleman, in the last Congress, very similarly situated, with no means of doing the public printing. He got out the job, pocketed the profits and left for parts unknown. I believe he went to Ohio. The House believed that that was an improper mode of disposing of the offices and patronage of this Government, and they passed a law to prohibit it in the future. Now, I would not repeat that law for the purpose of giving another Printer, similarly situated and of different politics, an opportunity to accomplish the same purpose.

In regard to this motion to recommit, if the gentleman from Maine had made the motion before the third reading of the bill, I should have thought it exceedingly proper, in order that the joint resolution might be amended; but if it is now re-committed, after it has been engrossed and read a third time, I should think it would be better to let it be, because an amendment is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, if the committee could not report a recommendation to the House that the bill should be amended so that it would be engrossed as recommended?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly they can report such a recommendation; and the House can reconsider without the recommendation of the committee, just as well as with it. If the gentleman from Maine will move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed, he will accomplish the purpose he seeks now to accomplish. I shall vote, therefore, against the recommendation. But I can see no good object to be accomplished by the resolution now proposed, either as it now stands or as it may be amended. I am opposed to the whole scheme. Let the House Printer take such printing as is ordered by the House, fairly and legitimately, and have that business done with it, and let the printer who is scrambling here after a little matter of public plunder.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I would ask him if he has forgotten the fact that at the last session of Congress he, with me, voted against the adoption of this very section, now sought to be repealed, and that it was carried by a party vote?

Mr. STANTON. I do not remember anything of the kind.

Mr. COLFAX. I do.

Mr. STANTON. I know that they did not carry many things by a party vote. We generally beat them.

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman voted against it, and if he desires to be consistent he ought to vote now to repeal it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will yield now to the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GURLEY. I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Parva.] The object of this joint resolution is precisely what I stated it to be in the beginning. It gives to each House the control of its own printing, without regard to profits or plunder, as you call it. So far as we are concerned, we are simply looking to the interest of this House, in securing these documents for the use of members at an early day. I care not for the profits of the printing. [Derisive laughter from the Democratic benches.] I consider that any party which receives its profits is earned by them. I consider that any plunder that belongs to the public printing, or any other department of the Government, is an incus upon any party, and I would be willing to transfer all the profits and plunder to the other side, to the House of Representatives. I know they may be able to use it to advantage temporarily. They may be able to use it to advantage for electioneering purposes. Not so with the Republican party. We cannot use money in the sort of way the Democrats use it in the Democratic benches. We do not want plunder at all; but we do want our work well done, speedily done, so that members can have the President's message and accompanying documents before them when preparing their resolutions and bills.

I deny that the object of this resolution is to divide plunder. It is not so. The simple object is as I stated it in the beginning, and I think that, although parties may suppose that they gain something by plunder, or the profits of the public printing, or of other departments—and they may do so temporarily—in the long run, every party is injured by such plunder or profits. The best illustration you can have of this is now in the Senate of the United States. The development now being made there, and going forth to the country, as to the use made of the profits and plunder of the printing, are showing to the country the corrupt practices of the Democratic party, and injuring the cause of reform more, perhaps, than any other single consideration now before the public.

I simply wish, sir, to repel the insinuation that the object of this joint resolution is to divide plunder. We do not want plunder. We want our books and documents at the proper time. We want the President's message and the accompanying documents; and you will not have them till next session, unless you pass this resolution, or something like it. As to the last part of the third reading of the law, providing that the printing shall not be transferred or sold out, I have no objection to its being retained; let an amendment be made to that effect.

Mr. HOUSTON resumed the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, as there seems to be a little Ohio controversy, I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PENDLETON. Not at all. I simply desire to ask my colleague for an explanation in reference to the clause of the resolution which provides for half pay for compensation to each Printer. Is the object of that provision to make the printer who is to be retained half pay, while the man who does no work shall receive half the pay also?

Mr. GURLEY. Each Printer receives half pay for type-setting. We have a right to reduce the pay.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then I desire to ask if the price now paid for composition is too high?

Mr. GURLEY. Certainly; with half pay for type-setting, the profits will be abundant, and much more than sufficient.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is the price now provided by law to be paid for composition to the Printers of the House and Senate too large?

Mr. GURLEY. I think it is.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, then, why do you not introduce a resolution or embody a provision in this resolution by which the price shall be cut down one half, instead of dividing it only, by providing that the man who does the work shall receive half the amount now allowed, while another person who does none of the composition, receives the other half?

Mr. GURLEY. We are perfectly willing that each Printer shall receive half pay for composition; and we go further, and say that we are willing to cut down the present price of composition. The present Printers of the House and Senate were elected subject to the decision of Congress on this very subject.

Mr. PENDLETON. As I understand my colleague, he is willing to do that which I say is a great abuse. This resolution provides—and I understand him to admit that my interpretation of it is correct—that the price for composition, now provided by law to be paid to the Printer who does the work, shall be divided between the man who does the work and the man who does not, each taking half price.

Mr. GURLEY. As the law now stands, the Senate Printer gets full pay. The Senate monopolizes the printing of both Houses of Congress, and the Printer of the House receives no pay. I propose to divide the pay by dividing the work.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand that the Printer of the House gets pay for all the work that he does, and the Printer of the Senate gets pay for all the work he does.

Mr. GURLEY. But the Senate have ordered nearly all the work, and the House Printer gets nothing, so far as reports and documents are concerned.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the gentleman propose to correct the abuse of which he complains by giving that which ought to go to the Printer who does the work to the man who does not do it? If the Senate has monopolized all the printing of the two Houses of Congress, there ought to be a means of preventing that abuse.

Mr. GURLEY. The joint resolution is prospective; it does not look to or affect any printing already ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand that.

Mr. GURLEY. It is solely prospective in its operation, and simply allows the Printer for each House to do the work ordered by that House, independent of the other.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not understand that the resolution of the gentleman proposes to divide the work—not at all. What the gentleman proposes, as I understand it, is, that the Printer of the Senate shall, as he does under the present law, do the work ordered by both Houses upon such documents as have been first ordered to be printed by the Senate, but that the Printer of the House shall receive half compensation for such work.

Mr. GURLEY. The resolution provides that, when documents are ordered by both Houses, each Printer shall have half pay for composition.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the Printer for the House do half the work?

Mr. GURLEY. I repeat, that the work ordered by each House is done by its own Printer, and each receives half pay for composition.

THE SPEAKER rose. (Mr. JAMES COCHRAN in the chair.) The Chair must beg gentlemen not to indulge in this colloquial debate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to understand the effect of the measure proposed. Now, sir, I do not understand, by any means, that, under this proposed change in the law, when a work is ordered to be printed by both Houses, the Printer of each House is to do one half the work and receive half the pay, but the effect will be that the Printer of one House will do all the work, although both Printers are to have the pay. It is plainly not contemplated that the work shall be set up two or three times.

Mr. GURLEY. I say to the gentleman, what I have already repeated, that the Printer of each House is to do the printing ordered by that House, and to receive half the pay now received for composition.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I understand very well what the object of this measure is. It is to compel a partnership between the Printers of the two Houses.

Mr. GURLEY. It provides that each shall have half pay for composition, but it does not compel or favor any partnership.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair must again request gentlemen not to indulge in this colloquial debate. It is the duty of every gentleman, when he rises, to address the Chair. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is entitled to answer.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I was going on to say that I think I understand perfectly the object and effect of this joint resolution. It is to compel a partnership between the Printers of the two Houses; because it is not to be supposed that the Printer of each House will perform this work of composition. The Senate orders a document to be printed, and the Printer for the Senate proceeds to put it in type; the House then orders the same document to be printed; it is not to be supposed that, with the document already in type, the Printer of the House will proceed to re-set it. No, sir; the effect will be to compel a combination to be formed between the Printers of the two Houses, by which the work will all be done by the Printer of the House, which first orders the document to be printed, although the other receives half the pay for composition.

Mr. GURLEY. The resolution certainly does not contemplate a combination, whatever may be the effect. The object of the resolution is stated in its title. It is, that the Printer of each House shall, by himself, do the work ordered by that House, and receive half pay for composition. The Printer of the House is not to do the work of the Senate, nor the Printer of the Senate to do the work of the House; but each is to be independent of the other.

Mr. PENDLETON. Then why do you propose to give each Printer but half pay for composition, if he is to do the whole work?

Mr. GURLEY. Because we think that is sufficient.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not say the object contemplated in drawing up this resolution was to compel the Printers of the two Houses to form a combination or to enter into a partnership. I do not say what was the object in drawing up the resolution, but I say that what will be the effect, do not we know, if the price now paid for composition is legitimate and reasonable, the Printers of the two Houses can afford to set up the type for half pay. No, sir; the effect will be that one Printer only will do it. If the price is too high, reduce it. Let the Government divide the work, and let the advantage of the change, and not the House Printer.

Mr. HASKIN. As a member of the Committee on Printing, I desire to be heard on this joint resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLORENCE. Do I understand that the gentleman from Alabama is retaining the floor indefinitely, with power to assign it to whom he pleases? Because, if that is the understanding, I desire to occupy myself for a very short period, if he will graciously consent. If he will give me five minutes, I am willing to be limited to that time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania five minutes when the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] shall have finished.

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to say that I concurred with my colleague on the Committee on Printing [Mr. GURLEY] in the joint resolution which is now before the House. Since I have heard the discussion which has taken place to-day against the measure, I have become satisfied that its provisions are not understood by the House. The design of this resolution—for I desire to be frank in my statement—is to give to this House, in organization, the patronage that is now divided between it. It is dragged by this joint resolution that the Printer elect of the House shall have the power to do the printing which the House itself may order.

It will be recollected, Mr. Speaker, by the House, certainly by the members who were present during the last Congress—that at the last session, and near the close of it, a bill was passed, the effect of which was to give to the Printer of the Senate a virtual monopoly of nearly all the printing of Congress. That bill provided that the Printer of the House first ordering a document to be printed should do the work for both Houses so far as that document was concerned. Well, sir, under that law, the Senate being the smaller body, much more a close corporation than this House, and being always on the qui vive for patronage, will get almost the entire amount of the public printing.

Now, I suppose this subject of the public printing, permit me to say, as a member of the Printing Committee, that I will vote most cheerfully for the erection of a Government printing office, or for any other plan which will immediately disengage with the infamous amount of plunder connected with the public printing, instead of corrupt as well the Democratic party as the Republican party.

Mr. MCCLERNAND. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether, under the existing contract with the Printer of the House and the Printer of the Senate, it is within the jurisdiction of the House to fix the rates of compensation for the public printing; and whether, under this joint resolution, if it shall become a law, the rate of compensation will not become settled, and that advantage yielded?

Mr. HASKIN. The advantage is not yielded; and for this reason: the Senate having elected its Printer, and having elected as such Printer General George W. Bowman, the editor and proprietor of the Constitution newspaper, any bill proposing to alter the rates of printing, or to give the public printing, certainly would not pass the other branch of the national Legislature.

Now, sir, the great profit connected with this corrupting system of public plunder growing out of the public printing, consists in the printing of the executive documents of the Government. There are about one hundred thousand dollars a year. It is performed by the Printer of the Senate, and yields, as I am informed, a profit of about seventy cents on the dollar. General George W. Bowman, the Printer of the Senate, as I have said, has the printing of these executive documents. He also has the printing of the other branch of Congress, and under the law passed at the heel of the last session of Congress, he has also virtually a monopoly of the printing of this House.

Now, sir, in such a system, I say that this House ought to have its own work given to, and executed by, its own Printer. I do not mince matters. I am frank in saying what is my opinion; and I repeat that I think this House is entitled to dispose of its own patronage. But when I say that, I say it with a view to the correction with any and all parties in correcting this system of public plunder, which I think ought not to exist under any civilized Government. It is a fond, sir, which has been used by the Democratic party to control congressional elections in Pennsylvania, to sustain a Government organ here, and to sustain the Pennsylvania, and the Evening Argus newspapers, in the city of Philadelphia. I am opposed to it because it has been used for such purposes.

Mr. HINDMAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may put a question to him.

Mr. HASKIN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HINDMAN. The gentleman has referred to the printing fund for the purpose of sustaining party newspapers. I ask him now whether, in the House, the caucus system was not made, and favorably listened to, by one of the Republican candidates for the office of Printer of this House, to divide off a part of the printing apportion for a purpose similar to that referred to by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HASKIN. Yes, sir; and that proposition defeated the individual whose friends made it for him.

Mr. HINDMAN. Was not that man thereafter nominated by the Republican party?

Mr. HASKIN. He was; and he was not elected because of the caucus proposition.

Mr. HINDMAN. Did not the gentleman vote for his nomination in the Republican caucus?

Mr. HASKIN. It was not called a caucus; it was called a conference.

Mr. HINDMAN. I am not particular to know by what name it was called; and, further, did not the gentleman vote for that man in this House?

Mr. HASKIN. I did vote for him in the House, because I felt bound by the action, not of the caucus, but of the conference, where I was treated as an ally, and not as one belonging to the Republican party.

Mr. HINDMAN. Is the gentleman now addressing this House in his capacity as a party man, or in that of an ally.

Mr. HASKIN. My position is that rather of an ally, than of a party man.

Mr. Speaker, I want to go on with my remarks where I left off, and to say that during the Thirty-fifth Congress, just as they have disgusted me during this Congress, as they have existed upon all sides of the House. It is a known fact—it was testified to by Mr. C. Wendell, before a select committee of this House at the last session, of which committee I was chairman—that he was the Printer of the House de facto. Sir, this House should never recognize printers de facto, but only printers de jure. I, for one, will very willingly vote for any resolution, whether moved by a gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANLEY] or by any gentleman upon this side of the House, providing that the man who shall be the Printer of the House shall do the work ordered, and not undertake it, trafficking upon the legislation of the country, by selling out, as Mr. Stedman did during the last Congress, for thirty thousand dollars and so on.

Now what are the other facts in relation to this matter? The Printer of the Senate and the Printer also of the executive printing has nothing to do with the execution of that work further than to receive his thirty-three and one third per cent. The man whose work is done by Mr. John C. Rives, the printer of our daily sayings here, which, in too many instances, I think, were better unsaid, or, when said, unsupported. The whole system is rotten, and, for one, I am agreed to displace it by a better one.

Mr. FOUKE. And as upon this subject, I have a resolution prepared which I should like to have read for the information of the House. I would like to introduce it, and to see it adopted by this House. It touches all the matters to which reference has been made. As the other side introduced resolutions, I have introduced one, and fully voted, I hope that there will be no objection to the introduction and adoption of my resolution. I hope that it will pass by acclamation. It has been suggested by the remark which have been made by the gentleman from New York. It has reference to these subjects and to the organization of this House. [Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!" "Mr. BINGHAM. I object to the introduction of any such resolution at this time. It is entirely out of order.

Mr. HASKIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois to introduce his resolution, when the proper time arrives for that purpose. I want now to finish what I have to say. The gentleman from Illinois knows that I would not be wanting in any aid to the gentleman from New York. I have referred to these subjects and to the organization of this House. [Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!" "Mr. BINGHAM. I object to the introduction of any resolution whatever.

Mr. HASKIN. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution now before us is not retroactive, but prospective in its operation. It has reference exclusively to the printing for this House hereafter to be executed. It provides, that hereafter the printing of this House shall be done by its Printer, and that the printing of the Senate shall be executed by its Printer, General George W. Bowman.

Mr. NOELL. Does not the resolution provide that all the printing ordered, in the past and for the future, shall be divided up between the Printer of the House and the Printer of the Senate?

Mr. HASKIN. It does not, as I have already declared. The effect of the provisions of the resolution will begin with the introduction of the resolution, and it does not have any effect upon the printing already ordered.

Mr. NOELL. My understanding was, that it authorized the payment to the Printer of the Senate for the work which he has given him, and then, upon that, that the Printer of the House should receive pay for the printing ordered by the House.

Mr. HASKIN. That is a mistake, for the resolution intends to do no such thing. The subject of the resolution is simply to restore the House to its former rights; to give the Printer of this House the printing ordered by the House, and the Printer of the Senate the printing ordered by the Senate. That is the resolution, nothing more and nothing less. It has for its effect to destroy a monopoly of the public printing, which has been given to the Senate Printer by the operation of the act of Congress passed before the adjournment of the last session. I say that the House ought to have the control of its own printing.

Mr. PRYOR. I think that the gentleman misapprehends the object and the policy of the existing law. Before the present system was adopted the Government had to pay for double composition; that is to say, if a document was ordered to be printed by the Senate, the Government paid for composition there, and if, then, it was ordered to be printed by the House, the Government paid for composition here. Hence the adoption of the law. There was no motive for the adoption of the law such as that intimated, for then the Printer of the House was a Democrat, as was the Printer of the Senate.

Mr. HASKIN. In answer to the gentleman, permit me, sir, to say that I know something about the printing of the law, and the matter used to influence its passage. I know that, anticipating just the result which has taken place in reference to the organization of this House against the Democratic party, the men who control the patronage connected with the public printing pushed it through. They are always on the watch.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I want to remind the gentleman that this act originated in the Senate, as an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. HASKIN. That may be so; but I will guaranty that some of those who had something to do with the public printing, had something to do also with that amendment in the Senate.

This resolution, sir, proposes that hereafter there shall be no double composition. It only repeals the third section of the act of 1846, which gives this monopoly of the printing to the Senate Printer, shall be repealed, and that the Printer of the House shall have the legitimate patronage belonging to the House, and that the Printer of the Senate shall be the legitimate printer belonging to the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen upon the other side of the House cannot agree among themselves as to the objects they have in view, in passing this resolution. The gentleman from Ohio says that the House does not want the patronage and plunder which others think he and his party seek out of such legislation as this—he says he would rather throw it all over to this side, if he could do so. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] did not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, for he enters into the debate, and speaks candidly, doubtless, and does not hesitate to admit that he seeks for his party the spoils, and says that one object of this resolution, and I have no doubt the printing, if not the subject, is the spoils. He says that, under existing laws, the House Printer does not get his share, and this resolution is intended to give him a larger share.

Now I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the professed disinterested patriotism of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANLEY] is so soon and so thoroughly exposed and proved not to exist, as it has been by one of his own friends and colleagues on the committee. The confessions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] fall with crushing force upon the gentleman from Ohio. They should have based their proposed legislation upon principle, and such exposures could not have been made. The gentleman from Ohio says this resolution is to enable us to get our documents at an earlier period. Is that correct? Can it be so? Is it possible that intelligent, sensible men should be brought to that conclusion, and then they get them sooner? You propose that the Printer of the House and the Printer of the Senate shall each receive one half of the charges for composition. And how? If your House Printer should have the printing of the House, the Printer of course, unless your charges are higher than they should be, he cannot afford to set up the document for half pay for composition. Nor can the Senate Printer do it. Then the result will be that the Printer first receiving the order will print it, and the other will be left out, and you cannot get it sooner than you do now.

If the object of this bill be what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANLEY] states it to be, it will, if passed, force a partnership or association between the Printers of the two Houses; they will have to do so in self-defense, unless the pay for composition is double as much now as it should be, and your documents will be even more delayed, in my judgment, than before the printing of our tables. The documents for half price. If the present price is reasonable and just, and if the present price will enable them to do the work for half of it, we should at once reduce it. We cannot expedite the printing in that way. We know the reasons why the documents are not now upon our tables. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANLEY] knows that it has resulted from the fact that we did not organize until very recently, and did not pass an order to print our documents. The Printer of the Senate was ready and willing to print them, but he did not know how many we wanted or ordered. He had no authority to print them for the House. I heard one of the gentlemen said to be associated with the Senate Printer in doing the printing say, that he was very desirous that the House should make its order for printing its documents, so that the Printer could enter upon the work, but the House failed to do so, and that is the reason why they are not now upon our tables. It is our own fault, and not the fault of the law. They were scrambling about the spoils which the gentleman from Ohio says is a place of honor, which the gentleman from New York says he is exceedingly anxious to grasp, and which the conduct of the members of that side of the House shows is a leading idea with them.

Mr. GURLEY. I wish to refer to the gentleman from Alabama that I was informed last week, on good Democratic authority, that the work the Senate ordered some forty-five days ago—the President's message and accompanying documents—was not one half in type yet, even for that House. That being the case, I think it would be very wise in this House expect to receive our work?

Mr. HOUSTON. Gentlemen on that side of the House seem very happy in obtaining Democratic information; and I must confess, that Democrats who propose to communicate their opinions to the public through the press, are anxious to have their Democracy, if not their political integrity, somewhat questioned. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh; but I repeat, that a Democrat will get very little credit for his Democracy who selects a printer from the other side, which makes his communications with this House or the public.

I would like to know of the gentleman from New York what has become of the binding of this Congress? Why is that not included in these bills, or some of them, which gentlemen say are designed to reduce the expenses, and prevent the corporations growing out of the public printing and binding? Will the gentleman tell me?

Mr. FOUKE. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to permit me to withhold this question until before the House, to introduce a resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will hear it read.

Mr. OLIN. I object.

Mr. FOUKE. The gentleman from Alabama can adopt it as a part of his speech.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will; and ask the Clerk to read it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed, with instructions to inquire whether any corrupt combination was made or proposed, or whether any不正当 means used or proposed to be used, by any of the present officers of this House, or with the knowledge of any of them, to secure the printing of the documents of the House; and whether any of the present officers of this House have been guilty of official corruption or malfeasance, as subordinate officers of the House of Representatives, during the previous session; and whether any of the present officers also inquire whether the expenses of the House of Representatives may not be reduced, consistently with the public interests, and report in what respects and to what extent. And for the purposes aforesaid, said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time.

Mr. FOUKE. That resolution has been suggested by the course pursued by gentlemen upon the other side of the House. It is the resolution I desired to introduce when my friend from New York [Mr. HASKIN] was speaking, and which was objected to by the other side of the House. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the resolution is before the House, and therefore debate is not in order.

Mr. COYODE. I want it brought before the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is not the gentleman from Alabama mistaken in supposing that the binding is not also included in these proposed amendments of the law?

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that it is not to be affected until by the resolution before the House. It does not touch the binding, as I understand it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman know whether or not the binding of the miscellaneous documents—a very large and heavy job—has been contracted for by the present Congress?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] can better give that information. I understand that the binding for this Congress has been let out; and a charge is floating about in responsible newspapers—one published in this city, and of the Republican party—that it was let out by the Committee on Printing, or a portion of the committee, after they had received a bid from a responsible party, proposing to do the binding for a much less sum than that for which it was let out. And now the gentleman from New York [Mr. HASKIN] comes up and vents himself to-day as an advocate of reform. He tells you that the patronage and plunder are what corrupt all political parties. I would like to know from the gentleman whether the charge is true; whether it is true that he is out of the binding to a pet of his, and to a gentleman from Ohio, as it has been charged in the papers? I would like to know at what price it was let; whether there were any other bids for it before the committee than the one accepted; and whether it was not contracted to favor a set price higher than others proposed to take it?

Mr. HASKIN. I will state to the gentleman from Alabama that there is not a word of truth in the charge; that the Committee on Public Printing let out the binding to bidders of responsibility, who were the lowest bidder.

I will state, also, that subsequent to the letting out of the binding, a person connected with a small newspaper in this city endeavored, as I am informed, to levy black mail upon those to whom the binding had been given. The subject, however, has been referred to the committee introduced yesterday in my absence, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BURNETT], to a committee for examination.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman tell me where the parties were made so fortunate as to get this binding contract?

Mr. HASKIN. One in Ohio, and one in New York.

Mr. HOUSTON. What portion of New York? In the gentleman's district?

Mr. HASKIN. Yes; but doing business in the city of New York.

Mr. HOUSTON. When were the bids sent in from those who desired to levy black mail? He admits that bids came before the committee proposing to do the binding at a price lower than that at which it has been contracted for; and now I want him to tell this House how that matter stands.

I do not wish to entrap the gentleman; but, so far as the matter is now before the public, and so far as it has reached me, that bid was in before the contract was made with the parties who contracted to do the binding. I may be mistaken. If I am, the gentleman from New York can correct me; and I want to know of him, and if he refuses to speak out, then from some other member of the committee, when the other bids were received by the committee.

Mr. HASKIN. Appreciating, as I do, the extraordinary colloquial ability of the gentleman, [Mr. HOUSTON. That does not answer my question,] and the clearness with which he states all his propositions, I am surprised, upon an occasion like this, when we are discussing a bill in reference to the public printing, that he should interpolate into the discussion a subject which has already been referred by the House, for special investigation, to a committee. I believe he is one of the oldest members of the House, familiar with its rules, great on points of order, [laughter,] and on calling persons to order; and so believing, I refer him, for information upon this subject, to the report of the committee which has that matter in charge.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the answer that I might have been satisfied I would get from a member who is a little inclined to shun letting the whole of the transaction come to light.

Mr. HASKIN. Never, sir.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, sir, I will ask the gentleman the question again. When did those other bids, offering to do the printing at a lower price, reach the Committee on Printing? I want to know the day, because then we can determine something ourselves.

Mr. HASKIN. Perhaps I had better refer you to the chairman of the Committee on Printing on that subject; but I think the proper course is to refer you to the committee who has the investigation in charge.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman says that a little newspaper in this city, or parties connected with it, have endeavored to levy black mail.

Mr. HASKIN. So I am informed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the paper referred to is the Republic. I am informed that the editor of that paper charges boldly and clearly, and without question or doubt, that the Committee on Printing, or the gentleman from New York, or whoever had the matter in charge, did let out the binding to a pet of his, and to a gentleman from Ohio, at a lower price; and that, while the committee had his bid before them, they let out the job to parties, one of whom is living in the district of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HASKIN,] as he has admitted; and the other, I am informed, who lives in the district of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SUGARMAN.]

Mr. HASKIN. I desire to know, from the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, whether he has become the champion here of the newspaper called the Republic, and its editors and proprietors?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir. I am on the side of the country, and against malpractices. I am the champion of truth, and of a disclosure of all the facts implicating parties in these transactions.

Mr. COX. I wish to say a word right here. It is the charge, as I have heard it, that the gentleman from New York that there was an attempt to levy black mail on the men who got this binding. That charge involves the integrity of Mr. J. J. Coombs, the proprietor of the Republic newspaper, who makes the inducements of corruption to the men who live on the other side.

Mr. Coombs is well known in Ohio, as he is in this city. I have in my eye gentlemen on the other side of the House who know Mr. Coombs to be an honest, irreproachable man in every respect, as honest as any man who lives in this city. He is a Republican. He was a Republican Senator in Ohio. He has never, to my knowledge, had his character impeached by any man; and I am only surprised that his friends should sit here and hear this impeachment made of his character—a charge of an attempt by him to levy black mail on those men who seem to have been the favorites and pets of this Printing Committee. I hope this thing will be thoroughly investigated. Mr. Coombs calls for this investigation; and I think that it will not appeal in vain to the fact that gentlemen on one side of the House, as a matter of personal right to him, that his reputation shall be cared for when it is assailed by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to say to my colleague, [Mr. COX,] that in order all he has said in regard to Mr. Coombs. I failed to say anything about it before, because I thought the introduction of that binding subject into this debate exceedingly inappropriate and uncalled for. When the proper time comes, I will be prepared to go into the matter, and will be prepared to vindicate Mr. Coombs.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has not seen the charge to which I have referred in regard to the binding?

Mr. STANTON. I answer the gentleman from Alabama that I know all about it; and when the subject comes properly before the House, I am prepared to state what I know about it. But I will not interpolate it into a debate on another subject unconnected with it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would read the floor.

Mr. GURLEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. GURLEY. I wish simply, as I say chairman of the Committee on Printing, to say that the committee, in letting out the binding, did nothing that they are not willing to have presented to this House in sunlight. I never read the article referred to in the Republic. I have heard that it made certain charges against the committee, and if what I heard is true of the charge, then I say that the charge is false, and I will demonstrate its falsity before the committee raised to investigate the subject. I want it discussed and understood that we did nothing but what was done unanimously.

Mr. HOUSTON. That may have been.

Mr. HASKIN. With the permission of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama—

Mr. TAPPAN. I rise to a point of order. My friend of order, is that the present debate is entirely foreign to the question before the House.

I was in the hopes of having this day devoted to the consideration of private business, and I called for the regular order of business when the gentleman from Ohio put in his report from the Committee on Printing; but I understand it to be a privileged question. I shall now insist on having this debate confined within some proper limits, so that, if possible, we may after some time get through with it. I insist that gentlemen shall be confined to the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being taken, the debate, in the opinion of the Chair, is out of order. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GROW. I move the previous question. Mr. FLORENCE. I trust my colleague will withdraw the call for the previous question for a single moment. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No debate is in order. The question is on seconding the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; which was on recommending the joint resolution.

Mr. STANTON. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I renew the motion to lay the bill upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Clerk again read the joint resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the third section of the law referred to in the resolution. I desire to see if the provision is in that section that the office of Printer shall not be transferred or sold.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. It is.

Several Members objected to the reading.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The reading of the section is not in order. It would be in the nature of debate, if there were no other obstacle to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the motion to lay on the table fails, will not the next question be upon the motion to recommitt?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

The motion was seconded and ordered.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I want it understood that if the bill is recommitted, it cannot be amended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Certainly it can.

The question was taken on Mr. BARKSDALE's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Green Adams, Adams, Thomas L. Anderson, Ashmore, Avery, Beecock, Benham, Bondiger, Brabson, Briscoe, Buffington, Burt, Burnett, Cox, John B. Clark, Cleveland, Coffey, Conner, Cox, James H. Cowley, Burton, Cramer, Crawford, Curry, John J. Davis, Reuben Davis, De Janette, Edmonstone, Edmonds, Ferry, Fieser, George, Hamilton, Harlan, Harris, Hutton, Hill, Hindman, Holmes, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Kilgore, Jenkins, Jones, William Kellogg, Kilgore, Killen, Lester, Lindsay, Larnache, Leake, Lewis, Lewis, Mackay, Charles D. Martin, Elbert S. Martin, Maynard, McCardell, McPherson, McQuinn, McKee, Miles, Moore, Montgomery, Morrison, Nathan, Nathan, Moore, Morrill, Nelson, Olcott, Noyes, Pendleton, Peyton, Price, Rice, Reagan, Rogers, Russell, Russell, Scott, Thomas W. Smith, William N. B. Smith, Russell, Russell, Stevenson, William Stewart, Stokes, Stuart, Tompkins, Underhill, Van Dusen, Vinton, Wallcut, Walcott, Edwin B. Washburn, Webster, Webster, Wilson, and Wright—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles F. Adams, Atchison, Ashler, Babbitt, Dingham, Estey, Blake, Burlington, Burnham, Campbell, Curry, Coffey, Conkling, Corcoran, Curtis, Del-

both Houses, and affirmed by the President, so that the citizen shall be surrounded with certain safeguards.

Mr. President, I confidently submit that a power so entirely without support, and also so unobnoxious to criticism, at the same time that it is so vast, is not to be carelessly exercised. You cannot make the witness to prison without establishing a new precedent and commencing a new class of cases. You will declare that the Senate, at any time—not merely in the performance of its admitted judicial duties, but also in the performance of its mere legislative duties—may drag a citizen from the distant village of the remote State, and compel his testimony, involving the guilt or innocence of absent persons, or, it may be, of the witness himself. This is a fearful prerogative; and permit me to say, that in assuming it you liken yourselves to the Jesuits, at the period of their most hateful supremacy, when it was said that their power was a sword whose handle was at Rome, and whose point was in the most distant places. You take into your hands a sword, whose handle will be in this Chamber, to be clutched by the arbitrary majority, and whose point will be in every corner of the Republic.

If the present case were doubtful, which I do not admit, I feel that I cannot go wrong when I lean to the side of liberty. But, even admitting that you have the power, is this the occasion for using it, upon the subject of Harper's Ferry? The object to be accomplished worth the sacrifice? Is it well to have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous to use it like a giant.

For myself, sir, I confess a feeling of gratitude to the witness, who, knowing nothing which he owes to Congress, and being anxious that the liberties of all may not suffer through him, feeble in body and broken in health, hardly able to endure the fatigue of appearing at your bar, now braves the prison which you menace, and thrusts him as a bolt to arrest an unauthorized and arbitrary proceeding.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HALE. What is the question?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions of the House from Virginia, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a few words on this subject before the vote is taken; more because, on Friday last, I expressed a doubt with reference to the power of the Senate, than for any other reason. I suspect that the expedient which induces the respondent here—if he may be called so—to take the course he has taken; but, however much I may respect it, it cannot influence me, of course, in the discharge of my duty, if I do not agree with him in the supposition that we are exercising a jurisdiction which we have no right to exercise. Let me call the attention of the Senate back, for a few moments, to the consideration of the course which this question has taken.

When the original resolution for the appointment of this committee was introduced, there was a time of very considerable excitement, and when many intimations had been made in the newspapers, and were not wanting here, that the political party with which I act had been part and parcel, in some degree at least, of the difficulty which had arisen at Harper's Ferry. The proposal was made to raise a committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire not only as to the facts of the transaction there, but also to inquire who in other States had been connected with it. So far, on this side of the Congress, we had no disposition to interpose any objection whatever to the inquiry as proposed, but every desire to afford the utmost scope to it, in order that the facts might be elicited. The question was not raised at that time whether the Senate had the power to appoint this committee; nor was the term of the resolution itself very strictly scrutinized, to see whether it did not go further than it ought to have gone; and that, because of the disposition which I have stated on this side of the Chamber to afford every facility, and to give the broadest scope to the inquiry proposed.

Having no doubt myself of the general power of the Senate as a legislative body to make the inquiry, I voted for the resolution, as did we all. Having voted for the resolution, I have voted also without hesitation for the measures which have been taken since, with reference to the witnesses.

I have done so, having no doubt whatever of the power which has been spoken of. It had been my conclusion during my legislative life that this power, to a certain extent, existed in all legislative bodies of this description; and seeing no objection to the exercise of it, desiring that it should be exercised under the circumstances in which the inquiry was presented, I have voted readily for all the subsequent proceedings. Here, however, we come to a point; the question is at last raised, and raised distinctly, by a person who is brought before us to respond, whether the Senate has the power, in the first place, to make the inquiry; and, secondly, whether it has the power to proceed against a witness who refuses to testify, and to proceed in the ordinary method by imprisonment until he shall be willing to afford the information that is sought for.

I cannot agree with my friend from Massachusetts that the original resolution directing the inquiry is rendered void, if otherwise we have the authority for it, by the circumstance that it includes within it a power of inquiry beyond our legislative capacity, or judicial capacity, if that be the case. The original resolution directs an inquiry, in the first place, into the facts of the transaction at Harper's Ferry. It then goes on to contemplate several other things; among others, what my friend from Massachusetts has mentioned, in relation to what other persons were concerned there had afforded aid in men and money. I have very serious doubt whether the Senate has any such power as that; but, as I said before, individually I, and collectively my friends on this side of the Chamber, did not examine that question, from the desire we had to afford the largest liberty of inquiry on the subject. Suppose the resolution had read simply "that a committee be appointed with power to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary in order to protect the property of the United States at Harper's Ferry or elsewhere, with power to send for persons and papers," and nothing more: can it be doubted that this is a legitimate subject of legislation by us as legislators? Not at all.

Then, that being contained in the resolution, as it is, the inquiry, like the subsequent proceedings, or like some legal proceedings, rendered void by the fact that it introduces also a proposition for its inquiry into a matter over which we have no control? I think not, very clearly. Why? Because no objection to an inquiry of that kind is to be taken, unless it is shown to be unconstitutional. We may summon a witness. The witness may go before the committee. He does not know that the matters of inquiry put to him will be such as he wishes to make a point upon, or such as are improper in themselves. On the contrary, the presumption should be, in his mind, that the matters of inquiry will be confined to those things which are proper to be inquired into. If they are not, when he comes before the committee he may make his point on the questions which are put to him. He may object to the questions, and, if he does, in reference to a subject about which we have no right to inquire, he may object to that question, and then the point thus raised will come before the Senate. If, on the contrary, the inquiries put to him be confined to subjects proper to be inquired into under the resolution, there is no reason why he should not answer. It is his duty to answer under such circumstances. For that reason I say that, although I think now, on examination, that the original resolution went too far, beyond the limits of our power, as to the inquiry, for a reason that I shall give hereafter, yet I think it includes manifestly matters into which we have a right to inquire, and upon which we have a right to legislate, and therefore that the resolution is good, so far as the witness is concerned; and that he cannot object to the resolution, or to the questions put to him, before he can object to the jurisdiction on that account.

Then, sir, comes the question about which I stated that I had some doubt, and which I rose to explain. My doubt arose not at all from any objection to the power of the Senate to send for anybody over the subject. The argument of my honorable friend from Massachusetts is founded upon the idea of a broad distinction between the British Parliament and the Congress of the United States, the origin of both, and the derivation of their powers. I concede that they are widely different.

The Parliament is very different from the Congress. The Parliament exists, as it is said, by its own laws and usages. It is almost omnipotent. It has hardly any limit to its powers. It is called by the law the highest, most honorable court in the realm; and it is that most high and honorable court from the usages and laws which itself has made for a long series of time, running far into antiquity, the times to which, by the law says, the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. We are constituted very differently. We live under a charter—constitutional provisions to which we owe our existence—and we stand on very different grounds; but do not share of powers. In fact, none of the powers of the British Parliament, which are not expressly granted to us; and why? No one knows better than my honorable friend that the law of the British Parliament is a branch of the common law of England; it is so defined in the books. That law is as much a part of the common law as any other—has always been so considered and so held. Had we no interest, at the time our Constitution was formed, in the common law of England? We adopted the whole of it. All the common law, as defined to the Constitution, then State becoming State independent governments—had recognized the common law as a part of the law of the land. All of it that was applicable to us, that was fitted to our position and Constitution, was adopted by us.

Under these circumstances, when our constitutions, and the people of the United States made the Constitution of the United States. They made bodies similar in form—similar in powers; not having the same extent of powers, because the same extent was not applicable or necessary; but they had the same kind of powers. It is not to be presumed that, when they instituted legislative bodies of this description, perfectly well known to the common law, which existed among themselves, so much of the parliamentary law as was the common law of this land, it being all common law in England, so much of it was applicable to our position and necessary for our purposes, was transferred as a matter of necessity and as a matter of common understanding to the bodies thus constituted? Why, sir, if I had any doubt on the subject, I would refer to the fact that it has been a matter of common construction and admission from the earliest days when we had legislative bodies in this country down to the present. The power has always been exercised when these bodies were independent of all others, and under the same law, this our Constitution, parliamentary law, so much of it being adopted as was necessary for our situation and condition.

The Senator objects, as I understand him—and others have objected in relation to this matter—that the Constitution confers only specific powers upon us. That is true; but did the Constitution do nothing more? When it made us a Congress—when it made us a Senate and House of Representatives, and left undefined powers that we might exercise in the future, it gave us no powers for which we were created—did it mean that we should have none of those powers, because it had not defined them? What did it do? It defined the matters upon which we could legislate. In that sense it defined our jurisdiction. It told what subjects we were to legislate upon, and it did not undertake to tell us the form and manner of proceeding by which we should accomplish the purposes of that legislation. Why? For the simple reason that there was an existing law on that subject, known to every citizen; and that was the common law with regard to bodies of this description; for the simple reason that it was impossible, in the nature of things, to make such a definition; because no specification in the Constitution could possibly reach all the cases in which it might be proper to exercise any of those powers known to the common law as parliamentary powers, and which were applicable to and necessary for our use.

Senators undertake to tell me that there are certain powers which we have that are necessary and essential, and that those are what are essential to our own existence as a body. They are not defined. They arise from the necessity of the case. If one arise from the necessity of the case, let me ask them why not another? Where will you draw the limit? Your argument fails, because by your own showing, you must go outside the point which you fix, and that is, the point of a specific designation of the powers which may be exercised. Certain powers are given. Under those we may act judiciously. But so far as it is necessary that we should exercise powers for our own protection, for the accomplishment of the purposes for which we were created, no one denies that we may exercise them. Can we exercise them in deference to be cleared? By what authority? By the authority of necessity, in some cases. If a disturbance is made in the galleries, can we not order the offender out? Certainly we can, and for the same reason. If we are attacked from the outside, and we take the offender into custody, no one doubts that.

Where, then, will you draw the line of distinction? You go outside of the Constitution. Where do you go? You go to the parliamentary law, which is recognized as part of the common law. Where will you stop? Stop, I say, just at that point where we have gone far enough to accomplish the purposes for which we were created; and these purposes are defined in the Constitution. What are they? The great purpose is legislation. There are some other things, but I speak of legislation as the principal purpose. Now, what do we propose to do here? We propose to legislate upon a given state of facts, perhaps, or under a given necessity. Well, sir, proposing to legislate, we want information. We have it not ourselves. It is not to be presumed that we know everything; and if anybody does presume it, it is a very great mistake, as we know by experience. We want information on certain subjects. How are we to get it? The Senator says, ask for it. I am ready to ask for it; but suppose the person whom we ask will not give it us; what then? Have we not power to compel him to come before us? Is this power, which has been exercised by Parliament, and by all legislative bodies down to the present day without dispute—the power to inquire into subjects upon which they are disposed to legislate—lost to us? Are we not in possession of it? Are we deprived of it simply because we hold our power here under a Constitution which defines what our duties are, and what we are called upon to do?

Congress have appointed committees after committees, time after time, to make inquiries on subjects of legislation. Had we not power to do it? Nobody questioned our authority to do it. We have given them authority to send for persons and papers during the recess. Nobody questioned our authority. We have not done so during the session, with power to send for persons and papers. Have we not that authority, if necessary to legislation? Who is to be the judge as to our duties necessary to legislation? Who is to be the judge of the necessity? Sir, Senators may say there is danger in it; they may object that we are judges in our own case. Well, we are judges for the good of the nation, for the good of the people. They have made us their Legislature; they have told us what to do; they have told us how far we may go with relation to us; they have said we must stop; but as to the mode by which we are to accomplish the great purposes for which we were created, and do the great things which we were appointed to do, they have left that to us—no undefined rule; not to wander over a space of which we know nothing; but go back to the common law, study the parliamentary law, and see what are the powers we have under that, and exercise them judiciously and well; and where is the danger? One body returns to its constituents every two years; the other body every six years. The people have power over us. There is no danger connected with it; we can do no harm; and, therefore, I say, sir, it is as well that we should rid ourselves of all these ideas that we are simply a body under a written Constitution, appointed simply to legislate and do certain other acts, and obliged, in the first place, to inquire every step we take, whether we have any one power which we may deem and may find absolutely essential in order to accomplish the purposes for which we were created. Sir, with regard to myself, all I have to inquire into is, whether I have any proper object, committed to me under the Constitution; and then, as to the mode of accomplishing it, I am ready to use judiciously, calmly, moderately, all the power which I believe is necessary and inherent, in order to do that which I am appointed to do; and, I take it, I violate no rights, either of the people generally or of the individual, by that course. The point that labored with me was nothing in relation to the question which I have been discussing; but whether we were not bound, in the first place, to legislate—a point suggested by my friend from Massachusetts. Certain powers are given to Congress, and also powers to pass all laws which are necessary to carry them into effect. The query is, whether we are bound to pass a law giving power to each body of the Congress, in the first place, to summon witnesses; and then, if they do not appear, to punish them as that law provides; and if it did occur to me, it was no trouble; but reflection has satisfied me that there is nothing in it after all. That clause was intended merely to meet the specific powers granted. We have power to raise an army and navy, establish a mint, and do many other things, for which there is specific power in the Constitution; and out of greater caution, having thus given us those powers over certain subjects, it says specifically that you shall have power to pass all laws necessary for carrying into effect these things. It did not assume to give us, over and over, the power of discharging our duties, the mode of getting at subjects, of acquiring information, if you please, of protecting ourselves against aggression, of preserving our own existence; I will say nothing of our own dignity, for, until we become careful of ourselves, we are not worthy of anything in relation to that matter. We have not been very careful of our own dignity, and therefore it is not worth while to talk much about it. But it is advisable, in my judgment, that we should protect ourselves and secure to ourselves—and that we may safely do so—these powers in relation to us in as a constitutional legislative body to effect the objects for which we were created.

Sir, I see no distinction in this respect between this body and the House of Representatives, though one is attempted to be drawn. "The common law have rather more power than the Lords; they are a great body of themselves, and may make inquiries which the Lords cannot make; but we are not Lords; we are simply one branch of the Congress of the United States, with nearly the same legislative powers except the suspension of revenue bills, and a little difference in regard to impeachments—one body impeaching and the other trying. Apart from these, we have power of initiating legislation. We must do the same things in the same way; and, from the consideration of our own dignity, and of our own power, we must have, in my judgment, the same powers.

Then I see no objection to the proceeding at all. I have examined the last answer which has been made by this gentleman to the question whether he is ready to testify, and it is substantially that: "I am ready to testify, if you will charge me from arrest, and allow me to come voluntarily as a citizen before you, on my own motion, and I will not object to it; but if you force me, and say that I must testify, and attempt to coerce me, under threat of imprisonment, I will not do so." The substance of his answer. Well, sir, I hold that to be no answer at all. He should have come originally on the summons—that certainly could not have hurt him—and have testified, and then he would not have been in this difficulty, and this question would not have been brought up.

I close as I began, by saying, that while I respect the principle upon which Mr. Hyatt acts, and his adhesion to it, and recognize at all times the power of all men brought to our bar, as to any other, to make a full defence, and place themselves under their own ground, yet we must exercise our power to protect ourselves; and, while doing it calmly, and moderately, and wisely, I think the citizens will not be injured if they have the same recognition of their duties that we have of ourselves.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am sorry to be under the necessity of troubling the Senate; and if either of my honorable friends who have addressed the Senate had expressed my views, I should refrain from adding a word to what they have said; but they can say it much better than I; but I differ with both—more widely with the Senator from Maine than with the Senator from Massachusetts. I must, however, do the Senator from Maine one credit: I think he has stated the precise grounds upon which we have got to act before we pass these resolutions, and that is, to get rid of the idea of our living under a written Constitution with certain restrictions. I think that is well put.

In the first place, what is it that you propose to do? You propose to sentence to imprisonment for life—because he may be imprisoned so long, by the tenor of your resolutions—a citizen of the United States, on a mere presumption of guilt. That is the whole of it. On the point of etiquette you propose to sentence a citizen of the United States to perpetual imprisonment; and to sustain me in that, I will read this answer:

In answer to the second question, the undisputed has been always ready to voluntarily appear, at any time and at any place, and before any committee of the House or Senate, and is now ready, upon his rights as a man and a citizen being respected in accordance with the people's bill of rights in the Constitution of his country."

Which bill of rights he has alluded to in the answer, to consist of the amendments to the Constitution; but he says he will not be forced there. In other words, he says, with a character in one of Shakespeare's plays, that if reasons were as plenty as blackberries he would not give them a consideration. That is exactly the point upon which he stands; and you say that you will not hear him voluntarily, but you will hear him by force; and because he comes here and offers to go voluntarily before you, and says he will not be dragged, and he says he will not be persecuted, and he says it is not the penitentiary, but the common jail of the city, which is a more filthy and disgusting place than the penitentiary. You propose to send him there for and during the term of his natural life, unless he reverses the ground on which he stands. That is what you propose to do; because, when I put the question to the honorable Senator from Virginia, he says the Senate is a perpetual body, and that this order runs forever, or until the man recants. I think you may search the history of this country, and you will find no precedent for such a proceeding in this country; at least, ever undertook to imprison a witness for contempt beyond the period of the session when the order was made. I may be mistaken in that, but I think I am not. I think that is the question.

The mistake that has labored in a great many minds labors in that of the honorable Senator from Maine, that we have all the powers—if not all the powers of the British Lords, at least a considerable portion of them, and that we inherit just as much of them as they; and that we are ourselves are to judge of the necessity. Now, sir, with all respect for that Senator—and I have as much respect for him as I have for any man whose mind has not been warped by a judicial education—I ask him if there ever was a despotism on earth that could define its position more satisfactorily than that? We have got all the powers that are necessary, and we have to judge of the necessity: If Louis Napoleon has more than that, I think he would be willing to give it up readily.

I think if there is any despotism on the face of the earth, that is certainly more powerful than any body would be willing to give it up at once, and it would not occasion any revolution at all. We have everything that is necessary, we ourselves being the judges!

The British House of Lords, from which we imbedded the idea of life and imprisonment, and put to death. We to-day only judge that it is necessary, for the vindication of our powers, to imprison a man for life. Our successors next year, or the year after, themselves being the judges—that is the doctrine, may think it necessary to put a man to death for the vindication of their privileges; and they, judging that it is necessary, and being themselves the ultimate and final judges, determine it, and that is an end of it. The Senate, not very long ago, since its existence, adjudged that it was necessary to punish a man for libel; they were named to do the grand inquest to accuse, and the witnesses to prove, and the jury to find guilty, and the court to pronounce judgment; and it is a part of our history that the Senate actually imprisoned a man once, not for any contempt, but for libel, and they were justified in the argument they were perfectly justified, because they thought it was necessary, and they were the judges of the necessity, and they executed it; and there you have it: quod erat demonstrandum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator, I presume, does not mean to misrepresent me.

Mr. HALE. No, I mean to put it plain, though.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see the Senator does not understand what I did say, and therefore I want to set him right. I said we had all the powers necessary to accomplish the purposes for which we are created, and within that limit we had the power to take the means to accomplish that end. Of what was necessary to accomplish that, we were judges. In the first instance, we certainly are. If the Senator has any point on any way in which that question can be settled, I should think very highly of his legal capacity.

Mr. HALE. Well, sir, I understood the Senator, but he did not understand me. I understood him perfectly. He says that within what is granted to us, we have the power to do everything that is necessary, and we are the judges of that necessity. I do not misstate him now, I know. Then, who is to judge what is granted to us? Are we not the judges of that? Here is the instrument before us. What is granted to us? Who is to say that? We, unless the Supreme Court of the United States sends a Dred Scott decision up to us; but in the first instance, until we are Dred Scotted, we are the judges of what is granted to us. I think that is the instrument of the honorable Senator from Maine; and I have stated it fairly. There are certain grants in the Constitution, and we are to judge what they are; and then we are to take what is necessary to carry them out, we being the judges, and we being the people of us. I put it to my honorable friend from Maine, that a more perfect despotism never was inaugurated since government was talked of. He did not mean it; but it was the legitimate consequence of what he said.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I mean just what I said. As to your oratorical consequences, I have nothing to do with them.

Mr. HALE. I like your pluck better than I do his pluck. The Senator says he will be obliged to me if I point out any other rule. I have one before me, and one perfectly applicable to this case, and it is in these words:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the States, nor prohibited by them to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

There is an all-sufficient talisman, before which every despotic power of necessity must crumble and fall. That is the magician's wand, which touches this tyrant's argument of necessity, and it reverts before the irresistible majesty of this constitutional prohibition on despotic power, found in this amendment of the Constitution.

Now let us go back a little. Mr. President, this is an important era in the history of this Government, and you are engaged in a contest in which you are bound to be beaten. This is one of those cases spoken of by the inspired penman, when he says, "one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight," because he stands on the avowed basis of constitutional liberty. He stands here to-day to vindicate that great inheritance of constitutional liberty, the birthright of an American citizen, purchased by the blood that has been shed on all the battle-fields of liberty away back in the sixteenth century. He stands here to-day, so that he says, you may imprison him; you may lock him up; you may make his bars and his bolts fast, and turn your key upon him; but I tell you the great habeas corpus of freemen, the ballot, will reverse your judgment, and pronounce sentence of condemnation, not on him, but on you; and the advocates of this power, though they may fortify themselves with the learning and the genius and the logic and the sophisms of my learned friend from Maine, cannot stand before the irresistible logic of every pleader every freeman's breath in this arbitrary exercise of despotic power. Yes, sir, we must indeed get rid of the idea of a written Constitution, before we can do any such thing.

There is another limitation besides that which I have referred to, and I put this ground; I stand upon it, and I call gentlemen to scan it, and see if it is not right: the whole scope and force and limit and extent of this power of necessity is well stated, both in Latin and English, in the argument of the learned counsel from Maine. I stand upon this argument to us on this power; and it is substantially this: that where any claim is made from necessity, it goes to this extent and no further; that if the power granted can be exercised without the thing claimed, then the necessity does not exist; but if the power granted cannot be exercised without the necessity claimed, then it does exist. That is the whole of it; and that is as far as any republican—and I do not use that word in any party sense, but in its broadest sense—any man that is in favor of popular liberty, will go. Whoever carries the doctrine of necessity any further than that, steps over the ground of the Constitution on to the ground of tyranny.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I wish to inquire, right there, whether that is a question of law or a question of fact?

Mr. HALE. What? Whether there is a necessity for it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes. Is that a question of law, or of fact?

Mr. HALE. Both combined; and it is a question that addresses itself to the common sense of mankind; but it is of very easy solution. It is to be strictly confined, and the amendment of the Constitution which I have read will help to construe it; that is, that all the powers not delegated are reserved to the States and the people respectively. Going on with that idea in view, that every power which is not conferred is reserved to the States, no difficulty will be found in your restriction. It is always to be construed most strongly against the Government, and in favor of the citizen. It is only to be resorted to in extreme cases, and the case that I put, and no other, is the only one in which I can see any such restriction. It is always to be construed most strongly against the Government, and in favor of the citizen. It is only to be resorted to in extreme cases, and the case that I put, and no other, is the only one in which I can see any such restriction. It is always to be construed most strongly against the Government, and in favor of the citizen. It is only to be resorted to in extreme cases, and the case that I put, and no other, is the only one in which I can see any such restriction.

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated."

What have you done? You have sent your warrant into the State of Massachusetts, without any accusation of crime, without any indictment; you have torn him from the protection of that sovereignty, and brought him to this; bar and before any of the forms of a trial such as the Constitution prescribes, you propose to sentence him to perpetual imprisonment. But, as I said when I was inquired of by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, let me go back. At the origin of the Constitution, there was no power on earth upon which to seize out of the protection of the Constitution into another. Now I am going back beyond the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Maine, either. The Senator from Massachusetts made a good argument on the ground he stands on, but he did not go back to first principles. He is incited a little with that heresy of necessity, in his argument; and it is strange to see how it seizes on some of the clearest minds in the land.

At the time of the formation of the Constitution, there was no earthly power that could take a man out of one State and carry him into another. Within the limits of that sovereignty where he stood, he could rightfully defy the exercise of any power that would carry him beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the State in which he lived. Then if there is any power existing any where on God's footstool to take one man out of the protection of any State sovereignty, and carry him elsewhere, it is to be found in the Constitution of the United States; and such an alarming power as that is not to follow as an incident or a necessity to the grant of some other power. I happen to live near the borders of a neighboring State, and I know something of the preferences and inconveniences of coming near to one another's line. I live within four miles of the State line. It is frequently the case that it becomes convenient to send over into the State of Maine, and under the provisions of the Constitution, get a prisoner over into New Hampshire to try him; and I want to be just and fair with the State of Maine, they sometimes find the necessity of sending over into New Hampshire. Under the provisions of the Constitution we get the prisoner, and he is not sent over. These cases are not frequent. Living near the line, I know it to be frequently the case that deprivations are committed, and parties go over into the other State. We have no sort of difficulty in getting the prisoner back, because there is an express grant in the Constitution of the United States that we shall have him; but we sometimes find it a very difficult matter to get witnesses. Why? Because, while the Constitution of the United States gives us the power to get criminals, it gives us no power to get witnesses, and sometimes it is of the utmost necessity to have witnesses come from Maine to testify in our courts, and sometimes some of their own citizens that have come over into our State and committed offenses. But the State is powerless; New Hampshire has no right to ask, and Maine has no right to give, under the Constitution, my such power; and what do we do? The prosecutor goes down and makes the very best bargain he can with the witnesses. He says, "if you will come, I will endeavor to accommodate you so that you shall stay as little time as possible, and we will pay you what will reasonably compensate you for your expenses and services." Does not that show—and I am almost ashamed to put a case so plain—that the Constitution confers no power to take a witness out of a State? There is no such power.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. How would it be, I ask my honorable friend from New Hampshire, on a trial for impeachment? Could we not summon witnesses from Massachusetts or any other State here to testify?

Mr. HALE. I will answer that in a minute. I see that my friend from Wisconsin has the same complaint that my friends from Massachusetts and Maine labor under—necessity. In the case of which I speak, I see the necessity of summoning witnesses; and it is very inconvenient, and sometimes prisoners fail of justice. Now, the honorable Senator puts the question—it is a pertinent question, and I am glad he put it, because it shows us that he is reversing the subject in his mind, and he may come out right, [laughter]—and we are not the power in case of impeachment? Look to the same book that prescribes trials for impeachment and these other trials. There is the same doctrine applied to the one as to the other, and the application of that doctrine. If you will find it written in this book, you can have it. This right does not apply in the case of impeachment any more than in the case of criminals; and it is no more necessary to impeach an unworthy member of the body of the people than to impeach a chief. There is a violation of law in both cases; but we sometimes have to let criminals go unwhipped of justice, because the Constitution gives no power to take witnesses from another State; and I am an officer that stands before this body, and I am unwhipped of justice, because there is no power to compel witnesses. You can issue your subpoena within this District, where you have exclusive jurisdiction, in cases of impeachment, and in the cases which are expressly confided to the jurisdiction of the Government. Beyond that you cannot go, because the Constitution has not given you the power to go, and says, in express terms, you shall not go. It may be necessary. How necessary? The Senator from Maine is not a just judge. No, sir; the Constitution judges.

You can exercise the power of impeachment without the power of compelling witnesses to appear from other States; and, inasmuch as you can exercise your power of impeachment without compelling witnesses, it will be convenient to compel the attendance of witnesses, because the Constitution gives you no such power. Practically, there would be no inconvenience. The patriotic sense of duty which renders in the breast of our citizens would induce them, upon a fair compensation, to come before the Senate and testify. I think that nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand would be glad of the opportunity to pay a visit to the Federal capital on such an occasion. [Laughter.] It is a difficulty, possibly, in the worst case, not the slightest; it is all imaginary; and this argument of necessity cannot be built up on any such supposition, because such a state of facts as that never has existed, nor probably never will exist.

Mr. President, it is true that we are done with this odious plea of necessity. Our fathers thought that they had exploded it, and exploded it altogether. Ours was the first attempt to define by written instrument, by grants, by limits, by restrictions, and by limitation, the exercise of power, and to preserve the individual rights of the citizen; and it is a departure from the spirit of the Constitution for us to break over these wholesome restraints, which the wisdom of our fathers imposed upon us, and then justify ourelves on the doctrine of necessity and the precedents of the British constitution and the British House of Lords and the idea that we are a court. Sir, if we could get rid of everything that has been brought into this discussion but what legitimately belongs to it, and that is the rights of this individual under the Constitution of the country and our rights over him, it strikes me there would be no difficulty. But, sir, you are about to take an alarming stride of power. You are about to take a stride of power of evil example in all time to come. You are about to take a stride that will awaken the jealousy of this people in every part of this land justly. It is the first time in the history of the Senate that the attempt has ever been made. I know it has been made, and it has been sustained in the House of Representatives. Sir, I will speak with no feelings but those of respect of the House of Representatives, because I entertain all the respect for them that a loyal citizen is bound to entertain; but it is no impeachment of their character to say that being the Representatives of the popular mind, coming, by frequent elections, fresh from the people, and filled with the impetuosity of that popular element of which they are the representatives, it is to be expected that they would not so carefully, so calmly, so considerately, and so judiciously weigh these great questions of constitutional liberty applicable to the persons of the citizens, as would be the more august tribunal which is here the representative of the sovereign States, its members holding their offices by a longer tenure, and independent of the breath of the popular will, for the very purpose that in the conscience and character of the body questions of this sort might receive a calmer and more deliberative and a more judicious consideration than they would in the other branch.

Sir, I know that I am spending my breath for naught. I suppose you will send that individual prisoner under a sentence of imprisonment in his crime, but I shall have vindicated myself in my crime, but my hands of it; and, with all the respect which is due to the body, I feel it my duty here to-day to denounce it as an act of despotism, not warranted by the Constitution, not called for by the exigencies of the case.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what I suppose to be the real question before us. I do not regard this matter as involving the question of the power of the Senate to summon a witness at all. I understand, by the report of the committee, as was brought before us for an alleged contempt, and two interrogatories were propounded to him by the Senate, in order that he might purge himself of that contempt; and the proper and appropriate question for us to-day is, to ascertain whether he has purged himself of the contempt, as we gave him the opportunity to do.

I find by the examination of his answer, that he has stated, as an excuse for not appearing as a witness, that he believed the act of the committee in issuing a subpoena to him was unconstitutional, and that, so believing, he could not conscientiously appear before the committee under the requirements of the summons; but in his second answer he says that, although he cannot conscientiously appear by virtue of the summons, he is willing to submit to the answer to the questions that may be put to him. That is the substance of it. He is willing to appear there, and that is all we have a right to ask him to do. If he violates any promises there, then there will be another question; but so far as the question now before the Senate is concerned, he was called to the bar of the Senate, by a resolution that I voted for, to answer as for a contempt; and interrogatories were propounded to him to give him an opportunity to purge himself of that contempt; and I say in all sincerity, that the honor and dignity of this body will be best promoted by consulting and respecting the conscience of a fellow-citizen. If a Friend was to come here, and our rules required him to take an oath instead of an affirmation, he would go to prison and rot there before he would take an oath, and the influence of his conscience. We are not the judge of whether men's consciences are right or wrong. We ought to respect them. I see no reason in the world to doubt the sincerity of that man.

Mr. MASON. One word only, if the Senator will allow me. The committee reported to the Senate, as a fact, that the witness failed and refused to appear. Now, when the Senator says he expresses himself that he has always been ready and willing to appear, it is in contradiction of the report of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that he said he was willing to appear voluntarily, and had always intended to appear, and had conscientiously acquiesced under the control of an order. That is what I understood to be his answer. Now, Mr. President, the question for me and for the Senate to decide is, has that man stated what is true under oath, or has he stated what was false under oath? The Senate of the Virginia Convention, by some twist of the language, he was uttering what was not true. I can see something in a man's countenance, and I can have some respect to the delicacy of his nerves. I believe that he has stated, truly and conscientiously, the very reason why he did not come; and the question for us is, is that a satisfactory excuse? I say that a witness can purge himself of contempt if he declares simply, what this man has declared, that he had no intentional disrespect to the committee or to the Senate in not coming. That purges him of contempt if he states it under oath. If contempt, as I understand it, is an intentional disrespect to the body that summons him; there is no doubt about that. If the man made a mistake, if he acted under improper advice, and states it under oath, he purges himself of contempt, and is not in any danger of being punished.

Men frequently have curious reasons. Here are learned Senators, learned in the law, disputing with each other about the power to do this very act; and do you suppose private citizens are better judges of the constitutional powers of this body than are courts? Whoever there is doubt, every rule of common sense and law would lean in favor of the citizen—lean in favor of the weak against the strong; and that is our duty. I have no more doubt that this man has stated the truth, than I have in saying that the State is at fault in the Senate; and he has sworn to it. The whole charge against him is, that he has treated the Senate's order with contempt, in not appearing before this committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do it with great deference; but I wish to suggest to him that, to make a contempt, according to the meaning of the word, it is not necessary that the person should be guilty of any disrespect, or intentional contempt, in any manner to show disrespect. Contempt is to deny the authority of the tribunal, and to refuse to obey it. The question is, whether he has done that, and is doing it at this moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The only question is, whether he denies our authority, and refuses to obey it? If so, he is guilty of contempt, if he is ever so respectful and ever so conscientious.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then there was no opportunity for him to purge himself of contempt by the questions we put to him. It was mockery to propound the questions we did to him, if he could not purge himself of the contempt by answering them. I know nothing about your definition of it; I do not care to talk about the definition for that, but I do care to say that, if you propound two questions to this man, and he answers them conscientiously, if they were such questions that he cannot escape contempt by answering them, they should not have been put to him. The act had been done before we called him here, and it is more fitting with a man's feelings to arraign him at the bar of the Senate under the idea that he can purge himself of the contempt, when the act was done two months ago, and he had refused to obey the authority before we called him here, than to say that he can escape the imprisonment, if that is the case, by the contempt, in to give his excuse for not doing it, and to state what he has done. Aside from these conscientious convictions, he is willing to go voluntarily before the committee. That is what he says.

Now, if he has stated what is not true—that in that respect, and suppose you do not believe him—suppose you believe he has, under the solemnity of an oath, stated what is not true: do you want his testimony hereafter? If you want him to go before the committee and to implicate others? If he has not stated the truth, he is not a fit witness to affect anybody's rights. If we did not intend that a truthful statement of his reasons should be an excuse for his not coming, when accompanied by an avowal of his readiness now to come, and should exempt him from the penalties of this contempt, we did not treat him fairly in propounding the questions to him. I know enough for that; I know that no citizen is to be brought to the bar of this body and have questions propounded to him, unless for some valuable end—unless for his personal security. He states that he believes this summons invaded his personal rights, and those of all his fellow-citizens, and that is the reason he would not obey it. There seem to be great doubts in the minds of Senators here, whether he is not right on that point. For myself, I do not choose to say anything that shall call the truth in question. I believe we have power, in certain cases, to summon a witness; nor do I believe that the course which I am suggesting would lower, in any degree, the rights of the Senate; but I believe this man has stated all that is necessary for us to excuse him. He has stated that he is willing, voluntarily, at any time, to come before this committee. I see no use in pursuing a man of that character any further. If I thought there was any prospect of bringing the Senate to proper action on it, I should offer an amendment, requesting the committee to advise the rights of my friend from Rhode Island, Sergeant-at-Arms to give him notice of it; and then let the committee examine him as a truthful witness.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have so long, Mr. President, been conscious of the purity and integrity of the Senate, and of those of all its fellow-citizens, that I differ from him with great reluctance on any question; but he seems to me, on this occasion, not to have bestowed his usual thought and reflection on the question before the Senate. I have no doubt that he is sincere, and I believe it is in matters of fact necessary to enable them to exercise most judiciously their powers of legislation. That is a proposition that cannot, I think, be successfully disputed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I believe the Senator could not have said that I did not intend to call in question that power.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I say that is a proposition which must be admitted. Well, sir, we, in the exercise of that discretion and that power, have instituted such investigation, and have received such reports, that we are willing to go and to obtain from them proper information of the facts; and that they might do this the better and more fully, we have given them the power of summoning witnesses before them. Is not this a very clear and unexceptionable course of conduct on our part, recognized by the general proceeding of legislative bodies, and of our own particularly? No one can deny it.

Upon the summons of the committee, a witness refuses to attend. What is to be done? We have the power to punish him, and we have the power to prosecute the inquiry; and we have authority to prosecute it by means of the ordinary process for obtaining the attendance of witnesses—one with which we are all perfectly familiar, if not in this body, in judicial tribunals, established and sustained by statute, and by solemn oaths. A witness refuses to attend. Is not that a contempt, in the language of the law? Whatever may be the state of the individual's feelings towards us personally, or as a body politic, has he not refused obedience to our authority? If he has, that is contempt in legal interpretation, in law, and without its being so considered, and without the party refusing such obedience being held amenable for it, no tribunal can exercise any of its authorities dependent on information. A court cannot, therefore, the court summons a witness. The Senate cannot. We have seen the course of proceeding. Is that a course of conduct that any gentleman can justify in a citizen of the United States? Law is our great rule here, and the constituted tribunals that are to exercise the powers of Government—legislative or judicial—all their proper authority, are to be obeyed; also there is an end to the Government proper limits.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....No. 70.

This one citizen upon his private understanding and his conscience, as it is called—and I know of no better depository for the most occult and inalienable deposit of a secret than what a man calls his conscience—in his individual person undertakes to set up a ground of opposition to the laws of his country, and to the constituted authorities of his country, and because that citizen by means of its appropriate tribunal, as in this case, attempts to enforce obedience to that law which all of us are bound to obey, the greatest sympathy is to be excited for the offender, and the Senate of the United States, by a member of its own body, is in most respectful terms to be denounced for its proceedings; and we hear of nothing but sympathy for this offending citizen who refuses obedience to the laws of the land, as adjudged by a tribunal, which, in this instance, is appointed to judge of it, and to the deliberate exercise of their authority we have no better plea than his own opinion that we have no such power. As we might as a citizen summoned to attend a court of justice make the same plea, where would the administration of law go to, if such anarchy as that could be set up by each individual who marches under the standard of an unknown conscience, and he could come triumphantly in opposition to the law and the constituted tribunals?

I am for no such liberty as that. That is not the liberty of the American citizen. It is obedience to the law, it is legality that constitutes the liberty of an American citizen—a much higher liberty than this wild sort of liberty dependent on every man's capricious whims which he shall do. His conscience does not determine the liberty of the citizen. The laws of the country determine what his duty as a citizen is, and we, in our proper place as magistrates of that common society, must judge of its duty, and he must yield obedience. That is my doctrine. It is no violation of liberty to force him to do the duty which the law requires of him. It is personally on his part rebellion to oppose it, resistance to public authority, resistance to law; and what ought the most just citizen of this land to answer to that than to say: "I think this law is an unwise and oppressive one; but it is the law of my country; and in my country nothing is to be obeyed but lawful authority; I therefore bow with submission to the majesty of the law, and reconcile my conscience and my opinions to my duty as a citizen." That is the course for him.

Yet the honorable Senator, my friend from New Hampshire, is thrown into transports on this subject; and he sees in the power to summon a witness, an unlawful, tremendous, and unfathomable power, which is its root and the whole liberty of the citizen; and for a man upon whom this terrible oppression and tyranny is imposed, he feels a sympathy that knows no bounds. Sir, the feelings which actuate the gentleman are very noble and commendable, and he has his proper application; but I think in this case, he has misjudged. I think there is no cause for his alarm about the liberties of his country. I think the individual—that I believe is the term which he has concluded is the one by which he is most properly to be described—has no particular claim to sympathy, except it be for that unfortunate contumacy and presumption to believe against the judgment of his country that his own conscience is right in a court of law. It is conscience against law; that is the law of the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. Will the honorable Senator allow me a single word?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Will the honorable Senator tell me, or the individual, or the Senate, or the country, or anybody, what law he is going to institute?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have been endeavoring to do that, in the absence of the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. No; I have heard every word you have said.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will endeavor to do it myself. I thought the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] had made this subject so definite, clear, and distinct, that he left nothing more to be said. You have certain enumerated powers given to you; for what purpose? This body and the House of Representatives are each constituted a distinct legislative body; and the mode of action, the mode of cooperation is left to ourselves, and has been regulated by ourselves from the beginning. Where do you find that rule? Do you look to your joint rules for it? Each body, in exercising the powers that belong to it peculiarly, in exercising power which it can exercise without any cooperation, must adopt its own mode of action. The Constitution has given the power; but it has prescribed no definite mode in which that power is to be exercised; cannot the power be exercised because the Constitution has not given you the mode in which it is to be exercised? The Constitution, then, is all a dead letter. It has given you the power; and because it has not given you the exact mode and form in which it is to be exercised in all particulars, it is rendered, according to the judgment of the Senator, altogether impotent and useless. The Constitution says, however, further, after giving the enumerated powers, all powers that are necessary and proper for carrying these specified powers into effect are hereby granted.

Mr. HALE. I beg pardon. There is no such clause in the Constitution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Power is given to pass laws for that purpose.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. You may pass all laws that are necessary and proper for carrying the enumerated powers into execution.

Mr. HALE. Exactly.

Mr. SUMNER. That, I understand, is the point here—that there is no law.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Where the power may be and ought to be exercised by law, it gives you the power of making laws; but it does not raise the question where the cooperation of the two branches is not necessary. There are some things that the Senate may do. How? According to a mode of its own. Are we to ask the other branch of the Legislature to concede by law to us the power of making laws, and if we say we are not willing? Has not each branch the right to make what inquiries and investigation it thinks proper to make for its own action? Undoubtedly. You say we must have a law for it. Can we have a law? Is it not, from the very nature of the case, incidental to you as a Senate, if you, as a Senate, have the power of instituting an inquiry and of proceeding with that inquiry? I have endeavored to show that we have that power. We have a right, in consequence of it, a necessary incidental power, to summon witnesses, if witnesses are necessary.

Do we require the concurrence of the other House to that? It is a power of our own. If you have a right to do the thing of your own motion, you must have all powers that are necessary to do it. The means of carrying into effect by law all the great powers of the Government are necessary, practicable and necessary; but there are subordinate matters, not amounting to laws; there are inquiries of the one House or the other House, which each House has a right to conduct; which each has, from the beginning, exercised the power to conduct; and each has, from the beginning, summoned witnesses. This has been the practice of the Government from the beginning; and if we have a right to summon the witness, all the rest follows as a matter of course. Cannot we make an inquiry that is not a law? I cannot see how we can institute the Senate of the United States to institute this inquiry? The Constitution has given us no right to institute this particular inquiry. Some say it has not, by any fair interpretation, given us the power. The Senate has no right to institute this inquiry. The Senate has a right to pursue the inquiry. The Senate has a right to pursue it by all the ordinary means employed for such an investigation. This is reasonable. This is the necessary consequence, it seems to me, of the inquiry that is made. I cannot see how this proceeding not only by that, but by the invariable practice of both branches of the Legislature.

I hope I shall always be as respectful and as sensitive to the rights of the citizen, and as careful for their preservation, as the Senator from New Hampshire, or any other member; but the rights of the citizen is not the only question; there are rights of others concerned, and we must feel for all; and especially we must consider what is our duty. You have summoned this witness in the ordinary course of your proceeding; and how does the witness attempt to exculpate himself? A witness who has refused obedience, in a court of justice, to the summons of that court, has to exculpate himself by showing some personal reason why he did not attend. Was it ever heard that a witness thus summoned in court undertook to go back to the original cause of action and say, "This man had no right to sue that man; there is no foundation for the suit at all?" Has he a right to go into the merits of the cause in which he was summoned as a witness, and make an apology for not attending, arising from the denier of one side or the other side? Was such a ground ever taken by a witness? That is the ground here. Our witness, instead of answering for his apparent neglect of the summons which he has received, turns upon us and becomes our accuser. He says to us: "You had no right to institute this inquiry; you had no right to summon me as a witness; now answer these charges; I propound to you this question, where is your authority; where do you put your finger on the authority in the Constitution which authorizes you to institute such an inquiry, or to subpoena a witness?" But he says on Mr. Mason and his committee, and tell them, if you choose, what your conscience will permit you freely and fairly, consistent with your rights as an American citizen, and the whole matter shall be amicably compromised."

If we were trespassing on this man's rights, I think I would be as free and as ready and as forward as any man to acknowledge it, and make him whatever recompense or atonement was proper; but I do not think that is the relation exactly which subsists between us and him. He may be pursuing the dictates of his conscience; I will not question it; but that ought not to turn us aside and cannot relieve us from our duties and our responsibilities, and ought not to change our course. We may regret that any man should be so bewildered by his conscience, as to think that is a sufficient excuse for him for disregarding the constituted authorities of his country and disobeying the laws of his country. Any other offense might be committed, and if this can be justified, that other crime and offense, and any other crime and offense, might be justified. If we have a right to institute this inquiry, we have a right to render the inquiry effectual by using the means that are indispensably necessary, and these are to summon witnesses. These are the indispensable means; and there being no statute law upon the subject, we having a right to institute the inquiry, we must judge of the means of doing it upon the very same principle that the powers of Congress are enlarged by granting to them all powers necessary to carry into effect the granted powers by law. If we have a right to institute the proceeding of its own rightfully and properly, it has a right to pursue it by the means necessary to accomplish the purpose.

It is in vain to admit the power of instituting this inquiry, unless you admit also the consequential power of carrying it out. It is not sufficient to say it is necessary for that purpose; and what if it brings a man from another State? I have always remarked, with great pleasure, that the Senator from New Hampshire has always expressed himself strongly and ardently in favor of the Union, and now, it seems to me, there is a man in the right ground of mine, with whom I have ever conversed, that goes by any means as far as the genteman does in his State-right doctrine. That one citizen shall be summoned out of the State in which he lives, even by the Congress of the United States, the common Government of all the States, seems to the gentleman a most offensive and oppressive proceeding.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator indulge me a single moment?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to remark that it is the dogma of the State-right school that the strictest construction of State-right is the most sure way to save the Union.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not think we ought to be offended, or our pride excited, that one citizen should be summoned out of his State by the common Government of the country. We have common subjects of inquiry; we have common subjects of interest; common subjects of legislation; and this is the great body that exercises a grand superintendence over the whole; and yet the gentleman thinks that the States are sacred from the touch of authority by this Government. What does it govern? Where is its authority? The District of Columbia? Will the gentleman reduce his argument to that, and say the Congress of the United States, the rulers of the whole country, have a right to summon a witness from the District of Columbia; but, as for touching the States, which were the great object and subject of all their powers, (and it is to take care of their welfare that we were instituted,) we cannot summon one of their inhabitants to come to Washington for a purpose useful and necessary for our legislation? What is the gentleman doing? He is annihilating the power in this particular over all the United States. We might, perhaps, go into a Territory and summon a witness from there. The gentleman has not expressed a definite opinion. What, that the District of Columbia, I believe, he gives over to our power. Our supreme power may range from one extent of this District to the other; but beyond that we cannot go. The boundary of a State is like that bourn which is never to be returned from.

Sir, it is evident that gentlemen have gone very inconsiderately, to say the least, into this matter; and that they have done so in a very unbecoming and a little indelicately manner. The gentleman for liberty on this occasion. Of all the means of the approach of despotism; I never yet was put on my guard against that hazardous exercise of authority which consisted in the issuing of a subpoena for a witness to appear before the court for liberty on this occasion. Of all the means of the approach of despotism; I never yet was put on my guard against that hazardous exercise of authority which consisted in the issuing of a subpoena for a witness to appear before the court for liberty on this occasion. Of all the means of the approach of despotism; I never yet was put on my guard against that hazardous exercise of authority which consisted in the issuing of a subpoena for a witness to appear before the court for liberty on this occasion.

I think upon the whole, Mr. President, however to be regretted that we should be involved in any such conflict, the proceedings here leave us no alternative but to stand up for the gentleman, reconsidering some what, will consider something of his duties, and will be better advised than to stand in contumacious opposition to the laws of his country any longer, and endure that prison to which he might be sent. I feel that I shall certainly, as far as my voice goes, feel it my solemn duty to impose upon him this punishment, and to keep it imposed upon him until he obey the law. That is our honorable course; that is our duty. The law must be obeyed by all; and I only desire that he shall be required to submit to that law which I feel bound to comply with, and which I feel that you and all of us are bound to comply with.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I conceive with the Senator from Kentucky almost everything he has said; but I do not think he has quite answered the suggestion that I made. I did not insist, nor do I believe that, upon reflection, he will insist that the only way out of this difficulty is, that the man must be obeyed by all. He says there is no justification for his refusal. Suppose there is none; our resolution did not call for a justification; it called for an excuse. We propounded to him the question: what was his excuse? That is a very different thing from a justification. Cannot we excuse a man when we think he may be out of the way, when we would not do as he does in the same circumstances? I certainly would not act as he has done; I would go before the committee very cheerfully, and no perhaps would every man who is in the Senate; but here is a man who has a conscientious view of this matter. It may be very ill founded, or it may be very well founded. My suggestion was, that inasmuch as he had declared under oath that he cannot conscientiously obey the summons, that that was his excuse for not obeying it, the Senate might accept it as an excuse, not as a justification, by any means; and I had drawn a little resolution in this form:

Whereas Thaddeus Hyatt has, by his ample answer to the first question, delivered in writing to the Senate on the 9th instant, excused himself from any intentional disobedience to the Senate or to its select committee; and by his answer he has manifested a conscientious refusal to appear before any committee of the Senate, has purported to the allegation of contempt;

Suppose an excuse would have been satisfactory, or we should not have asked him for his excuse. If we had asked him for a justification, I say he has given none, because there is no justification for a violation of law. That is my ground; I cannot understand, declared with a full account from a man of his temperance that we might not take from a man of the temperance of the honorable Senator from Kentucky or myself. I should take myself, individually, a very different excuse from a man who I believed had a very tender conscience, and a very considerable temperance, and that he reasoned in the way this man has reasoned, perhaps very satisfactorily to himself and to his counsel, but it is not satisfactory to me as a justification.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman read that again?

Mr. SIMMONS. Let it be read by the Secretary. There is a resolution coupled with it, putting him on the footing of other witnesses.

Mr. PRESIDENT. The Secretary read from Rhode Island proposed this as an amendment to the resolutions?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas Thaddeus Hyatt has, by his ample answer to the first question delivered in writing to the Senate on the 9th instant, excused himself from any intentional disobedience to the Senate, or to its select committee; and by his answer he has manifested a conscientious refusal to appear before any committee of the Senate, has purported to the allegation of contempt by his refusal to appear; Therefore,

Resolved, That Thaddeus Hyatt be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms, and be placed on the same footing as other witnesses who have appeared before the court before the expiration of the term of the session on the subject of the insurance at Harper's Ferry.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know the Senator from Kentucky will distinguish between a justification for his refusal to appear and an excuse for it. I have no manner of doubt myself, from the personal appearance of this individual, and from his elaborate argument, and the great pains he has taken to examine this question, that he is conscientiously opposed to submitting to the order made on him.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I know the word is excuse; but the question is, has he given me any excuse? It is an excuse, I cannot say, "you had no authority to summon me."

Mr. SIMMONS. I will tell you what the excuse is. He says he could not conscientiously come under your order.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not think that is new.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose a Friend, known as a Quaker, was to be called upon to do military duty, (we have both of us probably trained in companies sometimes when we were warned and forced to do duty,) these Friends have constitutional scruples; they cannot conscientiously do military duty.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If he would leave out the word "conscience," and say, "according to my religious opinions, I cannot obey," I cannot agree to adopt his excuse. If this gentleman would come and say, "my religion would not permit me to travel during Lent," I might respect that tenet of his religion. I might stare at the man and say, "if this is your motive, though I do not agree with your religious opinions, I will take it as an excuse."

Mr. PEARCE. I would like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. Does not the Senator know that this party has coupled the declaration of an irresolvable condition?

Mr. SIMMONS. What is that?

Mr. PEARCE. With a condition that the Senate shall recognize his constitutional rights; and he has declared, and ready to testify on the exercise of those rights that he claims, which we have declared impossible. Such a readiness to testify is not a readiness to testify at all. The Senate will not, to the day of doom, I take it, retract what we have already, by their own declaration, done in this matter. They will not declare that they have acted without constitutional authority—that they have invaded his constitutional rights—and that is what he requires us to do before he is willing to testify. When we do that, it is willing. The gentleman's refusal to stand, as I understand, because it is not consistent with the facts, in my view of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to keep up this sort of debate. I should like to have the attention of the Senate directed to a certain point. The resolution I have offered is, that he shall be put on a footing with any other witness. I do not propose to take any conditions from him. But what I am trying to get at is, the question of this man's conduct, and make it only a matter of record this witness to jail, it is not for refusing to answer any question; but because he is in contempt, notwithstanding his excuse. I would rather have a little broader basis for imprisoning a man. I believe myself that the Senate will be able to deal kindly with any individual, however wrong he may be; give him a chance, and put him upon the footing of all other witnesses. That does not excuse him from a further summons, and if he refused to obey that summons, we would have a fresh case before our view. Let us take that course without subjecting him to imprisonment for having refused to come before.

That is all I want to do. That is all I propose to do. I think he is disposed to make a candid and reasonable statement as he can. If the Senate think there is no excuse at all, certainly they will pursue him. I think we may overlook this simple mistake or misconduct of this witness, and give him a chance to try again. I dislike very much, however, that the Senate should be obliged to deal kindly with any individual, however wrong he may be; give him a chance, and put him upon the footing of all other witnesses. That does not excuse him from a further summons, and if he refused to obey that summons, we would have a fresh case before our view. Let us take that course without subjecting him to imprisonment for having refused to come before.

There are doubts about this matter. He certainly must have been misled, if it is clear as people think it is. He has two able counsel, it is said, who have argued the question, and really believe there is something wrong in this proceeding. I do not myself see it, but it does not follow that other people may not see it. I think we have a right to summon him here, and I so stated when he was up, so that the Senator from Kentucky should not be surprised. I do not know whether or not this man has made an excuse which we can accept, or whether we shall imprison him for not justifying his conduct, which we knew he could not justify when we called on him. I do not know whether or not this only question I intend to submit to the Senate.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, the authority which we are now proposing to exercise, and which has been claimed and exercised almost from the beginning of the Government, though doubtfully by many, is the authority under the Constitution, has yet been recognized in the statute law. Some three years ago, we were troubled with a contumacious witness in the other branch of Congress, and Congress then passed an act in which the Senate could punish a witness summoned before either House, or a committee of either House, to refuse to appear and testify. They provided for their indictment and punishment by fine and imprisonment. This act alone would seem to require that the witness should be summoned by either House of Congress; but it is recognized a little more explicitly in the part of the law in which it is provided that the penalties imposed by the act shall be cumulative; that they shall not accrue until the witness has refused to appear and testify before the passage of the act. To what penalty was he liable before the passage of the act? Clearly, none, except those which might be put upon him by either House in the exercise of its jurisdiction in punishing for a contempt. The language of the statute which subjects him to fine and imprisonment, after indictment and verdict found, leaves him liable still for the consequences of his contempt, as he was before the passage of that act. This is a legislative restriction, and, in the eyes of the right and authority of each House of Congress.

When the party was summoned in this case, he refused to obey. I do not know that he evaded the process, but, at all events, he did not obey. He was arrested, brought to this city, and then, upon the ordinary procedure being made in the Senate, two questions were propounded to him: one, what excuse he had for not obeying the summons of the Senate and the committee of the Senate? To that he refused, in a long argument, intended to show the unconstitutionality of all that the Senate had done. Does any Senator consider that an excuse? It would be, perhaps, if, after having entertained that opinion, and coming to a better sense of that matter, he had professed his readiness to testify, and had answered, accordingly, the second question which was propounded to him by the Chair. The second question was: "Are you now ready to appear before the committee and testify as required?" His answer was, that he has always been ready and willing to testify, if his constitutional rights are respected. Still, his condition is such with regard to his readiness to testify, and that is no readiness at all. What remains for us, then, but to pursue the ordinary course? We shall only do that which has been done before by our predecessors, and done, time out of mind, by the Commons of England, who are not only not content with merely committing the party to the custody of their Sergeant-at-Arms, but send him to Newgate, and that for refusing to testify in precisely such cases as this. Where Congress think it necessary to pursue an inquiry, to do so is their legislative authority, and there is a right to summon a witness according to the parliamentary law of England, which is our parliamentary law, where it is not contradicted by something in our institutions which makes it repugnant, or is not repeated by express law.

I cannot see that this party has excused himself by the answer which he has given; but his answer to the second question is, in fact, a denial. If I understand it properly, of his intention to appear before the committee. Perhaps it may be better to wait a decision. We will wait a decision. We decided upon our authority when we ordered this committee to be raised; we decided upon our authority when we directed these proceedings, and called upon him to answer these two questions; and we shall decide it a third time, which ought to be enough in all conscience, if we order him to jail for not answering. "Now he is not to be sent to jail forever, scilicet aeternum—not at all. The resolution of the Senator from Virginia provides that whenever he shall be ready and willing to testify and answer, he shall signify that fact, and be brought here for the purpose. If he does not, he remains in jail until the Presiding Officer of this House, whose duty it is made by the act of 1857, shall notify the fact to the district attorney, who will cause it to be presented to the grand jury, which we have already found, of course he will be released and put in the hands of the court before which he will be indicted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, when this matter was before the Senate on Friday, I, for one, felt and expressed some doubt about the constitutional power of the Senate to imprison a witness who should refuse to testify before the committee which was raised for purposes of legislation. I had just read the long, and I may say ingenious and a little argument of the counsel of Mr. Hyatt. I heard, too, the other day, my eloquent friend from New Hampshire, Mr. Chase, who was brought up in the school of State-rights republicanism, denouncing this proceeding as an invasion and infraction of the Constitution; and I confess that for the moment, in my own judgment, I was a little wavering. In the afternoon, however, I was called upon to consider and act on this question—I was staggered. I then stated that I was not prepared, on that occasion, to give my vote. I, for one, desired further time to consider the question, and I desired to hear it discussed by the able and able Senator from New York, who, on reflection, arrived at the conclusion that the power does exist in the Senate to compel the at-tendence of witnesses for legislative purposes; and, if it can compel their attendance, to compel them to testify; and I will briefly state, without going into an argument, the grounds upon which I have arrived at this conclusion.

The honorable friend from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] does not deny the power to summon witnesses and to compel them to testify; but he bases his proposition on the ground that this witness has excused himself for not appearing before the committee and testifying, in obedience to the summons of my judgment, the Senator from Rhode Island is wrong. The witness says, in effect, "I will go before the committee and testify upon condition that the Senate will renounce the power to compel me to testify." So far as this particular witness is concerned, perhaps it is not of any very great consequence; but suppose this committee, to-morrow, should resolve to summon the late Governor of Virginia, Mr. Wm. on the ground that he may have in his possession, or may have obtained, some important information, and it is said that he has lately declared in a public speech that rubies could not induce him to disclose the knowledge that he has acquired in reference to this transaction: if we to-day renounce the power of the Senate to compel the attendance of witnesses, it would be idle for us to undertake to do so in any other case. In other words, we decline to come. Therefore the case is important. If we have power to summon the witness and to compel him to testify, he must testify without our saying to him that we renounce the power to call him and to compel him to give his testimony. If he desires to change his answer, and say that he is now ready to go before the committee and testify unconditionally and without any conditions attached that the Senate are to renounce their power," then I must listen to a proposition of this kind. If I do not question the honesty or the sincerity of the witness, or of the individual himself, in this argument which has been presented here, denying the power of the Senate to summon a witness to testify.

Mr. President, a single word in relation to the argument of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, and my honorable friend from New Hampshire. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts concedes that there are five cases in which we have the power to summon witnesses, and compel their attendance; and, of necessity, to compel them to testify. One is, in the case of impeachment; another, for the trial of an impeachment; another, when we judge of the qualifications and elections of members of this body; and a third, when we judge of the disorderly behavior or conduct of any member of this body, with a view to his expulsion. He says, the power in these three cases is given by the Constitution; because we, having imposed upon us the duty and responsibility of trying the facts of the case in these instances, must of necessity be clothed with the power to bring the facts to the knowledge of the Senate, and that, of necessity, includes the power to bring and compel the attendance of witnesses. So, too, upon two other cases, which he says go to the existence of the body itself, and are necessary for our self-defense. I shall not speak of this Harper's Ferry case, which was carried out of the country, but to have been inaugurated on the part of Brown, it was an attempt to subvert the very existence of every department of the Government. It was a treasonable conspiracy got up in Canada, outside of the United States, with a constitution for a provisional government of the United States, which John Brown was to command-in-chief—going to the very existence of the Government, and every department of it.

But, Mr. President, I do not base the power in these cases upon the grounds which I have stated. At any time upon which I have stated, whether it is necessary for the purposes of legislation to call witnesses and take their testimony. I have given my thoughts to that, and I am satisfied that there are cases which even the honorable friend from New York [Mr. Chase] has admitted, I must concede to be cases of necessity for the taking of testimony for legislative purposes. Suppose there is a claim presented against the United States of $50,000, and we are called upon in our legislative capacity to vote for it or vote against it; it is not absolutely necessary for us to ascertain the amount; and how can we ascertain the amount without taking the testimony of witnesses?

We must refer it to a committee, summon witnesses, bring them before the committee, take their testimony. How is it if you desire to pass legislation for the purpose of preventing frauds upon your revenue laws? It may be necessary for you to summon witnesses from the great mass of emigrants of the United States—from New Orleans, New York, and Boston—to call witnesses before a committee, for the purpose of ascertaining the precise manner in which these frauds are committed, so that you may be prepared, in your legislative enactments, to make the amendments which are necessary to put an end to them.

Mr. President, I maintain that the Senate of the United States, which, by the Constitution, is clothed with one branch of the legislative power of this Government, is clothed by the Constitution itself with all the power which is necessary to discharge its duty as one branch of Congress; and it being necessary in some cases, for legislative purposes, to call witnesses, it belongs to Congress to judge of that necessity. There is no one else to judge. It is not in the exercise of a despotic power or arbitrary power, but, as the representatives of the sovereign States of this country, acting, not for ourselves, but acting for the States and the whole people of the country, are called upon to act in our official capacity, and to judge of the propriety of the testimony which is called, precisely as much as a court in its capacity is called upon to judge and determine whether a given witness is or is not necessary to be called into court for the adjudication of the case in hand.

Mr. President, it therefore being necessary, in some cases, for Congress to take testimony, it is for each branch of Congress to judge for itself when it is necessary that that testimony should be submitted to it. It is a question of fact, not a question of law. It is a question resting in discretion—that discretion being wisely exercised, as increased by the exercise upon their official responsibility and their official oaths; and no feeling of sympathy on the one hand, and no threats of bringing down popular indignation upon the other, should deter or drive a Senator the duty of one branch of Congress to take testimony. It is his sworn duty, his constitutional duty, and if the Constitution has given us the power, and clothed us with the responsibility, it is a duty from which we cannot shrink if we would.

I know my honorable friend from New Hampshire says that he is prepared to come here to bring a witness from another State. Why, Mr. President, that comes back to the question of power. If we have power to summon a witness at all, we have the power under the Constitution, and that power is co-extensive with the Constitution; it covers our whole territorial jurisdiction from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf. There is no limit put upon it. It is a simple question, whether we have the power under the Constitution, and that is the only question which is involved in the matter.

Mr. President, after giving this subject some pretty careful attention since the last adjournment, I have come to the conclusion, and am satisfied, that this power of calling witnesses for the purpose of giving testimony to a legislative body, and the power of compelling them to testify, is a power which is exercised, I believe, by each branch of every State Legislature within the United States. I do not know a State where it is not or has not been exercised. I therefore say, frankly, that the doubts which I felt, and which I expressed at the time of our last adjournment, have, on further consideration, been entirely removed. I was perfectly free to express them then, for I felt them. I have none of that pride of consistency or of opinion which, when I doubt my own opinion, prevents me from changing it at any time when I feel a reason can be given.

For the reason I have stated, I shall insist upon the exercise of this power by the Senate; though witnesses may say they cannot conscientiously give their testimony when the Senate of the United States is exercising this power, it is necessary. I cannot conscientiously say that a witness shall be discharged for such a reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have only one word to say in reference to this witness's answer. I did not understand the answer to be coupled with any condition, and I do not understand it readily understood was there without the condition. I supposed that no committee of this House would think of interfering with the constitutional rights of a witness, and it did not take anything from his willingness to answer that he put that in, and I have suggested this method to get rid of imprisoning this man—a disagreeable task.

If my suggestion does not meet with any favor, if people think it is necessary in order to preserve the dignity of the position of the witness, and to imprison this man, I shall not press it. I believe it would be better for us to discharge the man, and to accept his excuse for his first act than that we think wrong, and place him on the footing of all other witnesses, and then proceed anew with him. That would be my way. I dislike to take a man and punish him for a thing that I think he did not do with any malicious intent; but he has acted under advice, not hastily. Besides, to decide in our own case between a question of dignity on the one side and of contempt on the other, and shut a man up—I have great dread of exercising so severe a power. I dislike it. I have made a suggestion of what I think the proper course, but I will withdraw the suggestion if Senators think it is going to give up any principle or yield any power. I should be very glad to have the man excused; but I withdraw the proposition, as it does not seem to strike others as it does me. I am excited at the prospect I believed in the power. The man has made an error that satisfies me; at any rate, that is an excuse.

Mr. DAVIS. Whilst I am ready to admit that this debate has been interesting and, if you please, instructive, I think this very little relation to the subject before us. The Senator from New Hampshire, in his new-born zeal for State rights, has explained to us what I cannot see the application of, the doctrine of State rights, and seeks to apply it in the case of a contentious witness. Of the rights of the States, he apparently has a very great confusion of ideas in his mind when they are extended to covering a witness, or any other person who is responsible under the law to the penalties which he has incurred. The Government of the United States cannot be held by States as its agent, and clothed with certain powers, possesses these powers fully. It is no invasion of the right of a State for the Federal Government to exercise any of the powers with which the States have invested it, and it is a strange confusion of terms to speak of the right of a State as involved in the summoning of a witness, and compelling his attendance for purposes which are within the scope of the Federal Government.

But, again, we are constantly presented with an argument that the witness is a witness from his State, and compelling him to answer before a committee, when he is ready to answer voluntarily; and all this is without any reference to the facts of the case. This witness came here under summons, remained here for weeks, put off the committee from time to time with reasons and excuses which finally seemed to be mere pretexts for delay, and when notified that he must testify on a particular day and hour, he then absconded; and the whole necessity of his coming here, and another State was on account of his absconding from this District when notified that the committee would wait no longer under his frivolous pretences, but would require him to come and answer. If the witness had been present before the committee as other witnesses did, and enter his protest, and then proceed to answer, he would have enjoyed all the privilege which seems to be now asserted for him, and no question would have been presented to the Senate. The Senator, however, raised a committee, invested it with power to send for persons and papers, and they have exercised that power. One witness refuses to testify. The committee have reported it to the Senate. The Senate have taken its action in accordance with its original order, investing that committee with power to send for persons and papers; and now fanciful pleas are set up for human right, for liberty—humanitarianism at last is interposed. The Senator from Rhode Island really do not know how to handle a witness, and refers to the countenance of the witness as sufficient to satisfy him, against the face of the record which the committee kept, and the report which the committee made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said it satisfied me that he acted conscientiously; I said it satisfied me not conscientiously answer. I made no reflection on the committee whatever. I believe that, in anything I have said, I have declared that I voted for all the propositions of the committee, and thought them to be the more proper matter of excuse I was giving him the benefit of.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Rhode Island, in his vast experience and good judgment, must see how shallow the plea is, when a witness is called to testify, if his testimony is material, and should say his conscience was too tender to tell the truth. What criminal, or what man who had been in a conspiracy, criminal in all its ends and aims, would not abet his fellow, when summoned before a committee to testify, if his testimony was material, at the last hour, when striped in crime and treason, might plead against the right of a committee to know from him the truth? It must be a matter of very great indifference to Senators on this side whether the committee require the witness to testify or not. I am sure, so far as any member of the committee is concerned, I can say that, if the Senate think proper to withdraw from the committee the power they have conferred upon it to send for persons and papers, I shall consent to discharge the duties devolved on me without that power, as far as I may; and the Senate will be responsible, and those who take such a position will be responsible, for hiding a base conspiracy, a portion of which is known to the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island having been withdrawn, the question is on the resolutions of the Senator from Virginia, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. President, the duty devolved on me, as the organ of this committee, to vindicate the power of the Senate, which the committee has invoked, has been so far better discharged by honorable Senators around me, than I could have done. I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

could find. It is a declaration that he resists the power because he believes that it cannot be exercised without being subversive of freedom and liberty, and so forth.

Now to the second question. The second question was, whether he is now ready to appear before the committee and answer such proper questions as may be put to him; and what is the answer?

"The undersigned has been always ready to voluntarily appear at any time and at any place and under any circumstances at the honorable Senate, and is now ready, upon his oath as a man and a citizen, to answer respecting his conduct with the people's bill of rights in the Constitution of his country." &c.

The substance of that is, that he is ready to appear voluntarily. Why he is not here? The first action of the committee, in all cases, of course is a summons to the witness, which is an official request that he appear. Why did he not voluntarily appear, then? There was no coercion. The committee have reported that he did not, and I assume that fact. If I were to go out here, that, it would appear by the handwriting of this witness that he came in Washington on the 1st of February; remained here until the 21st; never did come to the committee-room; kept away on various pretexts; and it is now reported that he was written to him to appear at a given day, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi says, he absconded. That is the fact; and then the committee reported that he had failed and refused to appear. Now, I take the report of the committee to be true.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire has had some difficulty in individualizing this man. He is at a loss to know what to call him, whether a criminal, or a prisoner, or an individual; but would seem to imply that he was brought here criminal, and entitled to the sympathy of the country. Mr. President, there is not a citizen in this broad land, North or South, East or West, who will not respond to this declaration in the American Senate, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

I could not doubt the power of the Senate to vindicate its authority, and I am very much obliged to me, and to add nothing to their argument, but the Senator from Vermont, at a former stage of this discussion, and the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky, in the course of to-day.

until at the present they occupy only a limited reservation of a few thousand acres, and are reduced to the greatest extremity.

In 1854 a treaty was made under which they received more than $200,000. Of that money some forty thousand dollars was paid to Richard W. Thompson, of Indiana, and that is one of the matters these Indians want inquired into. They allege that the money was paid without any authority on their part, and they want to know by whose authority it was paid. This is one of the matters which this resolution contemplates shall be inquired into, and which, as I understand, the Secretary of the Interior does not propose to investigate at all. The payment of this money was arrested by the former Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Commissioner Manypenny, until this Administration came into power. But after the State of Indiana had been carried by the Democratic party, in 1856, and immediately after this Administration came into power, $40,000 of the money of the Menominee Indians was taken and paid to Mr. Thompson. This is all the explanation I have to make, and I now call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LARRABEE. I ask my colleague to withdraw his demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a question of order. Has that resolution been adopted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late now to make objection. The resolution was read and debate has ensued without interruption. The Chair thinks the proposition has been received by the consent of the House.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to make an interruption instantly, but I never like to interrupt a gentleman in his remarks, if I can avoid it. If my objection is not in time, therefore, it is for that reason.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rose and objected to the reception of the resolution at this time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Colonel Hickey, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he asked the concurrence of the House:

1. An act (No. 358) to grant to the parish of Point Coupee, Louisiana, certain tracts of land in said parish;

2. An act (No. 360) for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. O'Brien, late of the United States Army;

3. An act (No. 73) for the relief of Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of the late Brevet Major General Persifer F. Smith; Mrs. Harriet B. Macomb, widow of Major General Alexander Macomb; and Mrs. Anabelle Riley, widow of Brevet Major General Benoit Riley.

Also, that the Senate have ordered to be printed the following documents:

Message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information concerning alleged hostilities existing on the Rio Grande between the citizens of Texas and the authorities of Mexico.

MEMORIALS—INDIANS—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw my demand for the previous question, to allow my colleague to be heard, still retaining the floor.

Mr. LARRABEE. I would like to request my colleague to permit an amendment to be offered to his resolution, or to agree that the matter may lie over for a day, in order to obtain from the Secretary of the Interior the correspondence which has taken place upon this subject. I certainly do not understand the facts to be as my colleague states them. I do not understand that there is any complaint which should authorize this House to institute an investigation by a committee of five persons, with power to hire for persons and rappers to the State of Wisconsin, at the great expense which will necessarily be involved.

But, sir, I will state to the House what I understand to be the facts, so far as I have been informed upon the subject, for I think it is not the wish of my colleague, or of members upon either side, to incur the expense that will result from raising a committee of this character, unless there are good grounds for such action upon the part of the House.

I was informed, when recently in Wisconsin, that a person by the name of Kershaw, who claimed to have some connection with this Indian tribe, had come to Washington, in direct contravention of the orders of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, with a deputation of these Menominee Indians; that this person had procured the passage, through the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, of a memorial to Congress making charges against this Government or its agents. That memorial was passed through both Houses in one day, without the facts upon which it was based having been discussed by any one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I only desire that the House shall act upon this subject understandingly. I am not a member of this committee, but the measure is introduced by the House, if the facts are such as to warrant it.

When I returned from Wisconsin, I found the Senators from my State, with my colleagues in this House, had been to the Interior Department with this memorial, and that a correspondence had taken place between the Secretary of the Interior and themselves upon this subject.

It appeared that a name was suggested by my colleagues to the Secretary of the Interior, as a commissioner to make this investigation. I was asked by the Secretary whether I thought he was a proper person. I replied, that I knew about him was, that he was the late law, banking, and business partner of my colleague, (Mr. Woodman); and that a memorial had been sent the Wisconsin Legislature of Wisconsin by a party vote, and without debate; and as this man, Kershaw, had come here with these Indians without permission; and as my colleague had made these charges before the Secretary of the Interior without consultation with myself, and had suggested the late law and business partner of my colleague as commissioner, before whom the investigation was to be instituted, I thought he had better select some one who had no connection with the matter, or with my colleague, and was entirely unprejudiced upon the subject. The Secretary yielded to my objection; and he suggested the name of a distinguished gentleman from our own State, and submitted it to the rest of my colleagues. They objected to him because he was a Democrat, and they suggested the substitution of a Republican. The Secretary said to me, "If you are going to bring up this question of Democrat and Republican, it is your matter. I only desire to ascertain the truth of this investigation, and I suspect that was your wish. You object to Colonel Robinson because he is a Democrat. I cannot enter into such a question. I must, under the circumstances, select the best man I have in my Department, and send him out to investigate these charges." I have been informed, sir, by the Secretary of the Interior, that he has selected Mr. Pritchett, a competent gentleman, a man of integrity, and one who is familiar with all the duties of the Indian bureau.

That gentleman has proceeded, or is about proceeding, to Wisconsin, for the purpose of investigating these identical charges.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit to the House whether there is good ground, whether there is ground to go before us upon which to raise a special committee, involving, as it necessarily will, great expense in the necessity of sending out to Wisconsin for persons and papers, in order to investigate the truth or falsity of the charges made by my colleague? I have no reason why my colleague should have withdrawn his charges before the Secretary of the Interior, unless he and his friends were disappointed in not procuring the appointment of the person suggested by them. They could have justly expected that Mr. Robinson, for he is a gentleman of distinction in this House, a leading man of high integrity and fine ability. The Republicans, even, speak well of him. Indeed, sir, no man could whisper a word against his capacity or his integrity. Why my colleague objected to him does not appear. I do not believe he was for any other reason. Yet, sir, there should be no question of politics in such a case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me, I will ask him a question. Will Mr. LARRABEE. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. Pritchett is a Democrat?

Mr. LARRABEE. I do not know whether he is or is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is he not in office here?

Mr. LARRABEE. I presume, sir, that he is; I think that he is in the Indian Office. He is a man familiar with all the duties of the position which has been conferred upon him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would it not have been fair to have appointed a man from each side?

Mr. LARRABEE. No, sir; it is no political question. This, Mr. Speaker, is an investigation to be made on the part of the Secretary of the Interior. One of the officers in his Department has been charged with malfeasance in office, and it was for the purpose of the House to conduct an investigation into the matter.

I objected to Mr. Woodman; and why? Simply because of the business connection of my colleague, and because, from that fact, he would more or less be under his control. There was no other reason. Mr. Woodman is a Democrat, and not a Republican. The whole matter seemed to be a family affair. When the question was submitted to me as between Judge Howe, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Woodman, I thought I should have then selected that he could safely choose either of them. It is true, sir, that they are Republicans; but they are good men and true, so far as I know; and I have objected to no man on account of his politics. The Democrats are the parties who have done it. The Secretary said to me on the other side, my colleague did not want a Democrat appointed; and that, consequently, he had already selected a man from his own Department, who was familiar with all the duties and ramifications of the Indian bureau, and who would make a fair and honorable investigation into the matter. As the charge involved the integrity of an officer in my Department, he should sift the matter to the bottom. I have entire faith that the investigation will be conducted fairly and honestly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if my colleague whether there is or is not ground for the adoption of the resolution before the House, and the raising of a special committee, with power conferred upon it to send for persons and papers? Is it the duty of my colleagues to resist the investigation ordered by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, one word in reply to what my colleague has said. I will first state under what circumstances this matter was brought up to my attention. The man, Kershaw, of whom my colleague speaks, came to me accredited from the Governor of the State of Wisconsin, bringing a letter to me from that officer, and bringing also a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin. He accompanied these Indians as their agent. He did not call upon my colleague, I presume, because, at the time, I understood he had gone to the State of Wisconsin to attend the Democratic convention, and the report was that he went to get elected to the Charleston convention, in which, I believe, he was.

Mr. LARRABEE. I did not hear what my colleague has stated, and I ask him to repeat his last sentence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I think that my colleague must call upon my colleague, because he was at the time absent in Wisconsin, attending at the city of Madison a Democratic convention, and endeavoring to get elected as a delegate to the Charleston convention.

Mr. LARRABEE. I was absent, that is true; but the last assertion is false.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have made no assertion, but stated my understanding merely, and what the report was. It was a false report, injurious to the gentleman.

Mr. LARRABEE. That latter statement is simply false; that is all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have stated what the report was, without vouching for its truth or falsity, as I personally know nothing about it in this case.

Mr. LARRABEE. Then my colleague had better not have made the statement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have merely alluded to the statements in the newspapers, which were my colleague had made, and which was his purpose. It is an immaterial matter, however, and of little consequence. I believe that the gentleman was a candidate for Charleston, and that he did not get elected. So much for that matter, and I will leave Mr. Kershaw's calling upon my other colleagues, and not on him.

Mr. SPEAKER, we thought it fair and right that these Indians should have a word to say for themselves, or that they should be heard by their friends, as to the gentleman to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The word in regard to the gentleman first named, Mr. Woodman, who my colleague alleges was formerly a business partner of mine. It is true, sir, as I have already said, that five years ago I was a business partner of mine, but he has had no business connection with me since that time. We do not reside within one hundred and fifty miles of each other. I have never had any communication with him on the subject. Knowing his eminent fitness for the position; knowing that he was, although a Democrat, not a partisan, and believing that what report he would make would be received with full faith and credit, we recommended him. My colleague objected to him; and then we said, appoint Judge Howe, or Mr. Baker, or Mr. Barbour, either of whom would be acceptable. The Secretary of the Interior had the appointment of one or more persons, and we thought that the interests of all the parties concerned would be safe, even if a Republican was selected upon the commission. The Secretary of the Interior actually refused to go into such an investigation, not contemplating, as I understand, the investigation into the $40,000 that was paid to Richard W. Thompson. We were compelled, therefore, to bring the matter to the attention of this House. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a point of order. I understand the Speaker to decide that my objection to the introduction of the resolution comes too late, and that the resolution is now before the House by unanimous consent. I raise the point of order, therefore, that, under the rules, the resolution must lie over one day, because it proposes to give this committee power to report at any time. Under the 133d rule of the House, no rule can be rescinded without giving notice. Here is a proposition to rescind a rule of the House, in giving to a committee of the House power to report at any time. My point is, that a proposition to give power to a committee thus to report is an alteration of the rules, and that it must lie over one day.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, it has been the practice of the House to do what I now urge on a point of order. I have seen, time and again, propositions that I proposed to be laid on the table to report at any time ruled out of order by the Speaker, except on a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. As an original question, the point would be a good one; but the Chair conceives that unanimous consent has been given to the introduction of the resolution as it now stands, and that it is too late to make objection.

Mr. BRANCH. Unanimous consent was only given for the introduction of the resolution. My point of order is, that the resolution being legitimate before the House, the rule of the House shall lie over one day for consideration. My point does not go to the reception of the resolution; but that the resolution, under the decision of the Speaker, being legitimately before the House, it must, under the rules of the House, lie over one day for consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from North Carolina must know that it has been the constant practice, in resolutions of this character, to propose that the committee shall have no report to any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution, as it stands, is fairly before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLORENCE. At the time, sir, I expressly stated that unless the resolution was changed in its terms as I suggested, and for the reasons stated, I should object. I made objection, under those circumstances, at the moment the resolution was offered. I suggested, however, that in the mean time the gentleman from Wisconsin might state briefly what was the nature of the resolution, and the purpose that was sought to be accomplished by it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that when a question is allowed to be discussed before the House, it is then too late to object to its reception.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not take exception to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Is discussion in order when I have called for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. My understanding was that the resolution was read for information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Oh, no, Mr. HOUSTON. But if the Chair decides that the resolution is before the House, inasmuch as it proposes to change one of the rules of the House, a two-thirds vote will be necessary to pass it. Although it was not in order to offer the resolution, two thirds of the House might have suspended the rules and let it in; but as the Chair decided to do so, the House upon the reading of it for information, then, if the House proposes to pass it now, a two-thirds vote will be required, because there is a rule which will not allow it to pass unless by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. FLORENCE. The Chair supposes that it will take a two-thirds vote to pass the resolution. The question is upon suspending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LARABEE. I hope my colleague will allow me to say over what we can get the correspondence upon this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I cannot. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. BRANCH called for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 113, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Green Adams, Adams, Aldrich, Allen, Wilkes, Ames, Ashley, Babcock, Benjamin, Blair, Bland, Brewster, Burdick, Burlingame, Burnham, Burrows, Campbell, Canby, Carter, Chase, Coffey, Conkling, Corwin, Cresswell, Davidson, Davis, De la Motte, Edwards, Edwards, Delano, Dwell, Dunn, Egerton, Elliot, Gibson, Edwards, Gerry, Foster, Frank, Fretwell, Gilmer, Jones, Graham, Hendricks, Hale, Hall, Hamilton, J. Morton, Kellogg, Hinton, Hiram, Hickman, Holt, Howard, Hoffman, Howell, Francis, Johnson, Kellogg, Wilson, Keating, Kilgore, Killinger, De Witt C. Leach, Lee, Loomis, Lovejoy, Manning, Maynard, McKenney, McKnight, McPhee, Miller, Mitchell, Moore, Nelson, Olin, Perry, Porter, Potter, Pease, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Royce, Schwartz, Sargent, Schuyler, Sherman, Williams, H. Smith, Jones, Foster, Stanton, Stokes, Stuart, Stratton, Tappan, Thayer, Thompson, Tinsley, Trumbull, Vandever, Van Wyck, Verree, Wheeler, Williams, C. W. Adams, C. W. Adams, J. W. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Webster, Wells, Wilson, Wood, Woodruff.

NAYS—Messrs. Thomas L. Anderson, Barkdole, Bar, Benjamin, Bosbury, Branch, Brown, Burdick, Chapin, Chittenden, Cochran, Cogges, Crawford, Farris, Garrett, Davis, De la Motte, Edmondson, Florence, Fisk, Garrison, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hindman, Houston, Howard, Hughes, Jones, Landrum, Larrabee, Leake, Logan, Love, McClary, Charles D. Martin, Albert S. Martin, McQuinn, McClelland, McClure, Miles, Montgomery, Niblack, Neill, Pendleton, Peyton, Pryor, Pugh, Reade, Riggs, James C. Robinson, Rufin, Scott, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, Underwood, V. A. S. Vannoy, Vance, Whitely, Woodward.

So the resolution was not passed, (two thirds not voting in favor thereof.)

During the call,

Mr. LEAKE said: I do not want to vote for the preamble, though I can vote for the resolution.

Mr. LEAKE. The vote upon the preamble will be taken after this vote is decided, which is upon the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS stated that he was paired off with Mr. CLEMENT for some days.

Mr. DAWES stated that he had paired off with his colleague upon the Committee on Enrollment. Mr. THEASER.

Mr. FRANK stated that Mr. LAYNE was paired off with Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, until Wednesday.

Mr. LONGNECKER stated that he had paired off with Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, for to-day and to-morrow.

Mr. LEAKE said: I stated, a short time since, that I did not vote for the preamble, would vote for the resolution. When I made that statement, I did not understand the facts. I now understand that the Secretary of the Interior is ready and willing to appoint one of his ablest officers to investigate this very thing. I therefore shall change my vote and vote for the preamble.

Mr. POTTLE stated that Mr. ELY was paired off during this week with Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, and for the following week with Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio.

Mr. LANDRUM stated that Mr. TAYLOR was confined to his room by illness.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, said: Inasmuch as the committee proposed to be raised by virtue of that resolution is to inquire into the transaction of Colonel Richard W. Thompson, of my congressional district, with the Government, and Indians, and knowing that transaction to be proper, and that he will not shrink from any investigation this committee can make in reference to that or any other transaction with that tribe of Indians, I vote "yea."

Mr. WOODSON. I desire simply to say that, understanding the subject is under investigation by the Secretary of the Interior, I vote "no."

Mr. ELIOT stated that his colleague, Mr. ANSEL, was confined to his house by sickness. Mr. BRANCH stated that he had been within the bar when his name was called, he would have voted in the negative.

The result was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the preamble.

Mr. BRANCH. The resolution having failed, the preamble necessarily falls with it. It is merely attached to the resolution, which is the main thing.

The SPEAKER. It might as well fall, though I do not know as it necessarily does, under the rules. If there be no objection, the preamble will be passed by.

No objection was made.

Mr. KILGORE subsequently said: I rise to a question of privilege, in regard to the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I would inquire if the resolution is not fairly adopted? The only rule which it is necessary to suspend is the rule in reference to the right to report at any time. When the committee consents to report, they must move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not passed, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BRANCH. The resolution came in by reason of my being too late in objecting, and the gentleman from Indiana is also too late in making this objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the same opinion.

CONTINUED ELECTION FROM NEW YORK.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, to which was referred the petition of Amor J. Williamson, contesting the right of Hon. DANIEL E. SICKLES to a seat in this House, made a report, accompanied with the following resolution:

Resolved, That A. J. Williamson, contesting the right of Hon. DANIEL E. SICKLES to a seat in this House as a Representative from the third district of the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said SICKLES, within ten days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that the said SICKLES, in answer thereto, in twenty days thereafter; and that both parties be allowed sixty days each after the service of said answer, to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials before some justice of the supreme court of the State of New York, residing in the city of New York; but all other matters in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. GILMER, from the same committee, submitted a minority report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner, Amor J. Williamson, having failed to comply with any of the provisions of the law of Congress, or the usages established by parliamentary procedure, in requiring the proceedings of parties to cases of contested elections, and not having proceeded with due diligence to establish his alleged claims, have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the reports of the majority and minority, with the accompanying resolutions, be printed; and that their consideration be postponed until one o'clock on Thursday next, to be continued from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Amor J. Williamson have leave to occupy any of the floor of this House pending the result of the report of the Committee of Elections on the case of his contest for the seat now occupied by DANIEL E. SICKLES, from the third congressional district of the State of New York; and that he have leave to speak to the merits of said contest and the report thereon.

tee of the Whole on the case of the Union, and after many days the slaps of the House reconsider the vote and brings the bill back before the House, it is in the power of the gentleman who made the motion to commit to withdraw it at that time, or whether the House has not taken such a charge of the question as will deprive the members of the House of the motion of all power to control it in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that it is in the power of the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BRANCH. I suppose my motion to commit is not received, and that the call for the previous question only takes precedence of it. So that, if the previous question is voted down, my motion to commit comes up.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The gentleman had not the floor to make any such motion.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from North Carolina had the floor he could make the motion.

Mr. BRANCH. I understood the Speaker to assign me the floor. There is no question pending, except a second to the demand for the previous question, made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has not yielded the floor.

Mr. BRANCH. Have I the floor for the purpose of making a motion? I understood the Speaker to decide that my motion to commit was not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so decide.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. COBB. I am examining the progress of this bill, I find that it will be impossible to amend it, as the previous question is now pending.

Mr. BRANCH. I object to debate, unless the previous question is withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order while the previous question is pending.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to ask in favor of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order. The pending motion is to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not desire to debate the bill, I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow an amendment which I have drawn up to be read for information.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I cannot.

Mr. BRANCH. I demand the yeas and nays upon my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 112; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Green Adams, Thomas L. Anderson, William C. Anderson, Avery, Barkside, Beckman, Bonham, Brubaker, Branch, Bratton, Burnett, Clayton, Cobb, Curry, H. Winter Davis, Reuben Davis, De Jarnette, Edmondson, Etheridge, Garrett, Garfield, Gilmer, Hamilton, Harbison, J. Morrison Harlan, Hutton, Hill, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jones, Keitt, Lamar, Leake, Love, Matney, Elisha S. Martin, Maynard, McClellan, McKen, McMillan, Montgomery, Overton Moore, Nelson, Noell, Peyton, Rogers, Russell, Ruffin, Sumner, Sturgeon, William Smith, W. H. Smith, H. Smith, Underwood, Venable, Whitely, Woodson, and Wright—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Adair, Aldrich, Alsbitt, Barry, Bingham, Blake, Briggs, Buffington, Burr, Burnham, Canfield, Carey, Carter, Case, John Cochran, Coffey, Conkling, Cooper, Corwin, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Curtis, John T. Davis, Davis, Deland, Dool, Dunn, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Fenton, Ferry, Florence, Foster, Frazier, French, George, Graham, Green, Gurley, Hale, Hall, Harkin, Heinemann, Holman, Howard, Humphrey, Hutchins, Jinks, Francis W. Kellogg, William Kellogg, Kilgore, Kintner, Larnabee, DeWitt C. Leach, Lee, Lewis, Lester, McLean, McKen, McKnight, McPherson, Morrill, Morrill, Edward Jay Morris, Morse, Niblack, Olin, Overton, Patten, Patterson, Phelps, Rice, Riggs, Christopher Robinson, James C. Robinson, Royce, Schwartz, Scott, Sherman, Sherman, Richies, Somers, Spink, Sprague, Taylor, Thompson, Tilden, Tompkins, Tracy, Trimble, Vallandigham, Vandever, Van Wyck, Verree, Waldron, Watson, Caldwell C. Washburn, Elisha B. Washburn, Wells, Wilson, Windom, and Woodruff—112.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. MILES stated that Mr. Boyce had paired off with Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, both being unwell.

Mr. COBB. Being a little green, I would like like some information. I want to inquire of the friends of this bill if they expect the call for the previous question to be sustained to prevent any amendment?

Mr. COBB. I object to debate

Mr. BRANCH. I object to the bill as it is.

Mr. BRANCH. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

Mr. COBB. Can I get the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina to vote? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANCH. I insist that the gentleman shall conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Clerk, my call name.

The CLERK. Mr. Cobb.

Mr. COBB. I vote to lay the bill upon the table, as I cannot get it amended.

Mr. ENGLISH. As the Legislature of Indiana instructed her Representatives in favor of a homestead law, I vote "ay."

Mr. WILSON. I was paired with Mr. Bonkewitz, but I have transferred the pair to Mr. Spowies, who, I understand, would vote the same way I do. I vote "ay."

Mr. HUGHES stated that he was called out before his name was called; otherwise, he would have voted "ay."

Mr. BURCH. I was not within the bar when my name was called. I ask permission to vote; though I do not know that my vote will change the result.

Mr. McPHERSON and others objected.

Mr. BURCH. I would have voted "no."

The result was then announced, as above reported.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I ask the gentleman to hear a suggestion in relation to this bill, which, perhaps, I will have no power now to enforce. I certainly shall have no such power after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. ENGLISH. I must decline. I should be glad to extend the courtesy to the gentleman, but others make the same appeal to me.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I can make the suggestion to the gentleman, and then he can adopt it or not, as he thinks proper. I know I am under his power and control, and I hope he will lend his ear to the suggestion.

Mr. BURNETT. Debate is not in order, and I call the gentleman to order, though I should have no objection to hear the gentleman from Tennessee if he were in order.

The gentleman from Tennessee cannot proceed, as objection is made.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I did not propose to enter into a debate. My object is to make a statement, in which the gentleman from Kentucky is interested as myself.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I insist upon order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Before the vote is taken, I am entitled to the floor for one hour, as the member who reported this bill from the committee. I will occupy that time; but I wish to submit a few remarks.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. The gentleman says he will not occupy his whole time. He will yield to me for just a moment, that I may indicate the purpose I had in view when I asked him to withdraw the previous question?

Mr. HOUSTON. I take it for granted that this is not the kind of case in which the gentleman has a right to an hour to close the debate. There has, in truth, been no debate opened; and if there had been, it would have been closed before the third round was taken. This is not the time when the gentleman has the right to debate—if he has the right at all—when there has been no debate opened. It is not only unfair, but in violation of the rules, that the gentleman should now debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Illinois has a right to close the debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. When does that right attach? Will the Speaker tell me that?

The SPEAKER. At any stage where the bill is debatable.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I claim my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has a right to a portion of the debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to present this point of order, because I am satisfied that this is not the way in which the rule ought to be administered. I desire to have the rule upon the subject read.

The Clerk read a portion of the 34th rule, as follows:

"No member shall occupy more than one hour on debate on any question in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee, may open and close the debate."

Mr. HOUSTON. "Open and close the debate." Very well; but there has been no debate upon this bill. All debate has been prevented, and I think I am correct in saying that it is the uniform and, I believe, the universal practice, in a case where a member claims the right to close the debate, to claim that right before the bill has been ordered to its third reading, and while it is open for amendment. Before it passes from that stage, the member must claim his right; or if he does not, he loses it altogether.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot find any rule laying it down in that way.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I suppose not.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I will waive my right if we can proceed to vote.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adair, Aldrich, Ashley, Booth, Barr, Bingham, Blake, Briggs, Buffington, Burr, Burnham, Canfield, Carey, Carter, Case, John Cochran, Coffey, Conkling, Cooper, Corwin, Covode, Cox, James Craig, Curtis, John T. Davis, Davis, Deland, Dool, Dunn, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Fenton, Ferry, Florence, Foster, Frazier, French, George, Graham, Green, Gurley, Hale, Hall, Harkin, Heinemann, Holman, Howard, Humphrey, Hutchins, Jinks, Francis W. Kellogg, William Kellogg, Kilgore, Kintner, Larnabee, DeWitt C. Leach, Lee, Lewis, Lester, McLean, McKen, McKnight, McPherson, Morrill, Morrill, Edward Jay Morris, Morse, Niblack, Olin, Overton, Patten, Patterson, Phelps, Rice, Riggs, Christopher Robinson, James C. Robinson, Royce, Schwartz, Scott, Sherman, Sherman, Richies, Somers, Spink, Sprague, Taylor, Thompson, Tilden, Tompkins, Tracy, Trimble, Vallandigham, Vandever, Van Wyck, Verree, Waldron, Watson, Caldwell C. Washburn, Elisha B. Washburn, Wells, Wilson, Windom, and Woodruff—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Green Adams, Thomas L. Anderson, William C. Anderson, Avery, Barkside, Beckman, Bonham, Brubaker, Branch, Bratton, Burnett, Clayton, Cobb, Curry, H. Winter Davis, Reuben Davis, De Jarnette, Edmondson, Etheridge, Garrett, Garfield, Gilmer, Hamilton, Harbison, J. Morrison Harlan, Hutton, Hill, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jones, Keitt, Lamar, Leake, Love, Matney, Elisha S. Martin, Maynard, McClellan, McKen, McKnight, McMillan, Montgomery, Overton Moore, Nelson, Noell, Peyton, Rogers, Russell, Ruffin, Sumner, Sturgeon, William Smith, W. H. Smith, H. Smith, Underwood, Venable, Whitely, Woodson, and Wright—65.

So the bill was passed.

During the call,

Mr. ROBINSON, of Rhode Island, stated that Mr. BRAYTON was paired off.

Mr. VANCE stated that his colleague, Mr. LEACH, was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. CRAWFORD stated that he was paired off with Mr. FARNSWORTH.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, when his name was called, said: I am for a homestead law, but on this particular bill I am not.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, when his name was called, said: I am in favor of a homestead law, but there is no opportunity to amend this bill, and it is highly objectionable. I cannot, therefore, vote for it. I vote "no."

Mr. STONE, when his name was called, said:

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill, though I do not like some of its provisions. I think the length of time required, during which the settler is compelled to reside thereon, is much too great. I believe that nine tenths of the settlers on public lands will take time to improve the land, rather than be compelled to comply with the provisions of this act. If you are going to donate the lands to actual settlers, do it in good faith. As this is the best donation law that I will be able to vote for this session, and as it is not up to amendment, I vote "ay."

Mr. GROW. No debate is in order.

Mr. WILSON, when his name was called, said: I had paired off with Mr. BELLEVILLE for today. I have just seen him, and he has consented that the pair shall be transferred to Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. BARSDALE. I move that the House adjourn. I think inquiry enough for one day has been done by the passage of the homestead bill.

Mr. TAPPAN. I have the floor. I call up the motion entered some days ago to reconsider the vote by which the bill of the Senate for the relief of the representatives of Charles Pearson was referred to the Committee on Patents. I will just state that it is a little bill to refund the sum of $140, paid into the Patent Office by a man who was insane. The bill was unanimously passed by the Senate, and I believe the House to reconsider will be agreed to, and the bill passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. TAPPAN. I withdraw the motion to refer, and ask unanimous consent to put the bill on its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUPLICATION OF LOST LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. YANCEY submitted the following resolution, which was, by unanimous consent, considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing for the duplication, under proper restrictions against fraud, of lost land warrants issued to soldiers; of extending the term of the same; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution in relation to certain public lands in Missouri; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SALE OF HARRODSBURG MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. STANTON, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill authorizing the sale of the Western Military Asylum at Harrodsburg; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to say that this bill is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It was examined by a committee of the last Congress, and also by our committee during the present session. This military asylum has become absolutely worthless for the purposes for which it was constructed, and has been abandoned by the Government. The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to sell it at public auction, after not less than sixty days' notice, the minimum price being fixed at $25,000. I understand that the site is wanted for college purposes. There is no objection to the bill, I believe, on the part of the Kentucky delegation; the Secretary of War recommends it; and if there be no objection, I will ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read through.

Mr. STANTON. I will say that a bill passed both Houses, two or three years ago, for the sale of this asylum, the minimum price being fixed at $27,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars was offered, but it being less than the minimum, there was no sale. This fixes the minimum at $25,000. I ask that the bill may be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask whether this asylum was ever of any use?

Mr. STANTON. It never was. It was erected at great cost, and has been a heavy tax upon the people. I call for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, (at a quarter before four o'clock, p. m.), the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Tuesday, March 13, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GURLEY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 6th ultimo, copies of the instructions to, and dispatches from, the late and from the present minister of the United States in China, down to the period of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of Peking; and also a copy of the instructions from the Department of State of February, 1857, to Mr. Parker, former Commissioner to China, a report from the Secretary of State, and the papers by which it was accompanied. A motion by Mr. PRANCE, that it be printed, and that fifteen hundred copies in addition to the usual number be printed for the use of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the acting Treasurer of the United States, accompanied by copies of the Treasurer's accounts of the receipts and disbursements for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal years ending 30th June, 1858, and 30th June, 1859; which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 280) to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain, was read a first and second time, by unanimous consent, and, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a memorial of insurance companies in New Orleans, praying the substitution of steamers of light draught for sailing vessels in the revenue service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMMOND presented a petition of citizens of Augusta, Georgia, praying the privilege of paying at that place the duties on goods coming through Charleston, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FITCH presented the petition of Israel Johnson, praying for payment for the restoration of John P. Jones, a deserter from the United States of Georgia, and other services rendered by him by direction of the United States Indian agents, while endeavoring to negotiate a treaty with the Miami Indians, in 1833; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented papers in relation to the claim of Stephen Bunnell, a quartermaster's sergeant in the war of 1812, to a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, it was Ordered, That Antonio L. Fortna have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. LATHAM, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Dent, Vanlieke & Co., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TILGHMAN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Micajah Hawks, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 269) for the relief of Micajah Hawks. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted an adverse report on the claim of Adam Sener to a pension; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of John H. Wheeler, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 270) for the relief of John H. Wheeler. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution and accompanying papers respecting the claims of John P. Brown, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 271) for the relief of John P. Brown. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles E. Anderson, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 272) for the relief of Charles E. Anderson. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of J. E. Martin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 273) for the relief of the legal representatives of J. E. Martin. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Townsend Harris, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of Townsend Harris. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Caze, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 275) for the relief of Frederick Vincent, administrator of James Le Caze, surviving partner of Le Caze & Malick. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted an adverse report on the claim of the heirs of Sour John, for the value of an Indian reservation; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 88) to provide for a superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, and additional Indian agents, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Krebs, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of J. B. Rogers, for storage of provisions at Fort Smith, Arkansas, in 1837, asked to be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Court of Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Van Buskirk, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 277) for the relief of Peter Van Buskirk. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Jacob Bigelow, administrator of Francis Cazeau, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac Varn, Jr., submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 278) for the relief of Isaac Varn, Jr. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas M. Newell, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 280) for the relief of Thomas M. Newell. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of D. G. Farragut, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of D. G. Farragut. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TOOMBS, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 279) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 276) to increase the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States in the State of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FOSTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 292) to increase the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Connecticut which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the late treaty with Great Britain, for the suppression of the African slave trade, has been executed, and whether any further legislation is necessary, by way of amendment of existing laws, for the more effectual suppression thereof.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution must lie over.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following resolutions, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed, in addition to the usual number, six thousand two hundred copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1872, one thousand two hundred of which for the use of the Senate, and five thousand for distribution by said superintendent; that the same be printed and bound with the charts and sketches in quarto form, and that the printing of said charts and sketches shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 293) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Pearson, deceased.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (No. 394) authorizing the sale of the Western Military Asylum in Harrodsburg, Kentucky, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Also, that the House had ordered the printing of certain documents.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FOWELL, the bill from the House (No. 294) authorizing the sale of the Western Military Asylum in Harrodsburg, Kentucky, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

WASHINGTON JAIL.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to consider the expediency of doing something to improve the condition of the common jail in the city of Washington.

Before the question is put, I desire to say that I have visited that jail; and I have found it neither more nor less than a mere human sty; and since the Senate has undertaken to send a fellow-creature there, I think the least it can do is to see that something is done to improve its condition.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up Senate bill No. 37, for the purpose of fixing the time when the vote may be taken upon it. It was made a special order for a day some time since, but was overlooked. I now desire to fix a time when the vote shall absolutely be taken; and I move that the bill be taken up for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to take up the bill making an appropriation for deepening the channel over the St. Clair flats, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. SLIDELL. I shall object to that bill being taken up for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Michigan. He seems to anticipate that the vote is to be taken on that bill without debate. That is a thing entirely out of the question.

If taken up at all and pressed, it must lead to a protracted debate, and I submit again to the Senator from Michigan, as I did the other day, whether it is worth while to consume the time of the Senate in the consideration of a bill that is sure to meet with the same fate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana will be good enough to pause a moment. The Chair must call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone the special order, for the purpose of taking up this bill and assigning a day for disposing of it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order, which the Chair calls up at this hour, is the homesteaded bill. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone that and all other orders.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion being withdrawn, the homesteaded bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I move to suspend the special order, for the purpose of taking up the West Point appropriation bill, which was the unfinished business of last legislative day; and I ask the Chair if that is not the unfinished business, and therefore the first business in order? We adjourned on that bill on Thursday evening last.

Friday was private bill day. Yesterday was taken up with a question of privilege; and we never got on the unfinished business. It is not in order now to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of Thursday last? Is not that the first business regularly in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GWIN. I make the motion to take it up.

Mr. KING. I ask for the yeas and nays, without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves to postpone the special order, now before the Senate, and other special orders, with a view to take up the Military Academy bill, upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FAYARD. I hope the motion will not prevail; not that I have any objection to the passage of that bill, but the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee in reference to the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, was discussed in the Senate, under a special order, last night or ten days ago, in order, for consideration, postponed, and made the special order for yesterday; and yesterday it could not come up, because a question of privilege consumed the entire day. I endeavored, at the close of the session, to have it called up in order, and it was cut off in that by a motion to adjourn. But as it was the special order for yesterday, and, as I presume, the special order for to-day, the bill of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, will hardly now be called up, as the House have passed a similar bill, which has gone to a committee. I hope that bill will have the preference, and be disposed of. It is out of committee, subject only to amendments that have been made. It is a bill of great importance; and, although I do not mean to underrate at all the importance of the bill which it is now moved to take up, I consider that the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee ought to be disposed of, and in case of a tie, in preference. I shall therefore vote against the motion to postpone, with that view, and then I shall make a motion to take up the bill with reference to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WIGFALL. Will the Senator give me one moment?

Mr. WIGFALL. Certainly.

Mr. GWIN. I did not understand the question made by the Senator from Delaware. Does he state that the unfinished business is the Court of Claims bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question before the Senate. It is the motion to postpone the prior orders with a view to take up the Military Academy bill. The Senator from Delaware objects to the motion, because he desires to take up a bill from the Judiciary Committee; but the question the Chair has just stated is the question before the Senate, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. GWIN. Then I change my motion. I want to separate the questions. I have no objection to taking up the bill of the Senator from Delaware, if it can be disposed of; it is unfinished business that has been discussed, but as the West Point appropriation bill, being in the same condition, to be disposed of before we proceed to any new business. My object is to take up the business that has been discussed, and dispose of it. If the Senator from Delaware makes a motion to take up his bill, if it is agreeable to the Senator from Texas I will withdraw my motion. I want to take up the appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion can be withdrawn at any time, except only, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. KING. It is not to be renewed, I have no objection to the withdrawal; but if it is, I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion?

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from California whether he intends to renew the motion?

Mr. HALE. I object to withdrawing the motion.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Delaware said his bill was the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the motion cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to ask a question. If I heard distinctly in your Journal, as it was read, it states that, on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, the bill relating to the Court of Claims was taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator misunderstands.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then, I very respectfully contend that, if that be not the case, the unfinished business is the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy, which went over on Thursday last, and was the unfinished business of that day. Friday was devoted to another special purpose—private bills. I submit, with great deference to the opinion of the Chair, that it now comes up regularly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule of the Senate is, that the unfinished business of the last preceding adjournment shall have preference in the orders of the day. The bill from the Judiciary Committee might have been the unfinished business on Thursday, but certainly could not have been so in the orders of the day on Tuesday of the following week. The Chair decides that it is not the unfinished business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust the friends of the homesteaded bill will not allow it to be postponed by the Senator from California. It is apparent that the Senator from California wishes to kill the homesteaded bill, because he is willing to take up any other bill. His motion is not made because he wishes to get up the West Point bill. That is not his object. He is willing that the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee should come up; and this motion is therefore made, and manifestly so, for the purpose of defeating and overlooking the homesteaded bill, in the same way that it was done at the last session of Congress. We never could get a direct vote on it. Now, I trust the—

Mr. GWIN. Does the Senator make his allusion to the West Point bill?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did allude to the Senator from California, because I understood him to say that, if the bill from the Judiciary Committee came up, he would withdraw his motion. He moved to postpone the homesteaded bill, to get rid of that bill, as I understood him to say, to get up the Military Academy bill; but when he was told that a bill from the Judiciary Committee would come up, that satisfied him. He cared nothing about the Military Academy bill particularly, as he was willing any other bill should come up in place of the homesteaded bill, because he was willing, as I understood him to say, that the Judiciary bill should come up.

Mr. GWIN. Will the Senator permit me a moment to say to those who have heard what I said, I called up the Military Academy appropriation bill, as the unfinished business, as I thought, on the Calendar. The Chair having decided against me, and it having been intimated that the Court of Claims bill was the unfinished business, as so stated on the record, I wanted to finish that, and agreed to let it be taken up. I want to finish the business we have under consideration before we take up any new bill. I shall vote against taking up the homesteaded bill, or any other special order, until we get clear of the business we have had under consideration, in order that we may complete something. If the bill of the Senator from Delaware has precedence over the West Point bill, I am willing, that his bill shall come up first, and for no other reason. I make the motion, and leave it to the Senate to decide whether we shall go on and complete our legislation on this appropriation bill; I make this motion because it has been placed in my charge, as I have frequently said to the Senate. If this bill, the Senator from Delaware has in charge, has precedence, I shall give way for that; but I do so for no other reason than because I desire to finish the business we have under consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That has no precedence to-day, but the homestead bill has precedence of everything else; and I understood the Senator from California the other day to urge that we should finish one thing at a time.

Mr. GWIN. That is what I am at now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And that when a special order was made, it should be attended to. Now, to-day is set apart for the homestead bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him on this point?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The homestead bill passed the House of Representatives yesterday, and was on our table this morning from the House. It has been referred to the committee of the Senate by our action this morning. It has not been printed; it has not been examined by the Committee on Public Lands, which meets the day after to-morrow, and will take it into consideration to-morrow, I believe, and has no question, that day will be devoted to it by the committee. I hope Senators will not think of pressing the homestead bill to-day, for the reason that we desire to have it printed for the Senate, so that each member may have possession of it, and that each member of the Senate may be able to consider it and report on it. I believe those who advocate it are a majority on the committee. I hope Senators will not press the homestead bill to-day, but let it be ordered to be printed; and I shall ask the Senate, whenever it is ready to consider it, and propriety, to allow it to be printed, although it has been already referred. I hope sincerely it may not be pressed now, and the Senate can see the motives and reasons why.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would understand the Senate committee has matured a homestead bill, which has been set down several times as a special order. Now, if it is intended to substitute the House bill for ours, it can be very easily done. The Senate committee have already had the subject under consideration, and the bills are substantially the same, as I understand. If the coming in of the House bill is to interfere with the bill that is pending here, of course I would not desire to press it with that view. Really, but I do not see what the fact of the House having passed a bill, which the Senate committee has recommended, should delay our action on the bill which has been recommended here; and if we think proper, we can substitute the House bill for it, if there is no difference between them, and that is considered preferable.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope that the bill in relation to the Court of Claims will be taken up. It has already been discussed in the Senate. It has passed out of Committee of the House, and is in the Senate. It is, therefore, partially perfected. There is an amendment still pending. I do not know that there is any disposition further to debate it; certainly none on my part. I am willing to press the Senate bill, but I do not see what it is to be done, if they desire to retain the state of things that now exists, without any alteration of the law, be it so; but I should like to have the final action of the Senate on it.

But I may appeal to honorable Senators. They assigned two days, in the first instance, to the Committee on the Judiciary for its bills. During all the last session, we were unable to get up a solitary bill we reported. At the present session, the Senate has cut two days for our bills; and yet, immediately after the adjournment, one of those days was used off, in order to enable resolutions of an abstract character to be discussed; and then, when the bill, being half finished, was postponed until yesterday, a privileged question took precedence of it. I think it now comes fairly before the Senate, to claim that it should be disposed of by a vote of the Senate, because it certainly is of great importance. Though involving, as I said, no political struggle and no party question, it is of great importance to the people of this country, because it is a question in which the administration of justice is involved.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President, there seems to be a great content here in reference to the priority of business. According to my understanding of the rules, that question is not debatable; but debate has been indulged in, and I desire to make a suggestion to the friends of the homestead bill, and I think it has no truer or more consistent friend than I. The House has passed the bill, and sent it to the Senate. That bill differs from the Senate bill in some three essentials. Here is a proposition in reference to Texas raising a regiment of men; here is a proposition to amend the law establishing the Court of Claims. There seems to be quite a content as to the passage of these bills, or the way in which they shall be disposed of. Now, if it meets the approbation of the friends of the homestead bill, I think it is the wisest and most judicious policy to let it go. On Thursday, because the House bill has been taken up, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who will meet on that day. The Senate bill has been made the special order for to-day, at half past one o'clock; but on Thursday, when the Committee on Public Lands meets, there is every assurance that that committee will take up the House bill on Thursday morning, and report it back on that day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. With that understanding, I am agreed, as one, to let the homestead bill go by consent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to make this suggestion: that the homestead bill be continued as a special order until Thursday, at half past one o'clock, with the assurance of the Committee on Public Lands that the House bill will be reported back that morning; and then we shall have the two propositions before the Senate, and can act understandingly on them.

Mr. GWIN. I shall oppose making it a special order to-day to the extent of the business of all other business. I am willing that it shall come forward regularly, and if it has a majority of the Senate in its favor, they can readily take it up and pass it. This making of one bill a special order, and substituting an unfinished business for that which we have had before us, and are ready to vote upon, it seems to me, is obstructing business here to such an extent that I think we had better go on and complete what has been partly done. We ought to adhere to the rule requiring us to take up first, every day, the unfinished business of the day previous. I have no objection to giving a fair opportunity to bring up the homestead bill at any time, so far as I am concerned; but I want to complete business as we go on.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. By permission of the Senator from California, I will say that there has been every disposition manifested by the friends of the homestead bill to accommodate every other proposition that has come up. Nothing but an unusual business of affairs before the Senate, and the proposition is simply to let the homestead bill retain the same standing before the Senate, on Thursday next, that it has now. It does not change the state of things. It gives way for other business to be transacted in the mean time, but lets it occupy the same position on Thursday that it does to-day.

Mr. GWIN. If I understand the Senator, the Committee on Public Lands are to report on the bill to-morrow; but if I should so happen that they did not agree to bring the bill in, it might go over again. I am willing to let it go over informally now without displacing it, without making it a special order again; but let it remain in its present position.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. A good many special orders have been made, and it will not change the position of this bill before the Senate if my suggestion be agreed to. I make the motion, that the bill be continued as a special order of the homestead bill, that the special order be continued until Thursday, at half past one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion to postpone the prior order with a view to take up the Military Academy bill, and the yeas and nays have been ordered on it. By unanimous consent, that motion may be withdrawn. ["Agreed."] The Chair hears no objection. Then the homestead bill is before the Senate. Now, does the Senator from Tennessee make a motion to postpone the motion?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move that it be postponed, and made the special order for Thursday, at half past one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought there was a question before us on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to take up the Court of Claims bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion was not before the Senate. A question was made as to whether the bill was unfinished business, and the Chair decided that it was not.

Mr. HUNTER. Do I understand that the Chair decided that there was unanimous consent to allowing the withdrawal of the motion to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of taking up the West Point bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was. We are now where we were half an hour ago, to wit, the homestead bill comes up as the special order.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion now before the Senate, is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the homestead bill, and make that the special order for Thursday next, at half past one o'clock.

Mr. BAYARD. Unless the Court of Claims bill will then come up, I shall make a motion to take it up.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose it would not be in order to make a motion to postpone the prior orders, for the purpose of taking up the West Point bill then.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Let us get this out of the way.

Mr. HUNTER. There is a motion before us. I understand to make the homestead bill a special order. I hope no more special orders will be made. Let us do business according to its position on the Calendar. We are just embarrassing ourselves in this way. We shall spend half our time in making special orders to consider. I shall vote against making it a special order.

Mr. KING. I suppose the homestead bill is now a special order. I ask, for information, whether a motion is necessary to make it so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a special order; but if it be postponed until to-morrow, it may fall behind other special orders on the Calendar, unless some particular hour be fixed for it.

Mr. KING. Then I question the propriety of such a postponement. I think the bill had better retain its place.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will say to the Senator from New York, that a motion to postpone until to-morrow is indefinite, and if that prevailed, the bill would not come up as a special order again; but if you postpone it until Thursday, at half past one o'clock, it being now a special order, it will come up at that hour.

Mr. KING. I will not interpose.

Mr. GWIN. As a friend of the homestead bill, I hope the motion of the Senator from Tennessee will prevail. I hope we shall consent to postpone it until the committee shall have possession of the House bill, being assured that they will report it back promptly, so that we can act understandingly on both these bills. I hope that the friends of the homestead bill will agree to this motion, and when it does come up on that day, I trust that every friend of that bill will stand by it until it is finally acted upon. That is all I have to say on this point.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to ask a question in regard to the order of business. I have never paid very much attention to the rules of the Senate, and therefore do not profess to know much about them; but certainly, in past years, it was always considered that the first special order that was made was always to continue as the first special order until it was disposed of. If we took up a bill which was the special order first on the Calendar, and we afterwards made another special order, the first made lost its preference when the time arrived for the second special order. That certainly was the practice of the Senate. I was particularly interested in the question; for I had a special order in which I had great interest, and it was succeeded ing, and the next special order was ahead of it on the Calendar. I should like to know if taking up a bill that is a special order now, and making it a special order for next Thursday, does not put it behind other special orders that have precedence to-day? That was the old practice of the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the special order always at the hour which has been fixed for it by the vote of the Senate, no matter what may be the age of the measure; and he has done that at all times.

Mr. WADE. On the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, I call for the yeas and nays.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded to postpone the homestead bill until Thursday next, and to make it the special order for half past one o'clock. I will now, on this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand the question now, it is between having this bill the special order for to-day, or the special order for Thursday next, at half past one o'clock. If so, I shall vote to postpone it to Thursday next.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Cannot the question be divided, so as to take the vote simply on the postponement, without making the bill a special order? I am willing to postpone it, but I would rather not make special orders, as they seem to interfere with the business of the Senate, in the opinion of gentlemen.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the question is susceptible of division; but, whenever we have undertaken to divide questions of this sort, it has always resulted in great embarrassment and loss of time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I withdraw the request.

Mr. MASON. I have not looked back to the rules, but my recollection is, that wherever a question is susceptible of division, it is in the power of any member to make such a division.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair says so.

Mr. MASON. I think this is one of those questions clearly susceptible of division, and I should prefer, with the Senator from North Carolina, that it should be divided. I will not speak of my impression, but I would like to see the vote for putting it in any position in the world where it would never be heard of again, if we can do it. I ask that the question may be divided, and that we may first vote simply upon the postponement.

Mr. BAYARD. I, of course, am no advocate of the homestead bill; but it seems to me, as a question of order, if the motion is simply to postpone the special order to a given hour on Thursday next, it remains a special order at that time, unless the Senate should discharge the special order. I do not see how it can be otherwise. The bill is now the special order; and when you postpone the special order until Thursday, at half past one o'clock, what makes it less a special order at that time than it is now? If the motion was to postpone it generally, I would not have any character as a special order; but the motion being to postpone until half past one o'clock on Thursday, it seems to me, of necessity, it remains a special order of the Senate at that time, unless the Senate shall discharge it. Therefore, I do not think the present order is a special order. I think it necessary to move to postpone it to that hour, and to make it a special order; for it is already one, and it can only be discharged by a positive vote of the Senate, postponing it without reference to time, or postponing it generally, or postponing it and discharging the special order. I therefore think the motion cannot be divided.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the condition of business. When we adjourned on Thursday last, the West Point appropriation bill was before the Senate, and we were voting upon an amendment, and there was no quorum when the Senate adjourned. Friday was private bill day. The Senate did not sit on Saturday. Yesterday, before we got to the special order, before the special order could be taken up, a question of order was presented, which consumed the day. We then went into executive session. Now, I make this point: the 15th rule provides that "The unfinished business to which the Senate was engaged at the last preceding adjournment, shall have the precedence in the special order."

It seems to me the unfinished business of Thursday last was the West Point appropriation bill; and, as this is our first legislative day, out of the Private Calendar, since then, it is now the unfinished business.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator made no motion of order before. The Chair has given his construction of the rule, and is prepared to decide it now.

Mr. IVERSON. I think the Senator from California is mistaken in relation to the facts, or rather a portion of the facts. The rule is, that "the unfinished business to which the Senate was engaged at the last preceding adjournment"—that is, the adjournment of yesterday—shall have precedence. The business in which the Senate was engaged at the adjournment yesterday was the Court of Claims bill, which the Senator from Delaware has under his charge. That was the unfinished business of yesterday when the Senate adjourned, and, according to my impression, that is the first order of the day to-day. It takes precedence of all special orders. Did the Chair decide that bill was not under consideration yesterday? [Y. Y. Y.] I was not aware of that.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the Military Academy bill, which was under consideration on Thursday last, is not the unfinished business, nor is the bill from the Judiciary Committee the unfinished business, because it was not taken up yesterday. Therefore, unless some other motion be made, the Chair will call the attention of the Senate to the state of the question. The Senator from Tennessee moves to postpone the homestead bill, which has been called up as the special order at this hour, until Tuesday next, at half past one o'clock, and make it the special order for that day, at that hour. The Senator from Virginia moves to divide the motion so that the vote will first be on the motion to postpone it to Thursday next. The Chair will state, in answer to the question of the Senator from Delaware, that in that event it will remain a special order. If postponed to Thursday next, at half past one o'clock and made the special order for that hour, the Chair will call it up. If simply postponed to Thursday next, it continues still a special order, like all others, but I understand various other special orders on the Calendar. The question then is on postponing it until Thursday next; and, on the whole question, the Chair understands the yeas and nays have been demanded.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first branch of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to postpone the homestead bill until Thursday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then I understand it to be in order, after it is postponed, to make it the special order for half past one o'clock on that day.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Then the Senate will vote on the last branch of the proposition.

Mr. BIGLER. I suggest that there is no need of voting on the yeas and nays for the postponement. Let the yeas and nays be taken on making it the special order; but there will be no division on the question of postponement.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the request for a division was withdrawn by the Senator from North Carolina.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia renewed it. Is general consent given that the first branch of the motion may be put without the yeas and nays?

Mr. WADE. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on that branch of the motion.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. By general consent, it may be done. [Agreed.]

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The other branch of the proposition is to make the bill the special order for half past one o'clock on that day; and on this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Bright, Chandler, Colman, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Dutton, Evans, Fessenden, Foster, Giddings, Hale, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Nicholson, Rice, Sumner, Tenney, Trumbull, Wilson, Witham, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Briggs, Chace, Claiborne, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, McPherson, Cowell, Howell, Thompson, Toombs, Wigfall, and Yates.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I now ask that the homestead bill be printed, so that it may be considered in print by the Committee on Public Lands.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be printed as a matter of course under the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. That will answer the purpose.

THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BAYARD. I move now that the Senate take up the bill (S. No. 53) to amend "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855.

Mr. WIGFALL. The proposition is to take up the Judiciary bill. That bill will undoubtedly lead to debate. I believe that the West Point bill will not; at least, I will not discuss it—I will not be betrayed into a discussion. I submit to the Senator from Delaware, that he allow that bill to be taken up, and have it voted upon. It has been fully discussed, and I presume every Senator has made up his mind as to which side he will vote. The bill would have passed on Thursday last, but that there was no quorum. I have not pressed this matter, though it is one of pressing importance. I gave my vote, on Thursday last, for the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER], in order that he might discuss a question which he desired to discuss; and I supposed that after that discussion was over, we should have a vote. The bill was lost on Thursday, because those opposed to it would accept my vote against it. I will not take up more time; but I ask that that bill may be taken up, and that we may be allowed to vote upon it.

Mr. BAYARD. I know no reason to suppose that the one bill will be more likely to lead to debate than the other. So far as the indications have gone, either way, I have just the same determination that the honorable Senator from Texas has, in reference to the bill which is reported by the Judiciary Committee—that is, not to debate it any further unless it is absolutely forced on me. I will not, however, see any necessity for further debate, because the question was discussed in the Senate before, in all its aspects. I hope the bill will be taken up. I think it is likely to be disposed of as rapidly as the other; and it seems to me there will be time enough for both, if we do not tuck too much.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say a single word in reference to the priority here. It has struck me that this bill, although for the usual expenses at West Point, having with it the amendment to remove equipment from the Arsenal, is a bill that ought to give it precedence over any ordinary business at least. I do not know how other Senators may have been impressed by the correspondence recently sent to the Senate from the Executive; but it admonishes me that there is great importance in the year and a half that has passed from that frontier. I shall not discuss the bill; I did take some little part in it heretofore; but I think with the Senator from Texas, it will either pass or be rejected without further debate. There has been a great deal of debate on it. I hope it will be taken up.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded to postpone the orders prior to the bill S. No. 53 from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What are the prior orders?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. There are many prior orders. The first special order before the Senate now, is the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi in reference to the protection of slave property in the Territories.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. GWIN. I shall not vote for this motion, because I will want the West Point appropriation bill to come up.

The motion of Mr. BAYARD was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 53) to amend "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HALE, to add a new section:

"And it is further enacted, That whenever any person is sued in any Federal court by the United States, he shall have leave to file an affidavit; and if, upon the trial, it shall be ascertained that a balance is due him, the court shall issue a writ of habeas corpus, and shall award him, and upon

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1860.

NEW SERIES.—NO. 71.

presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury of said certificate, the amount so found due shall be paid to the person entitled to receive the same.

The amendment was rejected.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. BAWB), to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof:

That the act entitled "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved the 26th of February, 1855, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was rejected.

MR. MALLORY. I offer this amendment, to insert at the end of the fourth section:

Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases in which the judgments of the said court have been heretofore rendered in favor of the claimant, the same shall be paid in conformity with the provisions of the first section of this act, until in those cases involving the payment of a larger sum than that of $20,000, the solicitor shall carry the same by appeal to the said Supreme Court, within six months from and after the passage of this act, which appeal he is hereby authorized to make.

MR. BAYARD. I have no objection to the principle of the amendment, except that it is retrospective, and this bill is prospective, providing a general system for the adjudication of these claims in future. I fear its effect on the bill; that is the only reason why I am opposed to it. In a separate bill, I should vote for the same thing.

MR. MALLORY. I do not propose to delay the passage of the bill by any debate on the amendment I have offered, but I think it will increase the value of the bill to the country very much, and I think it ought to be made. It is simply extending the provisions of the bill to those cases which have already been decided. It is retrospective, as the chairman of the committee alleges. Without debating it the Senate will see at a glance that it embraces all those cases already passed on, and which are to be postponed perhaps for two years for the purpose to give preference to the claims that come after them. It is to prevent that, that I propose to extend the provisions of the bill, on the same terms, to cases which have been already investigated.

MR. HALE. I want to ask the Senator from Florida if his amendment would cover the case of the Florida claims?

MR. MALLORY. No, sir. It is in accordance with the provisions of the fifth section, which has been already adopted, to extend its provisions to cases heretofore decided, in conformity with the limitations contained in the bill. If it is not so, I am willing to make it so.

MR. HALE. I have no objection to that amendment. I am against the whole bill; but I do not know that that is any worse than the rest of it.

MR. MALLORY. With the permission of the Chair, I will read the amendment as I now propose it, as an amendment to, and immediately following, the fourth section:

Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases within the purview of this act in which the judgments of the said court have been heretofore rendered in favor of the claimant, the same shall be paid in conformity with the provisions of the first section of this act, unless in those cases involving the payment of a larger sum than the said $20,000, the solicitor of the United States shall carry the same by appeal to the Supreme Court within six months from and after the passage of this act; which appeal he is hereby authorized to make.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I desire to offer an additional provision at the end of the act.

And provided, That in all cases where the amount allowed to the claimant shall exceed the sum of $20,000, the same shall not be paid or payable until a specific appropriation by Congress therefor.

MR. IVERSON. I do not see the necessity for that amendment; and I think it would be impudent and impolitic to embarrass the bill by too many amendments. I think the Senate, in adopting the amendment of the Senator from Florida, has acted rather impudently, because every amendment put on this bill of course endangers it either here or in the other House. It is an experiment which we desire to make; I think it will be a favorable experiment, and I trust it will not be embarrassed by too many provisions, so as to load it down and endanger its passage in the other House. The Senator's object can be accomplished in another way without any sort of difficulty. When a general appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury to pay all the decisions of the Court of Claims, any Senator can call for each adjudication and ascertain precisely what it is, and if there be a single case that does not meet his judgment, he can have a separate vote taken on it in the Senate, and he can introduce a provision to the appropriation bill, providing that no part of this appropriation shall be applied to the payment of the case of A B or C D, or any other case, and then he can have it rescinded, if the Senate thinks the Court of Claims have acted improperly and without authority in that case. If it is an unjust claim, the Senate can cut it out of the appropriation; can tie up the hands of the Secretary, and exclude him from applying any portion of the appropriation to that specific case; so that there is no necessity for this amendment, and it will only endanger the passage of the bill.

MR. DOOLITTLE. A single word in reply to the Senator from Georgia. I understand this bill, in this respect, to appropriate before-hand some amount of money, I believe $500,000, for the purpose of paying claims thereafter to be found and adjudged due to claimants by the Court of Claims.

MR. IVERSON. The Senator is mistaken about the bill. The bill does not appropriate a dollar. The bill is this; that, at the commencement of each session of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury shall send an estimate of the amount necessary to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims which have been rendered prior to the commencement of the session; and that he send an appropriation bill, and in passed by Congress as an appropriation bill; and you can limit that appropriation, if you please, to a single dollar, or a single case. You do not appropriate anything in advance. There is not a dollar appropriated by the bill.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I do not so understand the bill, I confess. I understand that, when a judgment is found in this court, you have the privilege of appealing to the Supreme Court of the United States; and when they decide in favor of the claim, it then becomes payable out of the Treasury, and the faith of the Government is pledged for it.

MR. IVERSON. The Senator is mistaken; that is not the bill.

MR. HALE. I think the Senator from Wisconsin is entirely right in his view of the operation of this bill; and if anybody will read it, he will find it so. The Senate have refused, by a decisive vote, to call on the Secretary of the Treasury to specify, and the bill does not require him to come before Congress until he has actually paid the money. Here is the fourth section of the bill; I will read it:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of each Congress, to include in his report an estimate of all sums paid at the Treasury on such judgments.

It is not his duty to come here beforehand and make any statement; but after he has paid the money, he is to come to Congress; and the Senate have refused, after debate, to call upon him to specify, or to estimate for any such thing. The money is to be paid, and then he is to come and tell us what he has done with it. The Senator from Wisconsin is entirely right in his construction.

MR. IVERSON. Here is the bill; and I do not think any man of common sense can misunderstand it:

That, in all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.

Out of any appropriation made by law it is to be paid. The passage of this bill is not an appropriation by law. It must be made afterwards. After these decisions are made by the Court of Claims, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates for them at a subsequent Congress, and you pass an appropriation, by law, to pay them; and then, in making that law, you can restrict its operation. That is the whole case.

MR. BAYARD. I do not wish to continue any debate on this bill, which, I think, has been sufficiently discussed, but will merely remark that the control intended to be given by the bill, and which is certainly given by the bill, is, that there must be an estimate from the Departments for private claims generally. The Congress have control of that amount. It cannot exceed from one hundred to one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. Surely that is not a great deal—not half as much as in past times you have often paid out of the Treasury in years for private claims. After you have appropriated generally for private claims, an account must be given to you of every expenditure out of it. It is a specific appropriation, for private claims, without designating them, and the object of the bill is, I understand, that Congress shall not exercise a judicial power; and the bill is worth nothing if it does not effect that. It is to take from Congress a judicial power, in investigating the merits of particular claims; and that justice shall be administered between the State and the citizen, as it is between citizen and citizen by a court of justice.

MR. DOOLITTLE. The bill, as printed before me, uses this language:

In all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid, out of any general appropriation made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims, on presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury, of a copy of said judgment, certificate, &c.

Now let us see how the thing practically will operate. The Secretary of the Treasury comes in at the beginning of a session of Congress, and estimates, if you please, some $300,000 in claims which will probably be allowed and adjudged in favor of claimants during the ensuing year.

MR. IVERSON. The Senator will allow me to say, that is not the explanation. The Secretary comes in to ask for an appropriation for the judgments before rendered—heretofore rendered, not heretofore to be rendered. You cannot know what they are going to be. How can the Secretary estimate for claims heretofore to be adjudicated? They may amount to $10,000 or to $1,000,000. The Secretary cannot estimate what is in the future, but he comes in at the commencement of each Congress, and asks for an appropriation to cover the decisions of the court made prior to that time, between the last session and this.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I just understood the honorable Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to state directly the contrary: that the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury was to be an estimate upon the probable amount of claims which would be adjudged in favor of claimants against the Treasury; and I so understood it. The estimate of the Secretary is not clearly expressed, if the construction which is the honorable Senator from Georgia gives to it is correct. I understand that that was the main ground of the objection of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, whose proposition, the other day, looking to securing this very object, was voted down by the Senate; and it is because it was voted down, as against the sense of the Senate, that I have been disposed to offer the amendment which is now pending. While I am willing that the Government of the United States be insured by private claimants in the Court of Claims, and that when judgments are rendered against the United States, they shall be paid out of the Treasury, I wish to put a limitation on that power of suing the Government, by saying that where the amount recovered against the Government shall be $20,000, it shall not be final and conclusive against the United States, and landing on the good faith of the Government, until Congress shall make a specific appropriation for that particular claim.

If this bill bears the construction which the Senator from Georgia has indicated, the Secretary of the Treasury is to come to Congress and state the amount of judgments which have already been rendered, item by item, judgment after judgment, and that Congress can object to any particular judgment, I do not know, but I should object to the bill; but I understand it differently; that the practical operation of this bill is, that the Secretary estimates a contingent fund, not for the purpose of paying any specific claim, but for paying private claims which, in all human probability, may be adjudged against the Department in the course of the ensuing year, and asks Congress to appropriate a sum of money, and put it at his disposal; and when these judgments are rendered by the courts, they are to become final and conclusive on the Government; and if the money in the Treasury is not sufficient for whom judgment is rendered and presented to the Treasury, may take the whole amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, I desire simply to have this limitation put upon the amount that may be recovered, so that no immense claim of $1,000,000, perhaps, against the Government can be paid without being looked into by Congress itself. I am willing to trust to the contingencies and chances of a lawsuit in the Court of Claims, and again in the Supreme Court, on an appeal, up to the amount of $30,000, and to subject the Government to be sued as private individuals, to that extent; but I am not willing to go beyond that.

While I am up, I desire to say also that I think the sum of $3,000, which is here made the limit for appeal from the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, is too small. I desire that it be broken down the Supreme Court with the amount of business you may throw on them, if every case of a private claim must necessarily be taken to that court. I think, Mr. President, if these two limitations—but especially the limitation which I have proposed—should be adopted, and met with the views of the Senate, and be adopted, I could consent to support the bill. Otherwise I cannot support the bill, and leave it unlimited for the court to find whatever judgment they please against the United States, in favor of private individuals, and make no limit, as I deem it would be, on our good faith.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin. I concur with him exactly in the objection which he states, if it exists in the bill. I suggest to him that he offer an amendment which will remove the construction to which he objects, and make it so exact that there can be no doubt hereafter.

Mr. IVERSON. I have no objection to an amendment like that suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, because that would modify the construction of the bill. I introduced this bill originally myself, and, I think, I understand something about it. I did not hear the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. His remarks were indistinct, and I did not hear them; but I understand the explanation which the Senator from Wisconsin attributes to him, he does not, in my opinion, understand his own bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYARD. What is the remark to which the honorable Senator refers?

Mr. IVERSON. I will explain. The bill provides "that in all cases of final judgments by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation made by Congress, and no satisfaction of private claims." The Senator from Wisconsin stated that the Senator from Delaware had said that he construed that to mean that the Secretary would make an estimate in advance of claims which might possibly be adjudicated in the Court of Claims, and that Congress would make an appropriation in advance to cover the judgments of the Court of Claims to be subsequently made. If that is the construction which the Senator from Delaware puts on this bill, I humbly submit that he does not understand it; and I am borne out by the opinion of one of the other members of the Judiciary Committee, who sat near me, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN], who says this matter was discussed freely and fully in the committee.

The Senator from Wisconsin has stated a case which shows the absurdity of the construction thus put upon the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury makes an estimate, and then, in the presence of God to make one to meet the case. But suppose he does: he comes forward and in the dark asks Congress to appropriate $100,000 to pay the judgments which the Court of Claims may hereafter render. A case comes up the very first case upon which the Court of Claims—for $100,000, and it exhausts every cent; and then every other judgment which may be rendered by the court goes unpaid. Does not this show that the construction is absurd? In the first place, it requires the Secretary to do that which nobody but God Almighty can do; and that is, to determine how much may be the judgments of the Court of Claims, and how much may be desired from Congress to pay them.

No such construction can possibly be put upon the bill, and I am not prepared to say, as I have stated; and it is, that the Secretary comes at the commencement of each Congress and asks for an appropriation to pay the amounts of judgments which have already been rendered by the Court of Claims in the aggregate. The Court of Claims reports to him from time to time, and in one of the other provisions of this bill, between the sittings of Congress, the amounts of its judgments in each case; and at the commencement of the next session, the Secretary asks Congress to appropriate the sum necessary to cover these various judgments; and then Congress appropriates that by law; and then the claimant in each case, after the appropriation is made, takes his certificate of the judgment from the Court of Claims, and carries it to the Treasury Department, and there gets his money. I am in opposition of the proposed law; and nothing can be plainer, in my opinion.

If the construction which the Senators from Delaware and from Wisconsin put on this clause be right, I am against the bill, and will vote against it. It is understood that the Secretary of the bill is that is not the proper construction. I will never permit a Secretary of the Treasury to come here, and, in the dark, ask for an appropriation of my amount, without our knowing how it is to be applied or to whom it is to go. I will never vote for the proposed bill of this sort, until I want to know where the money of the Government is going, when I vote it. I desire to know what judgments of the Court of Claims are to be paid before I vote an appropriation to pay them. I am not going to vote in the dark for an appropriation of a hundred thousand or half a million or a million dollars, to be applied to pay judgments of the Court of Claims when they shall hereafter render them. I desire to keep the power to review the judgments of the Court of Claims; and if I think it proper to appropriate the claim, and give me a proper judgment, I shall move in the Senate to restrict the amount of the appropriation so as to prevent the payment of that claim. I think Congress ought always to have that power in its hands, and not be asked to appropriate money in the dark; and if I am asked to do so, I will not do it. The Secretary may estimate for, not knowing to whom it is to go, or for what purpose, except the general purpose of paying judgments of the Court of Claims. If that is the construction, and the proposition to be put on this clause of the bill, I am opposed to it.

Mr. BAYARD. It may possibly be not unlikely that the honorable Senator from Georgia may have this species of intellect that he may know that others cannot understand their own words, and that he may possibly be mistaken. I think the Senator may himself be mistaken, notwithstanding his violence of manner and his utter want of courtesy. All that may be so; but the idea in my mind, which I mean to express to the Senate was this—I think so still—that the great object of the bill is, that judgments in individual cases shall not be made by a body like Congress, which is utterly incompetent to do it; and the bill is defective, if such is not its object. Congress undoubtedly, as I read the provision which is referred to, may either make a general appropriation, whether it is one hundred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in advance for the purpose of paying private claims, or may make it subsequently. That is in their discretion, I admit. There is no obligation by the bill or Congress to appropriate in advance; but I have supposed that course may be taken under the bill, and I think so still.

Now, if a Secretary of the Treasury would always be known, I do not think it requires any such extraordinary intelligence, in the course of a year or two, to make an estimate of what will be the probable amount of claims against the Government. If you were to pass a clause in an appropriation bill appropriating $100,000 for the payment of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims, not one dollar of it would be spent unless those judgments were rendered; and yet it is the intention of the bill to render the judgments of the court final. That is the very intention of the bill. Therefore, I see no injury, no danger to the Government, if you only take care to limit the amount of your appropriation; and whether you make it in advance, or make it subsequently, you have the list of claims before you, and you can make an estimate of them by the court. You intend to give the power of final judgment to the court, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. You do not intend, if I understand the bill, to revise the action of the court in individual cases. If you do not intend to do so, I am sure I am well satisfied that no such construction ever can be arrived at. Congress may, or may not, in its discretion, determine that it will make an antecedent appropriation; taking the average of claims hitherto rendered by the court; and if the amount is not sufficient to pay all the judgments of course they will make a further appropriation at the next session. As to whether one judgment is to take it, or five or fifty judgments, is not the question in my mind. The question is, whether the Government is to be bound, or is competent to decide, private claims, which are questions of judicial cognizance; whether our experience has not shown that any legislative body is incompetent for a purpose like that. I think the great object of the bill is to get rid of that action of the bill, and to give the Government, and it retains the control over the aggregate amount which shall be disbursed by this Government for private claims; and I do not care whether one construction is given to the bill, or the other. I admit it is susceptible of both; whether Congress choose to make an appropriation in advance, or in some respects it would be more just to do so—or whether they choose to make the appropriation after the fact has been returned by the Secretary of the Treasury; but in either event, I hold, and I trust when it comes before Congress, that any attempt to investigate an individual case by striking at the amount of an appropriation, will be discontinued by Congress. Very certainly they could not reach it by any such legislation, if the late case; because all they could do, according to the bill, is to make an appropriation to diminish the amount; and unless they chose to pass on the particular case also by special law, they could not prevent the Secretary from paying any one case or another.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, my service upon the Committee on Claims during two Congresses, if it has convinced me of anything, has convinced me of the absurdity, if not imprudence, of attempting on that committee to investigate the vast amount of private claims which come before it, with anything like justice to the Government; and my experience here has taught me that, whenever our Private Calendar comes up, private claims pass very much indeed upon feelings of sympathy, rather than justice to the Government, or the true claims of the parties involved. I am not to suppose that it is reported, that its object was to relieve us here from duties which are entirely incongruous to our ordinary functions, which we ought never to be called upon to perform—the investigation of claims of every kind and character, from five dollars to five millions. I suppose the object of the bill was to relieve us from that, and to throw the responsibility where we are willing to devolve it, on the Court of Claims. Now, it appears, from the suggestions of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, under whom I have the honor to serve, by his construction of the bill, that every individual case which has been thoroughly examined, and in regard to which testimony has been taken, according to the principles of the common law and the practice of the courts, and a decision has been made, in to come here for review, and we are to treat it, in fact, as if no such examination had been instituted.

Mr. IVERRSON. Will the honorable Senator from Florida allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. IVERRSON. The Senator misunderstands my argument. I have made no such argument as that. I have said this, however: that the appropriation will be agreed to by the Senate, and the judgments of the Court of Claims. I do not say that Congress is to pass on each case; but I do say that it is in the power of any Senator or Representative to have a review of any case here, if he chooses, by moving to withhold an appropriation from that particular case. That may be done. I do not say it will be done in any case. Undoubtedly it will not bring up each case, as a matter of course.

Mr. MALLORY. I think I do not misrepresent the argument of the honorable Senator from Georgia. I think you understand it. He did not say what I said; but I inferred correctly from his argument the premises I have used. It is to place in review before the Senate every claim which has been decided by the Court of Claims. It is to place a check on the Court of Claims, and to refuse there a finality in all suits. If it be the rightful construction of this bill, I shall vote against it. The Senator from Georgia says, if that is the rightful construction, he will vote for it. I say he encapsulates the bill entirely; he denigrates its vitality; he shows us the responsibility we have now. That is the course of proceeding now. Every case that comes up depends on its merits now. He says that after the decision of the court, we may decide it upon its merits. Then we shall have every case that has been decided by the Court of Claims to be brought before the Court here for revision again, and every Senator who has not taken the trouble to read the decision, will have it read in the Senate and investigated here, and the time of this body will be taken up by the investigation of claims precisely as is now done.

Is there anything in the bill that will alter the state of things? Claims come here from the Court of Claims. Those decisions are referred to the Committee on Claims who reexamine them, session after session, and yet they are referred to again here in open Senate, Senators not being satisfied. If this construction is to obtain, it will be equally in their power then, after this adjudication, to except particular claims from the operation of this bill, and except them all.

Sir, we must trust some of the branches of this Government. I am in favor of throwing the entire responsibility on this court, and sending their judgments directly to the Secretary of the Treasury. We can, at any time, abolish the court if it proves to be an imposture. It is not a very high position. It has already secured, as I think, the confidence of Congress, and the confidence of the public. I think nothing has occurred to destroy or impair it. It is growing in strength daily. We have, at any time, the power to abolish it when called upon by the Secretary of the Treasury to make the appropriations, and in that way to operate as a check.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. One single word further. This bill, as first introduced, used this language:

"Where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum so thereby shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

But the committee have moved to strike out the words "money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert "general appropriation paid by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims." Then, in the latter part of the section, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of each session, to include in his report "a statement of all sums paid at the Treasury on such judgments, together with the names of the claimants, and whether the same were allowed." This bill, as it originally stood, without the amendment reported by the committee, would have authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a claim, however large, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, in the Treasury; and at the next session of Congress, he would report the amount which he had paid. That is as I understand the bill. I think it cannot bear any other construction.

As I stated, I am willing that there should be a general appropriation in advance and to a certain amount, if you please, $100,000 or $200,000; and I am willing to trust, first, to the Court of Claims, and then, on appeal, to the Supreme Court, the decision of the court against the Government in small claims, ordinary claims, or claims, if you please, below twenty thousand dollars; but when it comes to a claim above twenty thousand dollars, I insist that there should be a specific appropriation for the purpose. We cannot throw ourselves to go into court to be sued by private individuals to any amount without its being examined at all by Congress. That was the object of the amendment which I proposed. I hope that it will meet with the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. It is a matter of supreme indifference to me whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin be adopted or not; for, unless the construction given by the Senator from Georgia on this bill be the one that it should properly receive, I am disposed to vote in favor of the bill. I think that the Senator from Georgia is in error in the expression of opinion which he gave to the Senate as to its proper construction. This question has been decided by the Senate already. When the bill was before the Senate on a former occasion, the Senator from New Hampshire proposed to amend it thus:

"No claim shall be paid out of any such general appropriation, until after each claim shall have received the approval of the Court of Claims, and the amount has been specifically estimated for in the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury."

And this was voted down by an overwhelming majority of the Senate. When it was thus voted down, my mind came to the conclusion that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in every case, to vote against this bill.

Now, let us look at this question. A few years ago you organized a Court of Claims. You designed that that Court of Claims should be a merely examining court; that they should unravel the facts of the case, they should investigate questions of law and submit their conclusions to you for their final decision; but, like all courts that have been established since the foundation of the world, it has been constantly attempting to draw to itself more and more power, until now it seeks to acquire the control of the Treasury. It was said on a former occasion, and has been repeated to-day, that the amount that will be annually appropriated from your Treasury to pay the judgments of the court, will not exceed more than one or two hundred thousand dollars; but have we any assurance that this amount will be limited to one or two or five hundred thousand dollars during any year? I apprehend not.

The trouble with the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is this: that says that the judgment should be committed to Congress, and then your amount shall not exceed $20,000; but it is competent for the Court of Claims to determine a principle in a case involving only $2,000, which may draw from the public Treasury millions of dollars. During the last administration, when you had one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, then you never had in this country, I apprehend—Mr. Guthrie—a decision was made, I have been informed by a Senator near me, involving the amount of only two or three thousand dollars, in regard to some of the aggregate outstanding claims. A decision was made by this Court of Claims in favor of the claim. Mr. Guthrie objected to that decision, and brought the attention of the Committee on Claims of the Senate to it, and the committee decided that Mr. Guthrie was right, and that the claim should be rejected. But the decision had been confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he would have drawn millions of dollars out of the Treasury. The check which the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to establish on this court amounts to nothing; because, although the amount involved in the particular claim may be very small, yet it may establish a principle which may put the whole Treasury at the command of this Court of Claims.

It is said here that we should do this in justice to these claimants; yet what did you do, the very first thing, when you went into committee on this bill? An amendment was proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, declaring that when the Government went into any of the States, and there sued a private citizen, and that private citizen, before your own court, appointed by yourself, before a jury selected by yourself and paid by yourself, should be able to satisfy the court and jury that he was entitled to a set-off greater in amount than the claim which the Government had against him, that should be conclusive against the United States. You rejected the amendment; you decided that that should not be conclusive; but that he should be compelled to come here and prosecute his set-off a second time before your Court of Claims; and you say that it is justice to the citizen residing in California or Texas, or Iowa or Maine!

I am opposed to this whole thing, air—to the whole bill. I consider myself standing here as one of the guardians of the Treasury, and I am not willing to say that $100,000 shall be voted in gross amount to meet the judgments that may be rendered by the Court of Claims, upon the supposition that that is the amount which will be required for an average number of years, for I apprehend that the Court of Claims will be constantly drawing to itself more and more power, and encroaching more and more on other courts in its jurisdiction, until finally we shall find that we have created here a tribunal dangerous to the Treasury, if not to the liberties of our people.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to the bill with the speech delivered by the Senator who has just resumed his seat; and it is about the only speech on this subject that I have heard in which I do concur. I regard this whole Court of Claims as an unmitigated humbug. It was so in the beginning; it is so now. True, precise thing is about to happen which those of us who opposed it in the beginning predicted would happen, that the judgments of the court were to be drafts upon the national Treasury. The friends of this court, in the beginning, said that no such thing could happen. They carried out their construction of the Constitution, which is but the plain language of it, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and declared to us, that if the court were established, there would be no appropriations, and the judgments of the court would draw money from the Treasury otherwise than in pursuance of appropriations made by law. Now, sir, we are confronted with a proposition to allow the mere judgments of the court to operate as drafts on the Treasury. Congress is to create a court, and then the Senator from Wisconsin makes an attempt to limit it to a small amount; he is not prepared to go the whole figure just now. If the court pronounces a judgment involving $100,000, then Congress is to be compelled.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator will allow me to say a word. I voted for the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, which would retain the entire supervision of Congress, by making it necessary that every case should be referred to Congress, and that the amount should be paid; but the Senate voted down that proposition by so strong a vote that I supposed the bill would pass in an unlimited shape, and my desire was to put some limit on it. I am with the honorable Senator from Mississippi and the honorable Senator from Iowa in this regard.

Mr. BROWN. I was speaking to the proposition as it now stands. If a large sum of money is adjudged to be due by the court, then Congress must be consulted—not consulted in regard to the principle on which the payment is to be made, but consulted simply in regard to the amount. The Senator from Iowa has well said that the principle necessarily carries the amount with it. If you vote one dollar from the Treasury on a principle to-day, you cannot refuse to vote $100,000, or $1,000,000, tomorrow, on the same principle. Do you mean to establish the theory that the Government will do justice to small claimants and refuse to do justice to large claimants; that you will pay a claimant who only demands $1,000, pay him because it is right to pay him; and yet refuse to pay him who demands $100,000 on precisely the same principle? Sir, you cannot stand upon any such theory.

I hold it to be true that no money is to pass out of the Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations made by law, because the Constitution has so declared. You have no more right to approprivate sums in the aggregate, and without estimate, and without knowing how the money is to be used, to pay private claims, than you have to say: "we appropriate $50,000,000 for the support of the Government for the current year, and leave the President and his Secretaries to divide it out." I hold it to be a total departure from the original theory of the Government; a total ignoring of gentlemen's declarations when you inaugurated this court. Some of us, at the time, thought the result would be, when you got the court inaugurated, to allow it to send its judgments as drafts on the national Treasury. I repeat again, that was denied at the time.

Now you ask for the entering wedge, and, in the course of time, this court will draw, upon its judgments, millions upon millions from the national Treasury. These attempts to restrict it will be removed. The country will be made bankrupt through the instrumentality of a court that adjudicates claims and draws money from the Treasury. You will never know how much you have, or how much you have to provide for. Congress departs from the principle of the Constitution. Sir, it is the business of Congress to furnish the Treasury with money, and the duty of Congress to draw it from the Treasury out of the appropriations. We have no authority, in my opinion, to interpose a court, and say to it, "if you judge that A is entitled to so many thousands, and B to so much more, and C to so much more, they shall be paid out of the Treasury, on your judgment." That Congress intended in the letter, much less to the spirit, of the Constitution. Three judges, inferior judges at that, sitting in a court doing that which the Constitution requires the Senate and House of Representatives, with the consent of the President, to do—draw money from the Treasury! How many millions may they draw? This is the first attempt to limit it to $200,000. I think the Senator from Wisconsin said. Next year the limitation will be put at $1,000,000, and ultimately the limitation will be withdrawn entirely. Sir, it is not a matter to be stopped right here. Under no possible circumstances, in no shape in which the bill can be placed, will it ever command my vote.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator from Wisconsin will withdraw his amendment, I will offer myself, to do so. I will offer myself, to do so, "so as to make it read 'out of any general appropriation thereafter to be made by law, for the satisfaction and payment of private claims.'"

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will withdraw my amendment, as the honorable Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, has given his special attention to this bill, and is better prepared to make proper amendments than I am.

Mr. IVERSON. I move to insert the words "thereafter to be" after the word "appropriation," so that it shall be necessary that the appropriation shall be made after the judgments of the Court of Claims are rendered, and when the amount is ascertained on an estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I agree with the Senator from Iowa in relation to the limitation in this case. I cannot vote for this bill—if our funds are to be tied, in advance, by an expression of this sort in the language of the bill, to an appropriation without knowing to what claims it is to be applied—merely in the dark, as I said, I will never consent to it, to do not think Congress ought ever to permit a bill of this sort to be passed, which will bind us to pay money when, in our judgment, that money ought not to be paid. The objection to the limit of $20,000, or any other limit, is the one stated by the Senator from Iowa.

Here are what we call the pension cases. The Court of Claims have adjudicated in favor of arrears of pension. In each case, probably, there is not more than from two to five hundred dollars involved; and yet it is well ascertained that the principle settles a large number of cases. In the end, it involves $2,000,000. We are now appropriating money to pay those claims in advance, though this body itself rejected those very cases at the last session, and decided that the Court of Claims was wrong in its judgment, and ought not to have adjudicated in favor of the claim.

Again, with regard to the cases referred to by the Senator from Iowa, there were before the Court of Claims, and sent to the Committee on Claims, at the last session, what are called duty cases—applications to refund duties alleged to have been improperly collected on the importation of foreign liquors. The amount of these claims, in each individual case, probably would not be more than about two thousand dollars; I think the average is about two thousand dollars a case; and there have not been more than a dozen cases as yet adjudicated by the Court of Claims; but I am informed, by one of the solicitors of the parties, that in the course of the year, there will be brought up hereafter, and that they will involve probably an appropriation of from one hundred thousand to one million dollars to pay them. The Committee on Claims at the last Congress, in investigating this decision of the Court of Claims in these duty cases, came to the conclusion that they were unjust, and ought not to be paid, and so reported; and the Senate confirmed the report of the committee.

If the bill passes in its present shape, and the construction which the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has put on it is correct, then the money appropriated will go to the payment of these cases, or similar cases, to the extent of exhausting the whole appropriation, and Congress can never exercise any supervisory authority over the judgments of the court. I am not a Senator, and I will not vote for the bill with that construction. I am willing that, to a certain limited extent, money shall be paid out of the Treasury on the judgment of the court, without coming to Congress; but in claims for large amounts, or cases which present a class of claims requiring Congress to exercise supervisory power over the appropriation. The operation of any amendment is different from that proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, which was voted down the other day. His amendment was, that the Secretary of the Treasury should estimate for the amount of judgments at the commencement of the Congress, specifying each particular judgment, and then that there should be a specific appropriation to pay each judgment. I was opposed to that; but the operation of my amendment was, to give the Secretary the duty of estimating for the amount of judgments, and then an appropriation will be passed to pay the whole amount, unless Congress shall exempt or take out from the whole amount any particular case, which it is competent for Congress to do. I do not think Congress will be in any danger of passing upon an appropriation in a case which, in the judgment of Congress, ought not to be paid.

Mr. BENJAMIN. My President, the Judiciary Committee has been a very unfortunate one. It is a bill which was originally offered by the honorable Senator from Georgia, and in which he proposed the most unlimited power over the Treasury by the Court of Claims.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just then for a moment? It is true that the bill was offered by me. It was not drawn up by me, however. It was drawn up by another gentleman, and handed to me to be presented. It did not meet my judgment, and I intended to offer an amendment, to the very effect of the bill now offered by the honorable Senator, to give power over the adjudications of the Court of Claims beyond the limit of $3,000. The gentleman who presented the bill to me begged me not to alter it in any way, but let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary just as it was drawn. That bill does not commit to the principle the gentleman is stating.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was going to observe that the committee has been very unfortunate. The bill, as presented to it, gave unlimited control over the Treasury, during the session of Congress at all events, to the Court of Claims. It was a bill that might be necessary to satisfy claims against the Government. We had all been aware here, for some years, that the Court of Claims, as established by the act which originated it, had, in fact, been of very little use in relieving the Government of legal claims. It was a year or two before it became more numerous, and which, as the great interests of this vast Republic increase, must become absolutely impossible. We cannot—it is idle to attempt it—investigate every private claim against the Government; in Congress it cannot be done. It may very well have been done in the infancy of the Republic. It may have been done at a time when there was but a small population and few States; but now, with a population such as we have, with the increase not only of the population, but of the wealth and business of the country, he who undertakes to get Congress to investigate every private claim against this Government as it ought to be investigated undertakes that which is physically impossible.

An attempt was made to get rid of that difficulty; and what was it? That we should organize a court of judges; we should establish it here in Washington, and we should give it the right to be independent of the interests of the public; and many were of opinion, when the court was organized, that we should then determine that, upon the establishment of a claim against the Government upon any basis, either of law or equity, that claim ought to be settled at once; just as if an individual is made to pay, when, by the tribunals of his country, it is found that he owes a debt. But, sir, it was an experiment—it was something as yet untried—and Congress finally determined that it would not give to the decisions of this court that conclusive effect which was claimed by some who were in favor of its establishment; but would treat it at first in the light of what the Senator from Iowa calls an examining court. It has been tried. It has been so tried, and not a single case has been decided in its result. The result is, that the Calendars of the two branches are covered with claims, in which the unfortunate litigants, from all parts of the United States, have been brought here to the seas of the Federal Government; in which they have been put to the expense of coming here, and of making good their cases; in which their cases have been argued against the Government counsel, and in which the judges appointed by the Government have declared their claims to be just; and now there is upon your slender list, I think, of some fifty or a hundred cases, in which judgments, ranging from one to four, five, six, or eight hundred dollars, are hung up, and have been hung up, for more than nine Congress, and will be hung up for Congresses to come, simply because of a want of authority in Congress, which is occupied with other and graver matters, to attend to this small litigation.

Now, sir, the proposition at the outset of this session was this: We have tried this Court of Claims; we know the judges; we have heard their decisions; and we have seen that the decisions are those men; shall we not now, having made the experiment thus far, go a little farther, and do this: relieve Congress entirely from any class of claims which appeals not to bounty, not to liberality, not to favorable consideration; but which are those which are just claims for Government for payment of what is due under the law? That was the bill that the honorable Senator from Georgia took the paternity of; and I think that he took the paternity of no disapprobation or unworthy offspring. It was a very good bill. The proposition, in the first place, that Congress should refrain from revising the judgments of this Court of Claims, because it was unable to do so; it had neither the time, the opportunity, nor the materials for the revision. These claims come up here, and they are not to be revised. They pass through the Committee on Claims, if you please; but the chairman of that committee has told you that he considers it the duty of the committee, under the law, simply to report the bills here to be passed. Who knows what they are? Who examines them? Who discusses them? Do not we at last take them all on trust?

Now the proposition is, let that trust be carried thus far: when the Court of Claims has made a final determination on cases which depend on law and equity—not upon favor, not upon bounty—let it be the duty of the Government, for the Government, if the amount of the judgment does not exceed $3,000. As the bill was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, it provided for the payment of those judgments out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. We discussed that matter in committee, and said, it will not do to allow this—not because it is not constitutional according to the idea of the Senator from Mississippi; not because we have no power to order judgments to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. We know, we have not got that power, there is scarcely an appropriation bill that ever passes the Senate that is passed in accordance with the form of the Constitution—but because we would not be able to tell how the law was operating; because we desired, by requiring from the Secretary of the Treasury, from year to year, an estimate in advance of how much money he thought he would require for the current year to meet these judgments, to keep the matter constantly under the eye of Congress, and if we ever found the appropriation growing, we would examine into the subject, and if the exercise of the power became dangerous, we would not hesitate to take steps to keep the vigilant eye of Congress on the operations of the court that we changed the appropriation clause, and, instead of leaving it in the power of the court to have its judgment paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, we required that there should be a specific appropriation to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, so that it could not exceed fifty, or one hundred, or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; that we supposed would be ample, in each year, without calling the special attention of Congress to the subject. My honorable friend from Virginia would be the first, when his bill came up, if he found the appropriations for the Court of Claims increasing, to say: "I am going to examine into this matter; these appropriations for my judgment were only one hundred thousand dollars a year, now they come up to $300,000. How happens it that the claims against the Government are growing at this rate? Let us stop this expense; let us take away the power." We have a right to take it away at any time. There is no possibility of its growing in an able and virtuous man being brought under our eyes at each succeeding session of Congress. Therefore, the Committee on the Judiciary, deeming the innovation a good one, proposed to the Senate to let the Court of Claims pay its judgments without your intervention, to let it pay its judgments without your revision.

The Senator from Georgia says he is not willing to do that. I will appeal to him whether our power is not sufficient, under the law, as it stands? Is our power, does not appear to be insufficient, to the Senate. The law, as it stands, originally creating the Court of Claims, requires the officers of that court to send us every year a report of its judgments; so that from year to year we know exactly how we stand, the amount demanded, and the amount adjudged against the Government; anything is adjudged against the Government. We have got, therefore, first, annually, that much information. We know what was claimed; we know what has been allowed. Now, the Secretary of the Treasury, in making up his annual estimates, will call upon us to make appropriations to satisfy presumed judgments that may be rendered by the Court of Claims, at as near a guess as he can make, just as he calls on us for an appropriation for the transportation of the Army; just as he calls on us for a thousand other appropriations, the exact amount of which cannot be estimated, but which he has to spend at his discretion, under the responsibilities of his position, and under the responsibility of rendering an account at the very next session of Congress.

Does the Senator from Georgia object to that? The Secretary of the Treasury, at the beginning of the year, in his estimate of appropriations, puts down, "for amount to satisfy judgments of the Court of Claims, $100,000." We pass the appropriation. We do not know what is going to be spent, but when we come together next December, the Secretary of the Treasury, by the bill, is to send in a list of all the judgments that he has satisfied of the Court of Claims, and that is to be compared by us, or by those of us who choose to do it, with the estimate. We are not in any previous session by the Court of Claims of the judgments that they had rendered, as well as those that may be rendered at the same session. We shall have, then, the report from the court of each case, the amount claimed and adjudged; we shall have from the Secretary of the Treasury the amount paid; and with all that before us, from year to year, we shall have the entire control of the subject-matter, and power to stop it at any instant, if we think there is any extravagance, or anything that we ought to check at any moment; the operation of the law constantly under our eyes, constantly under our control.

But, so far as claims go beyond $3,000, we put the Government in the same position as our suitors. The Committee on the Judiciary has recommended to Congress at the present session, by another bill which will come up, to increase the limit of all appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States to $3,000. That is the reason why we put $3,000 in this bill for appeals in cases against the Government.

Now, sir, gentlemen want to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States to $30,000, unless Congress shall revise its decision; and if the Supreme Court of the United States shall find, on appeal, that the Government is indebted twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars to a man, and shall render its final decree that that sum is due to him upon principles of law and equity, without any reference whatever to the law of the Government, that is all that is demanded, Congress is to take the decision of the Supreme Court under its charge, discuss it, revise it, and refuse the appropriation, or accord it, at its discretion. We cannot trust the Supreme Court of the United States to give a decision in a claim of $25,000, $30,000, or $40,000, between the Government and the citizen; but the Constitution vests it with exclusive original jurisdiction over controversies for empire between sovereign States. Claims are brought by the Government before that court for any amount of dollars, and that court is, finally, and without appeal, States contend for facts of country; the jurisdiction of sovereignty is involved; and your Constitution makes that tribunal the last, for there must be a final tribunal somewhere; and yet, for a few thousand dollars, we are asked to take the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States under our revision, because, forsooth, we, the members of Congress, suppose that we have the intelligence, the time, and the learning, amply sufficient to enable us to properly revise the decisions of that court.

It is supposed that we are bound to do this because of the indefinite nature of the appropriation. I do not know how to meet this argument. From the foundation of the Government the practice of Congress, the experience of the country, is so much opposed to this notion, that we have no power to make a general appropriation, that I scarcely know how to meet the argument. Did we not appropriate $3,000,000 to meet claims under the Mexican treaty? Did Congress have an appeal from every case in which the commission of dollars was decided upon our having no paid to each individual? Did we not appropriate money under the Florida treaty? Did we not give unlimited discretion? Five million my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BAKER] says—five million of these were appropriated to be distributed among the claimants according to the judgments of a special tribunal which we created; and here, when this thing has been done again and again, without the suggestion of a doubt, for immense sums, and without Congress retaining any eventual control over the disposal of the money thus appropriated, everybody here becomes horrified suddenly at loosing the purse strings at the discretion of a court, and this, too, when the appropriations are never for but one year at a time, on estimates which you may or you may not pass at any time, and which you may or you may not refuse to pass the instant that their amount exceeds one moment's suspicion or distrust.

Senators, believe me, there is no danger in this. All your apprehensions are illusory. The courts of this country may be taken care of in this extent. You cannot buy them. Their reputations are at stake in their recorded decisions which every man may read. All that they do is known and published to the world. I suppose I can show, since I have been a member of the Senate, some cases in which the Government has paid twenty or twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars to a man, by the direct order of Congress, referred to a solitary officer of the Treasury Department, to be by him determined in the quiet seclusion of his office, without the check of publicity; without the presence of an officer to sustain the side of the Government; with unlimited discretion; and to a solitary clerk in a Department has been confided by the Congress of the United States, the disposal of hundreds of thousands of dollars of public money; and yet, with no responsibility, no control, no experience, under the eye of you yourselves have a voice in appointing; with open doors; with published and printed speeches and discussion; with the entire community having a right to go in at any moment and listen to all that is going on; and finally, with the check of an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the amount is at all important; and last of all, with the necessity of coming to this Congress for appropriation to carry out its judgment, you are afraid to make a trial of a year or two with an appropriation of one or two hundred thousand dollars; and rather than do that, you will emasculate this bill; you will destroy every provision in it that has any virtue, every ray on the objects proposed, and you will bring us just back to where we started—an examination by Congress of every claim of two or three hundred dollars that may be made by an unfortunate citizen throughout the land. You have got your docket filled with them now, and with this bill, and they will accumulate year after year, because, as I started with saying, it is totally impossible for us to attend to them all, and the result will be that we shall be driven to this system in one, or two, or three years hence, after an amount of injustice has been done to the present claimants which your future legislation will be utterly incompetent to repair.

I beseech you make this experiment. Try it for a year; try it for two years; then, if there is found to be any harm in it, repeat it. If there is found in your hands; you can do with it as you please; there is no power to check you or interfere with your discretion over the matter. Let us pass the bill, and make an honest experiment of it. There is no risk in it. The few thousand dollars that may be lost, if there is a risk will be expended in the experiment. If it does not succeed, we must try something else; but, most assuredly, we cannot continue, in Congress, to entertain jurisdiction of cases of private claim. It is out of our power to do it; and we shall have to leave it to some committee eventually to do and take their reports without examination. I hope that all these amendments will be voted down, and that the bill will pass.

Mr. EVERSON. I do not wish to continue the discussion. I have expressed my opinion fully on the merits of this proposition, and the eloquent remarks of the Senator from Louisiana have not convinced me that I am wrong. I rise to say that I insist on my amendment, to insert the words "thereafter to be," so that Congress can retain jurisdiction of the case.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) The amendment is in section four, line seven, after the word "appropriation," to insert the words "thereafter to be," so that it will read:

In all cases of final judgment by said court, or on appeal by the said Supreme Court, where the same is in favor of the claimant, the sum due thereby shall be paid out of any general appropriation thereafter to be made by law for the payment and satisfaction of private claims.

Mr. EVERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. DAVIS. In the earlier part of the day, a discussion arose between Senators as to whether the bill in its present form required money to be paid out of a general appropriation, or whether an appropriation was to be made to satisfy particular judgments. The Senator from Wisconsin addressed himself to it at an early part of the day. It is quite clear that estimates, when they are spoken of in strict legal language are in anticipation of our Government is conducted on estimates. Each year a Department presents a sum which will meet the probable expenditures of the current year, and an appropriation is made to cover them. The question before us, in the view which is now presented of it, is whether or not we are to pay by advance in advance for claims to be submitted to the Court of Claims? I must confess myself opposed to it, notwithstanding the able exposition which has been made by the Senator from Louisiana.

I have looked upon the Court of Claims as a well-organized committee for the examination of cases which are to come before the Senate; that they were to examine the law and the facts more fully than a committee of the Senate might do, and then the case to be presented to the Senate for an appropriation, and an appropriation, which should be found to be due. The present bill places it on a new footing, as a judgment rendered and money to be paid upon it, limited, however, to an appropriation which shall be made upon an estimate. I do not think that the court contract, and that the citizen was entitled to separation; but the mode in which the claim was made did not intimate in the remotest degree the amount which the damages would come to, if the breaches of contract that were alleged were held to be sufficient. I sent for the party, who was in Washington, and I told him that I thought it right to be before the committee, and I told the committee, that I should know exactly the whole of the facts of the case, and I asked him why his petition did not contain a statement of the amount of his damages, so that we might have the means of knowing what sum we were to appropriate out of the Treasury. And this was his answer: "The amount of my claim will be about forty thousand dollars; and if I had stated in that petition that the damages were $40,000, I should either have had to pay away from one half to two thirds of the amount to the claim agents of Washington, or they would have defrauded my bill."

I believe it is true. I believe it to have been so at any time in the past history of this Government. As Congress deals with claims, especially large ones, these are the influences which are to be taken into account by the members of Congress through Congress. Can they be in a court? The Government is represented there; the question is discussed openly on both sides. How many members of this body ever examine into the merits of private claims? In my own experience, when I have been on committees, I have heard bills introduced by members, referred to the committee, and on that committee, the bill referred for examination to the very member who introduced it. Can you expect a judicial investigation here in a case like that? I mean to impeach the integrity of so many. It is a corrupt system, though. It is a system, too, in my judgment, at war with the intent of the Constitution; which was, that the justice of the country, between the State and the individual, should be administered judicially, just as well just between the citizen and the State. That is the great object of this bill; and if the amendment of the Senator from Georgia prevails, the object is to give a review power over the administration of justice between the State and the individual, to the Congress of the United States. It destroys the bill, and it passes the bill. I have said before, and I say now, that if it does not pass, and the principle is tried, which I think is undeniable, that justice ought to be administered as justice and as a judicial act, whether it is between the State and the citizen, or man and man, I believe the Government is bound to do so, and give a fair trial to this mode of administering justice.

I will only add further, that in the past history of our country, for the first eleven years of the existence of the Government, there were about ninety-six acts passed in reference to private claims; and you will hardly find a solitary one of them that was not merely a gratuity, or in the nature of a gratuity; and at that time, the course always was, when a claim upon the Government was presented, it is proved, we were told, court here, guarded by counsel on your own side—and by the examination of testimony on both sides—when a claim was presented to Congress, it was referred, according to the practice that existed in England, to the head of the Executive Department to which it related, and a decision was made, and it was paid by him, without any reference to an investigation by Congress. That was departed from Congress, with that tendency which always exists in a legislative body to encroach on all other powers, judicial and executive, actually advanced step by step, until they undertook to decide on private claims against the Government, and those decisions necessarily were based, not upon the justice of the claim, not upon its proof, but upon the tact with which a claim was managed, whether by outside influence or inside influence; upon money, and a thousand other things; and the real merits of the claim were voted upon and decided constantly by Senators without knowing what the subject-matter was upon which they decided.

MR. BENTLEY. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Delaware, like his bill, all indicate the character which is well known to belong to that Senator—a profound lawyer, and a righteous man. He puts the Government in the attitude of an individual. He permits the claimant to institute his suit. He revolts from the idea of referring the case to the legislative body, which he considers the least of all fit to judge on the merits of a claim. In that I agree. We are, of all bodies, perhaps the least fit to judge of the merits of a claim, or to investigate it. But, as the case now stands, under the existing law, the Court of Claims performs that labor for us. The Congress reserves to itself the payment of the decision made by the court; and suffers from the case of the individual in this: Governments do not allow themselves to be sued; first, because they cannot allow judgments to run against them; secondly, because it must be within the discretion of the legislative body whether they will appropriate money in satisfaction of just claims or not. Public necessity, the condition of the Treasury, may render it absolutely necessary that we should postpone the payment of claims. Therefore, we cannot appropriate money in advance. We cannot say that we will pay all just claims against us when presented, or upon judgment of a court; because the public necessity may overrule that strict rule of justice which the Senator from Delaware has so forcibly and so justly presented to our view.

I adhere, therefore, to the existing system. I am not in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, because his amendment is in conflict with the bill; it destroys the bill; it is not at all in harmony with it to insert that amendment. The proposition which we have to decide, I think, is, whether Congress shall reserve to itself the right to appropriate money in satisfaction of private claims after they shall have been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, or whether we shall assume that a decision of the Court of Claims is to stand as a judgment against the Government, as it might be, and follow the course against an individual. In the latter position, it is quite clear to me that it makes no distinction whether we appropriate money upon estimates, or whether we appropriate it upon a report of judgments which have been rendered by the court. If we follow the bill, we are bound by the judgment; we are bound by the bill; in my estimation, at least, whether it be upon an estimate or upon a report, the obligation is upon that which we cannot avoid it by delay. If, however, we reserve to ourselves the right to determine the amount of the claims, and we decide in the way that the Court of Claims as nothing more than a committee legally advised and constituted, so as to inquire fully into the merits of the case, and prevent us from falling into those errors which legislative bodies are so liable to fall into, the cause is before the Government, as well stated by the Senator from Delaware, then, I think, we pursue the safer policy; and I wish to have this Court of Claims tried by a greater number of years, before we run the hazard to which we shall be subjected under the existing bill. I do not at all recollect to the change, that the Senator from Virginia says we can repeal the law and abolish the court. I am unwilling to go back to the old method of referring claims to committees, to be adjudicated in the Senate and House of Representatives, with the exception of the Court of Claims in existence, and therefore I am careful how I expose it to the hazard which may in the ensuing year bring me to the necessity of repeating it entirely.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to be understood as making any remark which tends to an amendment providing that when the amount to be paid out of the Treasury should exceed $20,000, it ought to be specifically appropriated by Congress, that I had not confidence in the ability or integrity of the judges of the courts to which Senators refer. I say that would be the practical operation in all small claims? The practical operation of the amendment would be, if this bill is to pass at all, that the smaller claims would be disposed of without coming to Congress at all; and, practically, that they would be referred to the court, at the same time, it is not out of distrust to the court, but because the Constitution imposes on us the responsibility of appropriating the money out of the Treasury, that I would insist, at all events, where any considerable amount was to be appropriated, to exceed $20,000, that we give out—that it should be a specific appropriation, and not to be taken out of money appropriated in advance, which system might involve us to the amount of millions: It is said around me that there are five or six millions of claims pending in that court now.

MR. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, how can one dollar go out that we had not appropriated? If millions are called for, we will say "no."

MR. DOOLITTLE. How can you say "no" after the judgment is rendered against you, and the faith of the Government is pledged?

MR. BENJAMIN. The money appropriated is made in advance, just as we are doing now, and just as the Senator from Mississippi proposes. If there is a judgment against the Government of $5,000,000, and we have not got the money, then we will say we will not appropriate, but we will make some provision to satisfy the claimant, by offering him interest.

MR. DOOLITTLE. But I understand the effect of the bill to be that if the judgment of the court is that we are indebted $5,000,000, on this bill as it stands, the faith of this Government is pledged, and the Senator and I are bound to pay it. The difference is the appropriation, because the faith of the Government is pledged.

MR. BENJAMIN. Are we not refusing to vote appropriation every day where the faith of the Government is pledged? Do not tell me that the Government pledged to pay every man what we owe him, whether it is ascertained by the judgment of a court or not? and do we not refuse to pay when we have not got the money? Did not the President of the United States visit the French capital, and express to the French Emperor that we had not money, that we were engaged in a foreign war, and could not pay? It merely puts the parties in the ordinary position of one who has a claim against a person who cannot pay, and entitles him to interest on equitable principles.

MR. DOOLITTLE. The difference is in the relation to a claim which is not yet settled and determined, and which belongs to Congress to settle and determine, our faith is not pledged until we have determined it; but here we provide by law for a tribunal that may determine the amount of the claims, and we decide in the very law that, when it is determined, it is final as against us—so much due; and we can no more repudiate it than a bond against the United States.

MR. BENJAMIN. Does not the Senator perceive that it is in the bill that the Senator says that, in the case proposed by the bill, the faith of the Government is pledged, and therefore we have no right to refuse an appropriation; but he proposes to refuse an appropriation, not because we do not have the money, but by refraining from deciding it, because Congress has not yet decided. According to those ethics, all we have to do is never to decide on the claim, and then our faith is not pledged; the moment it is decided, we are bound to pay it.

MR. DOOLITTLE. That is not the effect of the amendment, for if we put the provision in the bill, the money is not due by the language of the bill, unless Congress shall appropriate it; and our faith is not pledged in advance to the payment of the judgment. But if we say this court is to render judgments, and we are bound to pay them, the provision by Congress, our faith becomes absolutely pledged, and we are just as much bound as if a man held a bond against the Government; but when we retain the supervisory power, it is different. I mentioned the sum of $20,000, because I thought that it would be more convenient and more expeditious, in disposing of the smaller claims against the Government under $20,000, to allow the decision to be absolute against the Government. We could not be defrauded or injured or imposed upon; but when the sum exceeds $20,000, in stating the bill that the amount of Congress is required, and then the claimant understands that the faith of the Government is not pledged until Congress has passed upon it, and said they will pay it. Think it seems to me, is the distinction.

MR. GRAY. Mr. President, I need not give further evidence that this bill ought not to pass than the diversity of opinions that seem to prevail among its friends as to the proper construction of it; but I wish to ask some of its friends a question, which I have just occurred to me. Suppose it should be decided that the bill was not the forward duty, with which reference has been made, should be refunded, (and the gross amount of those duties, as I understand, is upwards of three million dollars,) and so that the Senator from Rhode Island—while the individual claims are only about two thousand dollars, as a general thing, or less than three thousand, the amount necessary to authorize an appeal) this court goes on, and decides that the $300,000 that was appropriated in the next session of Congress, there, then, is that amount of existing judgments rendered against the United States in favor of individuals throughout the country; and to whom is the one or two hundred thousand dollars that you have appropriated in the general appropriation bill to be paid? How is it to be distributed among those several claimants? Is there any provision in the bill by which there is to be a pro rata distribution; or are those who first come to receive the whole money? I should like to have the friends of the bill state to us how that is.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa as asking a question? Will he repeat his question? I did not understand it exactly. I was saying something to a friend next me.

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose the claims of those individuals who now claim the refunding of drawbacks, paid on account of spirituous liquors, shall all be allowed by the Court of Claims; the individual claims, as I understand, are generally less than three thousand dollars; but the aggregate amount exceeds, I am told by the Senator from Rhode Island, probably three million. Suppose that before the next session of Congress all those claims should be allowed; would you have appropriated in a general appropriation bill one or two hundred thousand dollars to meet the decisions of the court; under the provisions of this bill, to whom is the $300,000 to be paid? Is it to be distributed pro rata among the several claimants; or is it to be paid to those who have judgments, or is it to be paid to those in whose favor the first judgments are rendered?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator from Iowa, I beg his pardon, certainly has not read the bill. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the judgments as they are rendered, and presented to him for payment; and when he has got through with his appropriation, he will stop, and he cannot pay any more until Congress shall give him more money to pay with. That is perfectly plain. The bill says so. The question does not arise.

Mr. IVEISON. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana one question, if he will allow me. Suppose that, after the $300,000, or any other amount appropriated, shall be exhausted, and there is left a million and a half or two million of judgments; how are they to be paid? Of course, the next Congress must make an appropriation; and according to this bill and the construction put by the Senator from Virginia, Congress is bound to make an appropriation. Therefore, we might as well take the original bill and provide that every judgment of the Court of Claims to be hereafter rendered shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury that otherwise appears to be lawfully due and owing to the same thing precisely. You make an appropriation of two or three hundred thousand dollars; that is exhausted, leaving a large amount of judgments unpaid; and the next session, by law, as well as the next Congress, you are bound to appropriate to pay the balance.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will answer the Senator. Suppose the Senator were to put to me this question, which would, of course, be still more startling; suppose the next Court to adjudicate, during the summer, $10,000,000,000 of judgments; how are they to be paid? I simply say there is no such possibility. If he puts the question that the court may give millions of judgments before the next Congress, I answer him that the experience of the years shows the thing to be an impossibility; and therefore we do not provide for it. I will tell him, further, that no possible series of cases of that kind could ever be brought before us from the Court of Claims. You cannot make up any series of claims that would require the millions of dollars with no claim amounting to $3,000. That is all moonshine. So far as the question arises about the return of duties, as they have been spoken of to-day, I will say this, though it is going off on a collateral subject, and would not come on Claims, in reporting against these drawback duties, which I have no more doubt are due by this Government than that I stand here, has assured to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and I further say to my knowledge, Congress has never agreed to the report of the committee; and I cannot believe it will do such monstrous injustice as to agree to it. I have examined these cases; they have been sent to my committee, and I further say to my knowledge, to see that, in defiance of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in defiance of the decision of the Court of Claims, the Committee on Claims has reported to Congress that, where a claim imports a case of liquor which, at the start from the foreign port, contained no distilled gallons, but when it reached the port of delivery had lost half of it by leakage, and there remained fifty gallons brought into the country, he shall pay duty on the one hundred gallons with which he started from abroad, or else that he shall not have his goods brought into the country at all; for that is the whole question in these drawback cases.

The Secretary of the Treasury, over and over again, made men pay duties on goods that never reached the country; that were lost at sea; lost by leakage, or from some other cause. The Supreme Court of the United States held, when the amount was large enough to go to it, that the Government was not right in not paying the claimant; and that he had paid under protest, or without protest, went to the Court of Claims, and asked to have their money paid back. That court, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in its judgments rendered according to the plain principles of justice, determined that the money had been wrongfully exacted and ought to be given up; and that case is brought up here as an illustration of the millions upon millions of dollars we are going to pay.

I am sorry that I have been led into this collateral subject, because it will bring up half a dozen speeches again about it. I did not intend to refer to it, but it has been spoken of three or four times already in the debate, and that is the whole case of the drawback claims.

Now, as regards the pension claims, that class of claims under pension laws was provided for by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], which we adopted. Our bill is substantially correct, and it is based upon money on principles of law and on principles of equity; to cases where you could go into court and make an individual pay. In those cases, we say, the Government ought not to take advantage of its position, and should be made to do justice.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should not now say anything about this bill, because I once said a few words about it, if the Senator from Louisiana had not referred to a report of the Committee on Claims, or if he had stated the report of the case as it was. The case he refers to was no such case as he thinks. It was not a question of drawback at all; nor had it ever been to the Supreme Court. The case was an application for a refund of duties on goods imported, and it was upon the idea of our charging for a whole cask of liquor when half of it had leaked out. In the case that we examined, all such deductions had been made at the custom-house, where there was no question of drawback. The question was, whether, when a merchant imported goods, and insisted upon making his rest in his account as to the charges that should go on them in the foreign port, he could, when he stopped having that increased in the charges, insist the natural result in the voyage. That was the question, and the Secretary of the Treasury had, as we thought clearly, decided undoubtedly that, upon the importation of a cargo of merchandise, the rest in the account should be made in the foreign port where they were on ship-board; and that they could claim no allowance for waste after that; because it was for the benefit of the importer that the rest should be made in the account at the place of exportation, and that no additional charges should be made. Had the importer taken the other side of it, we concluded they were bound to take the other, too, and not let us keep losing, and they gaining, without our getting the compensating advantage of the voyage; and I do not believe any one of us would have expected the Government to take to say that there is any equitable or just claim upon the part of any one of those men for the return of those duties.

I think it must be some other case that the Senator refers to. I know it was not this one that was decided. I agree that there will get precedents established, and go on from one thing to another, until they take all the money there is in the Treasury. The report of the committee was unanimous, and the Secretary of the Treasury was with us, against both the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court, but we did not examine any such question as the Senator supposes.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) THE QUESTION on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVEISON].

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Cameron, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Fish, Grimes, Hiram, Harris, Fremont, Johnson of Tennessee, Simmons, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Chas. C. Clay, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Douglass, Fremont, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Gracie, Hammond, Humphreys, Hunter, Knapp, Latham, Mathews, Nicholson, Paine, Powell, Rice, Thompson, Tombs, Wigfall, and Wilson—33.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now renew the amendment which I offered to insert at the end of section four:

And provided further, That in all cases when the amount allowed in the claimant shall exceed the sum of $20,000, the claimant shall be required to pay an additional specific appropriation by Congress thereto.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. If the object of the Senator from Wisconsin be to give the power to render a final judgment in cases under that amount, and he would so vary it, I should concur with him, or even a smaller amount, if by the bill as it now stands, the power of the court to render final judgment, then, I do not see that we have any right to withhold payment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This proviso is, that it shall not be paid or payable without a specific appropriation by Congress; which, I think, would imply a specific power on the part of Congress. The word "payable" is used for that purpose.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bingham, Cameron, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Fish, Grimes, Hiram, Harris, Fremont, Johnson of Tennessee, Rice, Latham, Mallory, Simmons, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Brown, Chas. C. Clay, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Douglass, Fremont, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Gracie, Hammond, Humphreys, Hunter, Latham, Mason, Powell, Seidlitz, Thompson, Tombs, Wilson, and Yates—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I have an additional section to offer:

And be it further enacted, That whenever any person is sued in any Federal court by the United States, he shall have leave to file in said court, and if upon the trial it be ascertained that a balance is due him, and the judge who tried the case shall be satisfied that such balance is due, the court shall have power to order the amount to be paid to him, and an presentation in the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the same, and the said amount shall be paid to the person entitled to receive the same, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

By this bill you propose to open the Treasury to suitors who go into the Court of Claims as plaintiffs. Now I simply propose that, in the Federal courts of the Union, where you compel a person to go in when you sue him, if there is a balance found due him on oath, and the judge who tries the case is satisfied with the finding—and that is in one of your own judges, a Federal judge, and the suit decided by a Federal officer, on the finding of a jury, certified by the judge that it is correct—the defendant shall have the same privilege that your suitor, the plaintiff, has here.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say, before the vote is announced, that the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. CALDWELL], being despondent, desired to retire from the Chamber. He being altogether for this bill, and I altogether opposed to it, I paired off with him.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Cameron, Chandler, Doolittle, Durkee, Grimes, Hale, Hiram, Johnson of Ten-

seene, King, Latham, Simmons, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson.

YEA'S—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Chace, Clay, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Ford, Foster, Gale, Hammond, Harsh, Hunter, Johnson, Kearney, Lane, Mallory, Mason, Nicholson, Pease, Powell, Rice, Sebastian, Smith, Thompson, Wigfall, Wilson, and Yates—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

MR. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment, in an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the second and third sections of an act entitled "As Act to prevent frauds upon the Treasury of the United States," approved February 18, 1853, shall not apply to any claim of claims that may be prosecuted against the United States in the Court of Claims.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. ANTHONY, MR. COLLAMER, and others. What are those provisions?

MR. HARLAN. I will send them to the desk and have them read in connection with the eighth section.

The Secretary read the second and third sections of the act of February 26, 1853, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the United States, or person holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under, or in connection with, any Executive Department, or any other office of the United States, or under the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, who, after the passage of this act, shall act as an agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim against the United States, or shall, in any manner, or by any means otherwise than in the discharge of his proper official duties, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, or shall receive any gratuity, or any share of or interest in any claim from any claimant against the United States with intent to aid or assist, or in consideration of having aided or assisted, in the prosecution of such claim, shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor. In any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, or both, as the court in its discretion shall adjudge.

And be it further enacted, That any Senator or Representative in Congress, who, after the passage of this act, shall, for compensation paid or to be paid, certain or uncertain, act as an agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim or claims against the United States, or shall, in any manner, or by any means, for such compensation, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, or shall receive any gratuity, or any share of or interest in any claim from any claimant against the United States with intent to aid or assist, or in consideration of having aided or assisted, in the prosecution of such claim, shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor. In any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding one year, or both, as the court in its discretion shall adjudge.

MR. HALE. Let the Secretary read the eighth section of the act, and gentlemen will see that it does not apply to courts. It will show the necessity of the amendment.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That nothing in the second and third sections of this act contained shall be construed to apply to the prosecution or defense of any action or suit in any judicial court of the United States."

MR. BENJAMIN. I hope that amendment will be accepted. I think it is a very proper one.

MR. CHUTEYENDEN. Why was it not accepted? I do not know. The decision of the court is made conclusive. It can never come back here, so that a member of this body can vote on it here. I am sure I feel no interest in it, but I see no reason for such a provision; none at all. I hope it will not be accepted.

MR. BAYARD. I am willing to agree to the amendment.

MR. HARLAN. If the amendment is acceptable to the friends of the bill, I am willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

THE PRESIDENT OFFICER (MR. FRYBARNCK in the chair). The call for the yeas and nays shall be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

The question being put, the Presiding Officer declared the amendment adopted.

Several Senators called for a division.

MR. HARLAN. I renew the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. DAVIS. I hope we shall not have a call of the yeas and nays. If the yeas and nays will apply to this class of officers, there can be no objection to making it applicable.

MR. HARLAN. I understood some Senator to call for a division. I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate in calling the roll on it if it be acceptable; if not, however, I desire to record my vote in favor of the amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 40, nays 6, as follows:

YEA'S—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Chace, Clay, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Little, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Ford, Foster, Gove, Hale, Harsh, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Kearney, King, Lane, Latham, Mallory, Mason, Nicholson, Pease, Rice, Sebastian, Simmons, Sillid, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Thompson, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—40.

NAY'S—Messrs. Chase, Chace, Crittenden, Green, Hammond, and Wigfall—6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time. It was read the third time; and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

MR. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 16, as follows:

YEA'S—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Chace, Clay, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Ford, Foster, Green, Hammond, Harsh, Kearney, Lane, Latham, Mallory, Mason, Nicholson, Pease, Powell, Rice, Sebastian, Sumner, Thompson, Ten Eyck, Wilson, and Yates—34.

NAY'S—Messrs. Benjamin, Cameron, Chandler, Davis, Donlin, Durkee, Hale, Harsh, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, King, King, King, Simmons, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by MR. FORNEY, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 304) inviting proposals for carrying the entire mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States in one line; and

A bill (No. 326) to establish mail routes in the Territory of Kansas.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

MR. HUNTER. I now move to take up the West Point appropriation bill, so that we may adjourn upon it, and have it as the first business in order for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5) making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1861.

MR. HUNTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 13, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, Mr. Prayer of the Chaplain, Rev. Thomas J. Stockton.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to the resolution of the House of the 12th March, 1860, requesting estimates of sums necessary to complete the capitol and penitentiary buildings in New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ANNE M. SMITH AND OTHERS.

On motion of MR. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 73, for the relief of Mrs. Anne M. Smith, widow of the late Brevet Major-General Persifer F. Smith; Mrs. Harriet B. Macomb, widow of Major General Alexander Macomb; and Mrs. Ambella Riley, widow of Brevet Major General Henry Riley, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MR. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay it on the table to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. AGATHA O'BRIEN.

THE SPEAKER also laid before the House

Senate bill No. 260, for the relief of Mrs. Agatha O'Brien, widow of Brevet Major J. P. J. O'Brien, late of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

POINT COUPÉE.

THE SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bill No. 258, granting to the parish of Point Coupée, Louisiana, certain tracts of land in said parish; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE AND FINAL PROCESS.

MR. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill to provide for the execution of means and final process of courts of the United States.

There was no objection; and the bill was received, and read a first and second time by its title.

MR. HAMILTON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

DISCHARGE OF COMMITTEE.

MR. SCOTT. I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the specific bill, in which I had the honor to introduce, and that was referred to said committee, and that it be referred to the select committee appointed to take into consideration the question of a Pacific railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

OLIVER BASCOMB.

MR. McKEAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the claim of Oliver Bascomb, assignee of Edward Lumber, for services in taking care of a dredge-haul for the United States at Waterbury, in the State of New York, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I move to take up the motion to reconsider the vote by which a bill introduced by me, in February, to increase the appropriation for arming the militia of the United States, was referred to the Committee on the Militia; and upon that motion I desire to address the House for a few moments.

THE SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read. It is a bill (H. R. No. 85) to amend an act of April 23, 1860, entitled "An act making provision for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States."

MR. TOMPKINS. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM. I have the floor on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether it is strictly in order here to discuss anything but the issues of the day.

Does it not strike the attention of the House the question of slavery; but at the hazard of being deemed singular, if not disorderly, I propose to depart now, for a little while, from the beaten pathway of debate. This motion, sir, to reconsider opens up the general merits of the proposed measure, and I ask the attention of the House for about fifteen minutes, while I explain it; I will not detain you longer, and that I may not, I desire to speak without interruption.

MR. SPEAKER, if there was any one sentiment more deeply fixed in the minds of those who founded this Republic, than that of the necessity of standing armies. It passed into a maxim among them that large military establishments in time of peace were dangerous to liberty. That maxim remains to this day in the bill of rights in many of our State constitutions. It has left its impress also upon the policy and legislation of this Government to the present time, when, with twelve thousand miles of land and water frontier, encircling three million square miles, we have a standing army numbering less than twelve thousand men. We have not a single statute the very more sensitive to national honor, or more awake to the necessity of national defense. Hostile to standing armies, but zealous to provide for the public safety, they looked to the MILITIA of the several States for protection against foreign and son, in his annual message of November, 1868,

and, under the acts of March 10 and April 23, respecting arms, the difficulty of procuring them from abroad during the present situation and disposition of Europe, induced us to direct our whole efforts to the source of internal supply. The public factories have, therefore, been enlarged, additional machinery erected, and in proportion as articles are required, found, their effect is already more than doubled, may be increased so as to keep pace with the yearly falling of the militia."

And yet, sir, so far from carrying out the purpose for which your public factories, if not established, were at least enlarged, and even then more than doubled, Congress has permitted them to be used almost wholly to supply the demands of the regular army; and the annual appropriation, instead of being made to keep pace with the yearly increase of the militia, remains now in this, the fifty-second year from the date of the act, still at the $200,000 at which it was first established.

Sir, Congress has been utterly derelict in its duty, and in every particular, in regard to the militia; and, by your neglect, you have forced the States to organize and discipline, and now, at last, to appropriate money out of their own treasuries for the purchase of arms. Virginia has done it, and Maryland, the other day, appropriated $70,000 for that purpose. I repeat, that it is unjust, burdensome, and oppressive. But if you will accept your power and your duty in this particular, at least give your consent—and the Constitution provides for it—that each State may "keep ships and ships' war in time of peace," and thus may participate, to some extent, at least, in this the highest exercise of sovereignty known to independent States.

I have moved, sir, to reconsider the vote referring the bill before the House to the Committee on the Militia; but, if the chairman of that committee desires that it should remain where it is, I will not insist; and, trusting that it will be speedily reported back and passed, I will withdraw the motion to reconsider. Otherwise, I would prefer that, this bill, inasmuch as it provides for the appropriation of money, and, therefore, under the rule, go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, should be referred to that committee at once.

THE SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman will have leave to withdraw the motion.

YALLANDIGHAM. I insist upon it, if no objection is made.

THE SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred to the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. YALLANDIGHAM. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Militia.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has withdrawn his motion to reconsider, and the bill stands referred to that committee already.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, through Mr. HIEZKY, its Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution suspending the operation of the fifth section of "An act making appropriations to defray the deficiencies for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and in part for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1861," being the section relating to printing.

Also, that the President had approved the following Senate bills, &c.:

A resolution giving the consent of Congress to Captain William B. Shulzick to accept a sword presented to him by Captain General and President Urquiza, of the Argentine Confederation.

An act for the relief of William B. Herriek."

An act to extend the provisions of "An act to enable the State of Arkansas and other States to reclaim the swamp lands within their limits" to Missouri and Oregon, and for other purposes.

Also, that the President had ordered the printing of the usual number of copies of the resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of the enactment of a law to provide for the military instruction of the uniformed volunteer companies of each State—ordered twenty minutes past one o'clock, March 12, 1860.

FALSE TRADE-MARKS, &C.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to prevent and punish fraud in the use of false stamps, brands, labels, or trade-marks; of which notice was given yesterday.

Mr. GROW. I object, and call for the regular order of business, which is the call of committees for reports.

MAILS ACROSS THE CONTINENT.

THE SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports; and that a question was a question was to submit to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill (H. R. No. 304) inviting proposals for carrying the entire mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States on one line, which motion was pending when the last call of committees was made.

Mr. COLFAX. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and move the previous question on the passage of the bill. But I desire to state that I will answer, very frankly and cheerfully, any questions which may be asked by the gentleman from Texas, or by any other gentleman, in reference to this bill. It is a plain and simple bill, inviting proposals for carrying the entire mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States on one single line. On the 4th of March last, when Congress adjourned, the Government was paying over two million dollars for carrying the mails between the Atlantic and Pacific States, upon a number of lines. The Postmaster General retrenched that service; yet it now costs over one million three hundred thousand dollars. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads believe that the entire mails can be carried, overland, in twenty days, which is several days less time than is now consumed in their transportation, and for considerably less than one million dollars.

THE SPEAKER does not bind the Government or the Department to accept any of the bids that may be made under this bill. It simply provides that the Postmaster General shall advertise immediately for proposals for carrying the entire mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States from any point on the Mississippi or Missouri rivers, to be designated by the bidders, and over such route as they may designate, to the city of San Francisco, in California, in each direction daily, in twenty days; also, for proposals for tri-weekly service, to the same point, and over such route as they may designate, to the city of San Francisco. The Postmaster General is directed to also invite proposals to carry the letter mail, and all printed matter on which letter postage is prepaid, twice a week in each direction; and the newspaper mail to be carried through, in that case, weekly, within thirty days; the contractor having the privilege of sending public documents and magazines by the ocean route to San Francisco, at their own expense, and to be taken through in thirty days from New York. He also invites proposals for carrying the mails semi-weekly, or weekly from New York or New Orleans to San Francisco. These proposals are to be received by the Postmaster General up to the 25th day of May, and within three days thereafter are to be laid by him before Congress for their consideration, the Government reserving the right to reject any or all of these bids that they may proper. It also provides that the contractors are invited to propose for carrying the mails by a branch line to Denver City, and also to Great Salt Lake City, if the line does not run through these places, and thus to supply the mails to the gold region of western Kansas and the Territories. The service is to commence, if the bids are accepted by Congress, which is the only power that will have a right to accept them, on the 1st of August, or as soon thereafter as possible, and to continue for four years. Now I will answer any questions that gentlemen desire to ask me.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a few observations on this bill.

Mr. COLFAX. Let me add one thing further. As the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. STEVENS) declared the other day, it is essential, if we are to pass at all, and if the Government is to ascertain what the mails can be carried for overland daily, that it should pass at once, because delay will prevent giving sufficient time to receive bids, and for Congress to act upon them at the present season.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say, in reference to this bill, that it will be seen, from the reading of it, that it contemplates the destruction of the existing mail service on all the routes between the Atlantic and Pacific States. It goes upon the idea that the object of the mail service across the continent is purely the transmission of the letter mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States. It ignores the idea of the assistance of the commercial settlements in the Territories, and on the borders of the States, which are now supplied by the great mail routes extending across the continent. As it is now, there is a mail route, I believe, on the forty-second parallel, which supplies not only the overland mails across the continent, but is also passed by that route, but also important points in the border States on this side of the plains, and a portion of the State of California; it is for the convenience both of the Army and of the settlements between the States on this side of the plains and California. Then we have a route passing through Utah, which supplies a part of the western portion of the State of Missouri, and the various settlements in the Territories, including Utah, and in a part of the eastern portion of the State of California; it also affords many facilities for detachments of the Army contiguous to the route.

Then we have another route, extending from St. Louis and Memphis, through the State of Arkansas, through the northern part of Texas, through the southern part of New Mexico, entering the southern part of California, and passing up through that State to San Francisco. That route supplies mail facilities to the settlements through Arkansas, through the northern and western portions of Texas, all along the southern boundary of our territory bordering Mexico, through the southern part of California, and up through the State of California, to San Francisco.

It supplies the means of communicating with those detachments of the Army which are posted along the line. It performs what is a duty to the people of the United States, and to the frontier States. Now, the principle involved in this bill, and which looks to the destruction of these several lines, I wish it understood, ignores and overlooks the duty incumbent on Congress to supply mail facilities to the frontier States and Territories of our country. If the people who forego the advantages of civilization; the people who abandon homes of peace and quietude in the older States, and go into the wilderness, suffer its privations, feel the forests, encounter hostile Indians, redoubt the elements of nature, and, in addition, and advance the great interests and progress of our nation—these people, who encounter perils such as you in the older States are strangers to, ought not to be treated as this bill contemplates treating them, by withdrawing even the poor boon of mail facilities.

Sir, the prominent routes across the continent have more to do than to carry letters from the prosperous merchants of the city of New York to those in the city of San Francisco. They perform a duty which Congress owes to these pioneer settlers, who are redoubting the elements of nature, and bringing in into a state of improvement; preparing it as a receptacle for the emigrants of the country, and to be the future happy homes of the vast millions yet to people that country. I tell you, sir, that this bill is a bill to destroy the means to the intelligence, the patriotism, and the sense of justice of this Congress. It seeks to abolish the only means of mail facilities to the people of the various border States and Territories, and to the various detachments of the Army extending all over these broad plains.

Too little, in the policy of this Government, is thought of the condition of the people who occupy the vast plains between the organized States in the Mississippi valley and those upon the Pacific ocean. If a measure comes up to give a bonus, by constitutional action, to the manufacturers of the East, who live in luxury, to give bonuses to the commerce of rich merchants whose vessels float on the ocean—

Mr. COLFAX. I would remind the gentleman from Texas that I would give it to the gentleman to ask a question, not to argue the tariff.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not going to argue the tariff, and I shall be through in a moment. I was going on to say, that if a measure comes up to give a bonus to the owners of the merchant ships, or to the iron manufacturers, or to the legislature for the wealthy and privileged classes of the country, they can always be received with favor here in this House. But, sir, when we come to the lonely pioneer, the man who perils life; the man who encounters the savage hostility of Indians; the man who is engaged in redeeming the forest of the country and advancing the standard of civilization—when he asks for the poor boon of the protection of the Army and of having the provision question referred to his friends in homes of peace, and to receive encouragement from friends and relatives, he is denied that boon by the Congress of the United States. Will such a measure receive the sanction of Congress? Can it be passed through under the pressure of the provision question without consideration of how far it will affect the interests of the country? I trust not. I trust the bill will be defeated. It will break up the existing mail contracts, and do the greatest injustice to a large portion of the country.

Mr. COLFAX. I listened with great attention to the gentleman from Texas, but allow me to say to him that had he yesterday voted for the noble boon of homesteads on the public lands to actual settlers, his speech would have been more convincing.

Now let me say a few words in regard to the points which he has made. This bill does not strike down a single mail route in the country. It simply invites proposals, and leaves it to Congress to decide whether they will accept or reject them—whether they will make a new route, or overland on a daily route, and have, if Congress please, as many mail routes besides, for the frontier settlements, as the estimate of the Treasury will admit. It does not strike down a single mail line in the country.

Mr. BURCH. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. COLFAX. Well, but not a speech.

Mr. BURCH. I merely want to make a suggestion. I believe that if the gentleman presses a vote on this bill to-day, the greater number of those representing the people will vote against it; and I would therefore suggest the propriety of referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, if the will allow me, I will submit that motion.

Mr. COLFAX. To refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would be to insure its defeat. If the House desires to kill the bill, they can do so. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have reported the bill because they deem it to be right. They deem it to be just that we should do this; that we should consult this information, which we can procure in no other way. They have performed their duty, and they now ask the House to do theirs. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York, who, I see, desires to ask a question.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the passage of this bill will not interfere with the existing contracts for carrying the mail on the routes over which the mail is now carried, some of which, I think, have served for ten years to run. I wish to know whether, in all of that of Butterfield—entered into by the Post Office Department, has now some three or four years to run. For one, I will not consent to do any act which shall interfere with that contract.

Mr. COLFAX. I will answer the gentleman from New York, that this bill does not, of itself, interfere with any contract. It simply to obtain information. And I will suggest to the gentleman from New York, that it is quite possible that Butterfield may be the lowest bidder, in which case, it will of course dismember Congress on that subject. I will now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas, who, I see, also desires to propound some questions to me.

Mr. HINDMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the bill contemplated by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that the effect of the passage of this bill will be to abrogate the present mail service to the Pacific, if any of the bids invited are accepted by the Post Office Department or by Congress?

Mr. COLFAX. I reply to the gentleman from Arkansas, that it is contemplated by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads that these bids shall be laid before Congress, and that Congress shall, during the present session, when such bids shall have been received, determine whether they will, instead of the present service over so many routes to the Pacific, coining, at their full cost, price, over two millions dollars, provide for a daily mail overland, which shall cost less than one million dollars. I now call the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HINDMAN. I must say that the gentleman from Indiana has not answered my question whether the bill will be the policy which I think I had the right to expect from him.

Mr. COLFAX. I have answered the gentleman with entire fairness and truthfulness. I say to him that the bill does not provide for abrogating any contract whatever.

Mr. HINDMAN. I do not say that the gentleman did not answer me with truthfulness; but he does not answer it with directness. I ask him, whether the effect of the bill, if it is passed, will not be, if any of the bids are accepted, to abrogate the present mail service overland to the Pacific?

Mr. COLFAX. It is contemplated, if the bill shall pass, that it will have the effect of very materially increasing the mail facilities to the Pacific; and not only to increase the facilities, but to lessen the expense to the Government.

Mr. HINDMAN. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. COLFAX. I have answered the gentleman's question frankly and truthfully.

Mr. HINDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a bill of sufficient importance to allow a reasonable time for its consideration in the House, instead of forcing upon us the parliamentary gag which it is now sought to impose.

Mr. COLFAX. I will suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that if he expects me to yield to him to ask questions, and to obtain from me answers to them, he should not accompany his request with a lecture. The committee have performed what they considered their duty, and the matter now rests with the House to perform theirs, by either adopting or rejecting the bill as they may see fit.

Mr. HINDMAN. So far as lecturing the gentleman is concerned, that is a matter of taste.

Mr. COLFAX. I have no objection to answering any question directly in relation to this bill.

Mr. HINDMAN. I then repeat my question, whether the bill passed by the Committee of the Whole are accepted by the Post Office Department, it will not have the effect of abrogating existing contracts for carrying the mail to the Pacific?

Mr. COLFAX. I answer the gentleman, that the bill itself will not produce any such effect. When the bids are received, the House, including the gentleman from Arkansas, can decide that point as they please.

Mr. SCOTT. With the consent of the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that, so far as this bill is concerned, as the State which I have the honor in part to represent is more directly and immediately interested in it than any other State, I am somewhat puzzled to know how to act in this matter, especially as this morning is the first time I have had the pleasure of reading the bill. I desire to know whether the bill passed by the Committee of the Whole are accepted by the Post Office and Post Roads for some information in reference to one or two matters pertaining or belonging to these routes.

As I understand it, the Attorney General of the United States has delivered an opinion that the contract with Butterfield cannot be abrogated until suspended until the expiration of the time specified in his contract. I believe that the late Postmaster General Brown, now deceased, was in favor of abrogating that contract. The Attorney General, however, has delivered the opinion that the contract cannot be abrogated.

Now, sir, the gentleman knows very well with what regularity, and under what difficulties, the mail has been carried under that contract; and I would do nothing to strike down that route; but I am placed in a position, in which I would not do that, I desire that additional mail facilities shall be furnished to the Pacific. I wish to see a daily mail to the Pacific established; and I see that this bill provides for the establishment of a daily mail, to be carried through in twenty days; or, at least, the Government is authorized to consider the establishment of such a mail under consideration. The bill also proposes a tri-weekly service.

Now, sir, so far as the northern, or so far as a southern route is concerned, I have always advocated, I have always been in favor of following the contractor to select his own route, for the purpose of enabling him to carry the mail with the greatest facility and in the shortest possible time; for by doing that my constituency will derive the greatest benefit.

Now, sir, I do not wish to vote against this bill, and at the same time I am not prepared, without some mature reflection, to vote in favor of it. It should have more deliberate consideration before being finally disposed of in this House. I would prefer, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana, that he allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it may be considered section by section; where we may offer amendments, if they may be deemed desirable, or move to strike out any clause or section that we may deem objectionable.

Mr. COLFAX. I will answer the gentleman from California by saying that it will require some two months to secure the bids upon which we can act, and that if we are to act upon the subject finally during the present session of Congress, it is necessary that the bill pass immediately. If the Committee of the Whole of the House on the state of the Union, it will be, in effect, a declaration upon the part of the House that they will not act upon the subject during the present session; it will be a declaration upon their part that they will not save venality in the expense of this matter, and, in the short time, increase the postal facilities to a daily mail.

If gentlemen wish, however, to have an opportunity of amending the bill, I am willing that it shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-day.

Several MEMBERS. We do not agree to that.

Mr. COLFAX. Then, I hope the bill will be passed without further delay. I will repeat what I have already said in relation to the obligation of the State of California to Butterfield, that it is quite possible his bid may be the lowest, he having greater facilities for the service than any other man, in which case there will be no difficulty in relation to his contract. If gentlemen desire to cheapen this service, as well as to increase the facilities to the Pacific, they should vote for it.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to answer me another question. Suppose the bids which are provided for in this bill, when they are received, shall not be deemed satisfactory to the Congress of the United States, and shall not be satisfactory to the State Generals and are not accepted; what effect will the bill then have upon the contracts which are now in existence?

Mr. COLFAX. It would have no effect upon them at all. They would remain as they now exist.

Mr. STOUT. I ask the gentleman from Indiana whether one object of this bill is, that the entire mail shall be carried by one route, instead of carrying it, as now, in part by sea and in part overland.

Mr. COLFAX. That is the object. I will state that at present the mail is carried by three or four different routes. By the Butterfield mail, letters only are carried. By the Ishmus route, both letters and newspapers are carried; so also by the St. Joseph and Placerville route. I now warn gentlemen, that as the rivalry between the Panama and the Nicaragua route has ceased, if the temporary contract made for ocean service last fall when the then existing competition, and which expires next July, is to be renewed, it will be at great expense.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, if I correctly understand the bill now before the House, I am in favor of its passage. I may, however, misapprehend the object of the bill. I believe, as I understand its provisions, that they will result in no injury to the United States, but, on the contrary, may result in much good. I am in favor of such a system of transportation of the mails of the country as will insure speedy and certain communication within our own limits, and not outside of them. Understanding that, I have that object in view, and that it does not provide for any diminution of the present overland mail service of the country, I am in favor of its passage, and shall vote affirmatively on that question.

King, the First Assistant Postmaster General, on a visit to the city of New York recently, found four unauthorized post offices, or places designated by their signs as post offices, and that they had lost money that had been deposited in those offices, supposing them to be Government offices. The bill recommended to us, and drawn up by the Post Office Department, the committee have unanimously indorsed; it provides that no office shall be kept as a "letter office," or "post office," or with the words "post office," or "letter office," or "United States mail," or words of similar import over it, for the purpose of deceiving the people in that way, and expressly reserving that the bill shall not cut off any express, "dispatch points," &c., which are in operation in the larger cities, for the delivery of letters within their limits.

The bill was then read, providing that no person, except those appointed for that purpose under laws of the United States, shall establish any other office or post office for the reception and delivery of letters; nor the establishment of any place with the words "post office," "letter office," "United States mail," or words of like import, under a penalty of $500 for the principal, and $100 for the assistant; and if the offense is continued or renewed after written notice by the deputy postmaster or agent to desist, the same shall be a felony to be forfeited to the Government; provided, that conductors and proprietors of hotels, &c., may keep boxes or bags with the words "for the mails" inscribed thereon; nor shall the act be construed so as to prohibit city dispatch companies from receiving letters for delivery in their respective cities, provided they so designate their offices as to show that they are not post offices or branches.

Mr. COLFAX. I would state, as several gentlemen have asked questions concerning the reading of the bill by the Clerk, that there is a special reservation in the bill allowing hotels to have a letter-box for the reception of letters, for the purpose of transmitting them to the post office. It also authorizes the Postmaster General to authorize persons to have places for the reception of letters for the mails; at a store, for instance, at a distance from the post office.

Mr. MILLSON. From the reading of the bill, as I heard it from the Clerk's desk, I infer that it is the intention of the bill to make an offer in against the United States, the unlawful acquisition of letters belonging to private persons.

Mr. COLFAX. No, sir.

Mr. MILLSON. Well, then, the unlawful acquisition and detention of letters under false pretenses. I ask the gentleman if the States are not perfectly competent to punish all such offenses whenever the exigency of the times render it necessary?

Mr. COLFAX. This is a case peculiarly within the province of Congress, as connected with the Post Office service of the United States.

I desire to add, that Mr. King, the First Assistant Postmaster General, states that, at one of these offices in New York, he had the effrontery to put up the following notice: "Letters received here one hour later every day than they are received at the post office in Nassau street," which is the real post office at New York; thereby holding out inducements to the letter-carriers to put their letters into this office, instead of into the regular post office of the city of New York.

Mr. MILLSON. I see the propriety of punishing such offenses; but it does not appear to me that they are offenses against the United States. The control of the United States over the mails does not carry the right to punish the unlawful and fraudulent procuring of letters and other valuable things intended to be put into the mails. It is an offense against the law of the State, which a State ought to prevent. I think the bill ought to be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COLFAX. The object of the bill is to prevent persons from putting up over their offices signs which delude the uninformed portion of the public, and make them believe that such places are regular post offices. That is the intention of the bill, and nothing else; but as the gentleman from Virginia objects to the bill, let it go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRANCH. I did not hear distinctly the point made by the gentleman from Virginia; but if I understood him correctly, it appears to me that the point is clearly well taken. This bill does not propose, as I understand it, to protect the United States Government against losses which may be inflicted upon it by individuals; but it is an attempt to protect communities against swindling by scoundrels. If there are officers in the city of New York, as are described by the gentleman from Indiana, and as Congress is not the proper mode of suppressing them; but an invasion by the police of New York, to break up such places established for the purpose of getting property or money under false pretenses. I think there is no want of a remedy; and I am only astonished, if the Postmaster General found existing in the city of New York, in open day, such notorious attempts to impose upon the people, that the police has not broken them up. I do not believe that Congress ought to interfere, and I do not believe it has power to do it. If this were a bill to protect the Government of the United States and its mails from being pilfered or plundered by individuals, I could have no difficulty about the matter; but I think it would be much better to establish, if the Postmaster General found existing upon unwary persons to the police of the respective communities, or to the respective State Legislatures.

Mr. COLFAX. I will state to the gentleman that the reason why the committee thought that bill necessary was because these officers were defrauding the Treasury of the United States of the postage upon letters, which, according to the law, cannot be sent in any other way than by the United States mail; and the Post Office Department of the United States of the revenue which belongs to the United States.

Mr. BRANCH. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana whether there are not already laws to protect the revenue against competition of the post individuals for carrying letters. I understand that the laws are ample upon that subject. But, as the gentleman from Indiana consents that the bill shall go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I will not further discuss the matter.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana if the first section of this bill would have the effect, if adopted, to do away with the very common convenience, in sparsely settled neighborhoods, of the letter-carriers, and of the weight along which mails are carried, in which mail matter is placed to be received by those in the neighborhood to whom such mail matter may belong, or in which mail matter may be deposited to be taken to the post office?

Mr. COLFAX. A proviso of this bill expressly provides that nothing in that bill contained shall prevent the keeping of a box or bag for the reception or delivery of letters for the mail by any person, &c., if it does not assume to be a "post office."

Mr. HILL. I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was so referred.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom have been referred various petitions and memorials in reference to a Pacific railroad, and other matters, which properly belong to another committee, ask to be referred to the committee of the House on the Pacific railroad, and that the same may be referred to the select committee of sixteen on the Pacific railroad. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PEAY & AYLIFF.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Peay & Ayloff, of Missouri, at the second time.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. At the request of the gentleman from Arkansas, who desires to put this bill upon its passage, I will make a statement, in order that the House may determine whether it should be passed or not.

These persons contracted some years ago, to carry the mail, in the State of Missouri, over a route more than a hundred miles long, by two-horse hack service. The evidence shows that, for fifteen years before that, the service upon that route had been performed by four-horse coaches. The evidence also shows that the service upon that route ought not to have been decreased, because the mails were constantly increasing in weight, and that it was absolutely out of the question, after they had taken that contract, to carry the mails by two-horse coaches. These facts have been proved, by the then Governor of Arkansas and by a Senator in the other end of the Capitol, that it was out of the question to carry the mails in two-horse coaches, and that they were obliged, at the start, to put four-horse coaches upon the route. These facts were also proved by sixteen or seventeen witnesses, many of whom are certified to be truthful and reliable persons. We have not undertaken to decide how much more than the contract price the parties ought to have; but we have reported the bill referring the case to the Postmaster General, with instructions to take testimony; and, if it is ascertained that the kind of service they contracted for could not be carried on, that it required four-horse instead of two-horse service, he shall pay them the usual price for that service.

The bill was then read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not intend to object to putting this bill upon its passage; but I shall vote against it, unless I can carry out my purpose. If, however, it is to pass, I think an amendment to it ought to be made.

The law requires that the Postmaster General shall let the mail contracts in such a way that the mail may be carried safely and speedily. I do not remember the precise language. Now, this bill does not say that, if these parties were compelled by the weight of the mails to increase their service from two-horse hacks to four-horse coaches, then they shall be paid extra compensation; but merely, that if they found it necessary to put on four-horse coaches, then the Postmaster General shall allow them some difference of pay. If the amount of mail matter transported over that road was more than two hundred sacks in a week, and the contractors were compelled, because of the weight of the mail matter, to put on additional service, I am willing to pay them for that additional service. But I want the bill to be so amended that the Postmaster General shall not be made into allowing a pecuniary compensation when the weight of the mail matter transported over the line did not require additional service.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. The committee instructed me, in drafting this bill, to provide that, if the testimony should show that, from the weight of the mails, these parties were obliged to perform extra service, then they should have their accounts audited, and be paid for the extra service. If the bill does not so provide, I feel authorized, without a recital of the bill, to interpose the words, "in consequence of the weight of the mails."

Mr. HINDMAN. I am quite willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let the bill be read again, as modified.

The bill as modified was read. It provides that the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust the accounts of Peay & Ayloff, of Missouri, for the year ending on the 30th of June, 1857, to perform extra service, not contemplated under or covered by their contract, then the Postmaster General shall cause the accounts of said contractors, for such extra service, to be audited and paid at a fair rate of compensation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the bill really expresses rather more than the gentleman has explained. I think the bill ought to state that if, upon examination of the evidence the Department may take, the Postmaster General is satisfied that the contractors could not carry the mail, because of its quantity and weight, without the use of a higher grade of service, then he shall allow additional compensation.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. That is substantially what the bill does provide.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, that is possibly the effect of it. I know my friend from Arkansas does not desire this bill to pass in a wrong shape, and I suspect that that is what it had before in view.

This service was rendered from 1834 to 1857. Suppose the proof before the Department shows that for one trip, for one month, for one year, during that time, there had to be increased service; this bill, according to the construction that I put upon it, gives compensation for the whole of that time, embracing about three years; and it provides, further, that, if the parties produce evidence that the contractors, from the weight of the mails, had to put on additional service, then he shall readjust the accounts. Now, you must remember that the office is all against the Department; because the Postmaster-General can get hold of no witnesses, except such as the contractors themselves may produce. In all likelihood, the Post Office Department can examine no evidence but what may be sent up by the contractors themselves.

Mr. HINDMAN. I think the gentleman from Alabama misapprehends the meaning of the bill. In regard to this matter of extra service, the language of the bill is:

And if it appears from the evidence produced by said Post & Express, or on file in the Department, that said contractors, in consequence of the weight of the mails, were compelled, between the 1st of July, 1854, and the 1st of July, 1857, to perform extra service, not contemplated under or covered by their contract, then the Postmaster-General shall cause the accounts, submitted for such extra service, to be audited and paid at a fair rate of compensation.

That is, that they are to be paid for the extra services by them necessarily rendered in consequence of the increased weight of the mail matter, and not for any other than the extra services which they were compelled to render. I trust the House will at once put the bill upon its passage.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill a question. I understand him correctly, he states that it is in evidence that the service had been performed on this route in four-horse coaches for several years before these parties took the contract.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. For fifteen years. Mr. HARDEMAN. Then, these contractors took the contract with a knowledge that for five years the service had been performed in four-horse coaches, and they offered to do it in two-horse hacks.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. The gentleman misstates. The Post Office Department has power, under the law, to advertise for just such service, on any route in the United States, as that Department may think proper, and they advertised for two-horse service on this route. I do not know that these men lived within fifteen hundred miles of the route. Men in Pennsylvania frequently become contractors for mail service in Texas and Arkansas.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I inferred, from what has been said, that this man, knowing that he had been asked to carry the mail on that route by four-horse coaches, bid for the service by two-horse coaches for the purpose of obtaining the contracts at the lowest bidder. If so, I do not think he is entitled to relief.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. Not at all. I now call the previous question upon the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HINDMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I have another bill to report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I desire to report one other bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it a private bill?

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. It is.

Mr. SHERMAN. You can report it, then, on Friday. Before making a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask that certain communications which have been received by the Committee of Ways and Means may be printed.

The order to print was made, there being no objection.

SICK SEAMEN'S FUND.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report the following resolution; which I ask may be adopted by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the mode of expending the fund for sick and disabled seamen, under the several acts of Congress for the relief of such seamen, and the appropriation of dedications in said fund; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIGHTING THE CAPITOL, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the mode and manner of the Capitol and President's House, the grounds around them and around the executive offices, and Pennsylvania avenue, Bridge and High streets in Georgetown, Four and a half, Nevada, and North streets across the Mall; the annual expense thereof; and if lighted by gas, how supplied, and on what terms; and whether a contract cannot be made for a supply of gas on better terms than it is now furnished at; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was, by unanimous consent, received, and agreed to.

LOAN, TAX, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill to provide for the payment of outstanding Treasury notes; to authorize a loan; to regulate and fix the duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. COBB. I object to the introduction of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill cannot be received, if objected to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the objection comes too late.

Mr. COBB. Certainly not. I cannot object to a bill until it has been read or stated. I objected the moment that was done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that I only desire to have the bill read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed. The first time of the bill I desire to submit it, not only for the consideration and information of the members of the House, but for the consideration of everybody. I do not propose to take any advantage of a motion to reconsider, or of any privileged motion, to get before the House. The proposition is simply to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COBB. With the understanding that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and no motion to reconsider made to bring it before the House, I will withdraw my objection to its introduction.

Mr. McQUEEN. If the gentleman from Alabama withdraws his objection, I will renew it. We have voted away the public lands, and now it is proposed to impose an additional tax upon the people. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side to withdraw all objection to the introduction of this bill. The wants of all sections require its consideration.

Mr. COBB. Under the circumstances, I will hold on to my objection.

The SPEAKER. If objection be made, the bill cannot be introduced.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I desire to report the Committee of Ways and Means one of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to the introduction of that bill; and I give notice that I will object to the introduction of any appropriation bill until the tariff bill has been reported. It is more important than any other.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me, then, Mr. Speaker, to say to gentlemen on both sides of the House, that if these objections are persisted in, it will be impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means to get through the ordinary appropriation bills for carrying on the Government. I hope the House will allow both these bills to be introduced. It is a privilege that has never been denied.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think if the gentleman will look, he will find that the rule requires the Committee of Ways and Means to report the appropriation bills within a certain time after the commencement of the session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. The rule requires the committee to report the appropriation bills, and they have the right to do it. A single objection cannot prevent their introduction. I have known the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means taken to task for not reporting these bills within the prescribed time; it is his duty to do it. I do not mean to say that this committee has not performed its duty in this respect; I think it has; but I do mean to say that it is not only the duty of the committee to report these bills, but that it is their right to report them at any time, and that an objection cannot prevent them from being reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand what has been the practice in this respect; and I now beg the indulgence of gentlemen on both sides of the House to permit me to introduce these bills. The Committee of Ways and Means has no privilege under the rules above any other committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will look at the rules, he will find that they leave that privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am familiar with the rule, and I will state that the Committee of Ways and Means will be prepared during the present week to report all the annual appropriation bills; and if the House will sustain them, they will take them up and dispose of them promptly. If the House will sustain them, they will endeavor to have them all passed before the meeting of the Charleston convention. I trust that all objection will be withdrawn, and that both these bills will be allowed to be introduced, and reported to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McQUEEN. I have no objection at all to the introduction of the regular appropriation bills. I am as desirous as any other member that they shall all be passed through this House; but I will say that, so long as my opposition can avail anything, I will oppose any bill to increase the taxes upon my constituents for the benefit of any State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am under the impression and belief that the bill first sought to be reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is of great importance to the country, and any appropriation bill which can be submitted for the consideration of this House; and I will object to the introduction of every appropriation bill so long as gentlemen on the other side persist in their objections to this bill.

Mr. McQUEEN. I am ready to admit that it is important to the iron interest of Pennsylvania that a tariff bill shall be passed; but it is as important to my constituents that they shall not be taxed for the support of the interest of the people of any State.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This bill is as important to other interests of the country as it is to the iron interest of Pennsylvania. It will protect the interests of the South as well as those of the North.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that the rule relating to the reporting of these appropriation bills shall be read.

The 73d rule was read, as follows:

"It shall also be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, within thirty days after their appointment, at every session of Congress, to report to the House of Representatives, to report the general appropriation bills—for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government; for the Army; for the Navy; and for the Indian Affairs; and to take action thereon, or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure."

Mr. HOUSTON. In addition to that, I will say that I can produce no rule directly in point.

While I was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I proposed to report one of these bills. Objection was made, and the Speaker allowed me to report the bill over the objection, as a matter of right. I have no doubt the case will be reported in the Congressional Globe. I remember it perfectly well. That has been the construction of the rule, and why? Because here is a duty required of a committee, and that committee cannot discharge that duty, under this rule, if I make objection. Can you require that a committee shall report within a certain time, and then, when that committee proposes to make its report within the time fixed, and when it is not the regular call of committees for reports, permit one member of this House, by his single objection, to prevent the committee from doing its duty under the rules of the House? The whole thing is absurd—utterly absurd. If the rules enjoin a duty, of course they will provide the means for its fulfillment, implicitly, if in no other way. The position taken that one objection prevents the reception of the report of the committee is absurd and untenable. I remember distinctly, when I was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I proposed to report one of the appropriation bills. Objection was made, but the Speaker promptly decided that I was entitled to make my report, notwithstanding the objection; and I did make the report from that committee. I will procure the reference to that case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt, sir, that the note in Mr. Hays's book gives the true interpretation of the rule of the House. The Committee of Ways and Means are, under the rules, enjoined to report the appropriation bills within thirty days from the date of their appointment at the beginning of each session of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that the gentleman will yield, to permit a former decision to be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. GEORGE W. JONES made the point of order that, under the 79th rule, which requires the Committee of Ways and Means to report the general appropriation bills within thirty days after their appointment, the Committee of Ways and Means is in order for the said committee to report at this time."

The SPEAKER overruled the said point of order.

"From this decision Mr. GEORGE W. JONES appealed."

"Pending which, on motion of Mr. OAKS."

Ordered, That this said appeal be laid on the table."

The SPEAKER. It is to be found in the Journal of the House, third session, Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 155.

Mr. HOUSTON. That, sir, is not the case to which I have made reference. The case I referred to was one which was reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I will cite that case before I sit down. There was no appeal from the decision of the Chair, which was in my favor.

Let me have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] Suppose the Committee of Ways and Means propose to report the appropriation bills, and I object, and the thirty days expire; then, that committee are bound, under the rule, to report their reasons why these bills were not reported. That committee can come here and say that they were unable to report the appropriation bills, because, while they had them ready, objection was made, and they were prevented from coming before the House. They may say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMPELLE] objected, and that, for that reason, they were unable to discharge their duty under the rules. The first session I was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I was compelled to state the reasons why one or two of the appropriation bills were not reported within the time fixed by the rules. The reason for their non-report was, that the public documents necessary to be had before the bills were drawn up had not been printed, (for the printing was then done under the contract system,) and I stated then, that they could not be reported until these documents were printed. Here is the case to which I have already made reference:

"Very Appropriation Bill."

"Mr. HOUSTON. It will take some time to dispose of all the bills reported by the Committee of the Whole, and but no moment for me to report the appropriation bills. I therefore ask the consent of the House to report that bill now."

The SPEAKER. Upon referring to the rules, the Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman has a right to report the bill."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is no use of discussing this point of order further. It is plain and obvious to every gentleman, that the Committee of Ways and Means have no privileges in reporting bills, that are not possessed by the other standing committees of the House. It is our duty, under the rules, to be ready to report the appropriation bills within thirty days after our appointment. When that committee is called, then we are enabled to report; but when there is a call, and our turn has not arrived, I do not think we can make a report, unless by general consent. We have, as I say, no privileges in making reports, that are not possessed by other committees.

Mr. CAMPELLE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the first bill be proposed to report from the Committee of Ways and Means was not also an appropriation bill? It makes, as I understand, an appropriation for the purpose of paying the outstanding Treasury notes, or, in other words, paying the debt of the United States. This is as much an appropriation bill as any other. The national debt is $58,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me say a word in reply. The first bill I introduced appropriated $21,000,000 for the purpose of redeeming the outstanding Treasury notes.

I wish now to submit a suggestion to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. McQUEEN.] The motion I made in regard to this tariff bill, a revenue bill, or whatever you may choose to call this bill for the redemption of the outstanding Treasury notes—does not place it in any better condition than it will be in if left in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means. My motion is that it be referred to the Committee of the House, and printed, if it can be so printed. It will be printed and spread before us; and it cannot be taken up at that committee, except after prolonged debate, and by a majority vote. That same majority, sir, could at any time get that bill out of the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McQUEEN. Why not separate the two subjects? Why the necessity of including in one bill an appropriation to pay the debts of the United States, and a provision to increase the tariff? I think that it would not be better and more proper to have these distinct matters in separate bills? I make no objection to the speedy payment of the debts of the United States; but, sir, I do object to giving any advantage to the getting of a bill before this House for increasing the tariff. I shall in no way further a proposition that has for its object the enlargement of the taxes imposed upon the people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that this increase of the tariff is an important measure for the interest of Pennsylvania. I have yet to learn, however, that it is to the advantage of my constituents. I must ever oppose any measure that adds to the class interest of Pennsylvania, or of any other State, at the expense of the general interest of the people I have the honor to represent. While it is important to them that they shall secure all the advantages they can from the legislation of the country, it is equally important to my people that they shall not be overburdened with what I believe, unjust taxation.

Mr. CAMPELLE. I do not propose, at this time, to enter into a discussion of the tariff. It is not before the House. I will do so at a proper time.

Mr. McQUEEN. If the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will separate the propositions, I will make no objection to any bill proposing to pay the debts of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have only to say that the action of the Committee of Ways and Means has been just as it is presented in that bill as I propose to report it. There was no proposition made in that committee for a division of the subject. I think that the subjects are properly connected—the appropriation for the redemption of the outstanding Treasury notes, and a provision in reference to the revenue of the United States, providing for the means for the purchase of those outstanding Treasury notes.

Mr. McQUEEN. That letter is a separate and distinct matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are so intimately connected that it would be difficult to separate them.

Mr. McQUEEN. There is now, in my judgment, no necessity for an increase of the tariff for purposes of revenue. Two years ago it was urged that there was such a necessity, on account of the commercial crisis which had then partially passed over the country. There was a pretext then for an increase of the tariff, because there was no such pretext now. There is now no necessity for any increase of the tariff for the purposes of revenue; because the commercial interests of the country have revived, and the importations this winter, I understand, are more, perhaps, than ever before made during the same time. There is no necessity for any tariff measure now, unless it is for the purpose of fostering class interests, and putting into the pockets of the iron manufacturers, and other manufacturers, money taken from the pockets of the consumers of the country.

Mr. CAMPELLE. Is not the gentleman from South Carolina aware that the Government is in debt $58,000,000, and that it is necessary to increase the tariff, in order that we may have revenue sufficient to pay that debt?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is to be a general discussion on this subject, I want to have a chance to say something in favor of the lead interest.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand that Mr. McQUEEN is going to make a question of order. I want the Speaker to decide whether an objection prohibits the introduction of an appropriation bill. I shall not discuss the question of a tariff under a point of order. I agree, sir, that until the tariff bill, as it is called, is allowed to come in, no man on this side of the House ought to permit a dollar of appropriation to be made. I, however, now ask that the Speaker shall decide the question of order.

Mr. McQUEEN. I understand that the Speaker has decided it, and that an objection does prevent an appropriation bill from coming in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, under former decisions on this point, that it is very clear the Committee of Ways and Means have no privilege in making reports, not possessed by other committees.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then discussion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair supposes that the gentleman directs the Committee of Ways and Means to report the appropriation bills within thirty days, means that they report if that can be done in the regular order of business, and when that committee is called upon under the rules.

Mr. HOUSTON and Mr. SINGLETON took the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object, unless there is an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SINGLETON. Is it in order to move that there be a suspension of the rules, in order that the bill may be reported?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move for a suspension of the rules on any other day than Monday.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I wish to say a word.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object to any motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is necessary that I shall put myself right. I do not propose to enter into any general debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to state that the decision which has been read was made upon a bill—the fortification bill—not included among those mentioned in the rule, which provides for their being reported within thirty days. Of course, then, that decision has nothing to do with the point I made.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. And I insist upon the motion; and if it is agreed to, I also insist that the consular and diplomatic bill, which will give rise to a debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated that when the committee was last in session, they had under consideration the President's message; and that Mr. LOVJ had been called to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to lay aside, for the present, the consideration of the President's message, for the purpose of taking up the consular and diplomatic bill. I do not think it will take more than half or three quarters of an hour to consider that bill; and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LOVJ] will withdraw his claim to the floor for the present, I will agree to an understanding that, if this bill is not disposed of in the time I have named, we will then lay it aside, and take up the other matter.

The committee proceeded to consider House bill No. 4, being a bill making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1861.

The bill was then read.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1860.

NEW SERIES.—NO. 12.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to insert, after line twenty-four, the following:

For compensation to the interpreter to the mission to Japan, $25,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN also moved to amend the clause, "for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $150,000," by striking out the words "one hundred and fifty," and inserting the words "two hundred," so that it should read:

For the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the following section, by striking out the words "one hundred," in the last line:

For compensation of the commissioner, secretary, chief astronomer, and surveyor, assistant astronomer and surveyor, clerk, and for provisions, transportation, and contingencies of the commission to run and make the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions bounding on Washington Territory, $150,000.

I do it for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what is the necessity of continuing this very large appropriation for running the boundary line. It has been continued now I know not how many years; and unless the difficulties are greater than I have ever supposed them to be, it does seem to me that a very large, an unnecessarily large, amount has already been expended.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very question the gentleman propounds to me was propounded by the Committee of Ways and Means to the Secretary of State, from whom we received a reply that satisfied us. The appropriation asked for will complete this work. I have a communication from the Secretary of State, which shows that the amount asked for is necessary to complete the work; and, if now appropriated, will be all that is necessary. I ask to have that communication read.

The communication was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1860.
SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 10th inst., requesting that the committee on the part of the House should make an estimate to detail of the amount required as "compensation of the commissioner, secretary, chief astronomer and surveyor, assistant astronomer and surveyor, clerk, and for provisions, transportation, and contingencies of the commission to run and make the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions bounding on Washington Territory," and, also, the probable length of time to accomplish the labors of the commission. In reply, I have the honor to lecture a detailed estimate of the amount required to be appropriated, and to state the length of time probably required to complete the labors of the commission. Provided the appropriation now asked for be made.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.
Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means the propriety of so amending this section as to provide that this sum shall be so applied as to complete this work.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not worth while to do this for if the work is not completed, the presence of such a provision here, would not prevent the passage of other appropriations for this purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think there should be some showing of our own opinion of the amount of money expended by those engaged upon this commission. However, I will withdraw my amendment.

The following section was next read:

To enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the act of Congress of 2d March, 1819, and any subsequent acts now in force for the suppression of the slave trade, $100,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I was not present when this bill was considered in the Committee of Ways and Means. I move an amendment, however, to enable me to come forward and inquire if the committee had before them any reason why this appropriation should be made? During the last Congress an appropriation for $75,000 was made for this very same subject, and the reason offered for it at that time was, that it was necessary to pay the bounty to the officers in command of the Echo, who had taken these slaves and brought them into Charleston, and for their support and maintenance while there. But since that time I know of no reason why we should continue this appropriation. It may be that from year to year a certain sum of money will be required for this particular purpose. If there is any necessity for it, to enforce the law, I am perfectly willing that the appropriation should be made. I have no objection to it, if it be necessary to carry out the law. But, whether the law is right or wrong, is not for us to consider at this time. The only question is, what is the sum of money necessary?

Mr. SHERMAN. We had no further information than this: the laws against the slave trade are well known; and the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury was that $40,000 was required. That is the amount that was estimated for. The amount last year was $75,000, and the reason given was that $35,000 was necessary to support the negroes brought over in the Echo. I have no objection to the amount usually appropriated, without regard to any special exigency that may arise. I will here say that, as I understand it, it is necessary that some sum should be appropriated to carry into effect the laws in relation to the slave trade. The amount usually given is $40,000, and I trust that amount will be agreed to.

Mr. BONHAM. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he is certain that there ever was an appropriation before last year for this purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman can inquire of my colleague upon the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CRAWFORD], who has been a member of that committee longer than I have. I do not know how much has heretofore been appropriated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that this appropriation, so far as I know, has never been regularly asked for; nor have estimates been submitted by the Department heretofore. If the contrary be the fact, it has not come within my knowledge. The first appropriation was made in 1850, and the amount was the appropriation of $75,000, which excited some debate last session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer my colleague to page 45 of the General Estimates, where he will find that the amount asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury is $40,000. We gave him all he asked for.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have no objection to offer, if the estimate was submitted.

Mr. BRANCH. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means offered an amendment to this bill, at line thirty-six, to increase the amount appropriated for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries from $150,000 to $200,000, making an increase of $50,000. I had not before me at that time the estimates; but I have since obtained them, and I find that the amount proposed by the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means exceeds the estimate of the Department by $25,000. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio upon what ground that addition is made?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of State asked for more. The estimate was $175,000. The committee proposed to appropriate $150,000. The following letter of the Secretary of State will show that he subsequently asked for $200,000. It shows that there is a deficiency in that Department; and that the drafts had been made on account of sick and disabled seamen.

The letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 15, 1860.
SIR: I have the honor to request that the appropriation of $75,000 may be made for the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, this sum being indispensable to the details of the work of the United States for the service of the present fiscal year, the appropriation for that being now reduced to less than one thousand dollars.

I beg leave to inform the committee that the amount asked for the current fiscal year was $175,000, which it was supposed would be sufficient under an economical expenditure. It was, however, reduced to $150,000, and was reported for that object—a sum totally inadequate when the amount of relief afforded to our large and annually-increasing number of sailors is taken into consideration. The appropriation for that object for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859, was exhausted as early as March of that year, and a transfer of $17,500 out of the estimate of this Department was made to the amount of sixty thousand dollars, ($60,000), and yet the fund failed before the expiration of the fiscal year, and drafts of the committee amounted to the amount of some eighteen thousand dollars ($18,000) prior to the 1st of July, the commencement of the present fiscal year.

I have also the honor to request that the appropriation for this object, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1861, may be increased from $175,000 to the amount asked for, to $200,000, as the latter sum will, I am confident, be required to defray the expenses incurred under that head.

The serious situation of the Department has for some time past been driven to the increasing charges on account of drafts, and the necessity of providing for them.

As in the main they have been incurred in the Pacific in connection with the whale fishery, the guano and the California trade, the commission of the United States at the Sandwich Islands has repeatedly been instructed to examine and report upon the subject, in the hope that some means might be devised to prevent or curtail the expenses. Various instructions have been addressed to the ministers of the United States at Lima and Santiago de Chile; and the Department has been ordered to cause the United States Pacific to co-operate with those functions. I regret to state, however, that the result of their investigations does not show any probability at present of curtailing the expenses referred to consistently with the policy upon the subject maintained by existing laws.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BRANCH. I am satisfied. It appears that the Secretary submitted a supplemental estimate, and asked for an increase. I will only say that it would be better if all these amounts could be known at the outset, and put into the annual estimates, and that we should not be called upon by the Department to submit supplemental estimates, for increased appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make a general statement in regard to the items of this bill. The amount estimated by the Department was $1,137,120; this amount required by the committee of Ways and Means is $1,089,000, being a saving of $48,000. This saving is made by reducing the appropriations for salaries of envoys extraordinary, ministers, and commissioners; by striking out "Hacnos Ayres," "Paraguay;" by reducing the item which was last under discussion, by reducing the appropriations for salaries of consular agents, &c. But the bill has been increased $25,500 by amendments made to-day, in committee, by adding for salary of interpreter to Japan, and the $50,000 increase asked for by the Secretary of State, for the protection and relief of American seamen, &c. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. MALLORY. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, how this $400,000, appropriated to enable the President to carry out the law against the slave trade, is to be applied? As I understand the matter, the President now has power to order the Navy to suppress this slave traffic, and that that squadron would be supported out of the general appropriation for the Navy. I would like to know, then, how this special appropriation of $400,000 is to be applied and used by the Department for this purpose? I do not wish to vote in the dark; and I think it is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to inform the House what disposition is to be made of this sum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am happy to be able to inform the gentleman that, if he will read the law of March 3, 1819, entitled "An act in addition to acts preventing the slave trade," he will find that the second and third sections give certain bounties, part of which are paid out of this appropriation. The amount of the bounty for this purpose, under the act to which I referred, was $100,000. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend the bill by adding at the end thereof the following proviso: Provided, That the sum of $100,000, heretofore appropriated for running and marking the line between the United States and the British possessions bounding Washington Territory, shall be so expended as to put an end to the work.

I find, upon examination, that, at the first session of last Congress, $75,000 were appropriated for similar purposes; and that, at the second session, $100,000 were appropriated for the same purpose. Now this bill, as I understand, appropriates $150,000 more, as a sum to complete it. I do not desire to detain the House in discussing this question; I only desire that the facts may be known, and, in view of those facts, that the committee shall vote upon my amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to a point of order. It is, that the gentleman cannot go back upon the bill and offer an amendment in reference to a subject which is already disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is to add a proviso at the end of the bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope there will be no objection to that proviso. It certainly can do no harm.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia insist on his point of order?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will hear the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MILES. I beg the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for a moment, as I desire to offer an amendment that is particularly germane to the last section of the bill, and, in fact, would be a continuation of the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will do so for the present.

Mr. MILES. I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to it. With the indulgence of the committee, I will say a very few words in explanation of it. It will be recollected, that last year there was great discussion in the House about appropriating $75,000 for the Echo Africans. It was passed, however, by the House. We had great difficulty in Charleston in getting paid out of that $75,000 the bills of tradesmen—many of them poor and worthy men—who had advanced supplies; and most of them, in fact, clothing for these poor wretches, who were in a most miserable state of suffering and destitution, as I can testify from personal inspection, as I saw them several times. We had the greatest difficulty in getting these bills paid for by the Government. I saw they said there was no fund. The Navy Department ordered the marshal to charter a steamer, for the purpose of transporting the Africans to the fort, and thence to the Government vessel which conveyed them to Africa. The proprietors of that steamer found the greatest difficulty in getting paid for the use of the steamer. The Navy Department said they ought to be paid by the Interior Department, and the Interior Department said the Navy Department ought to pay them; and, between the two, we could get nothing done until the appropriation was made, and then we had the delay which always follows when you have to deal with circumlocution officials the whole world over, and under any form of government.

But there was one thing which was never paid out of that appropriation. The marshal of the district—a most excellent and worthy gentleman, whom I am proud to call my personal friend—discharged the duties of his office, which were most trying and most laborious, subjecting him to great personal risk. It was a period when the yellow fever was prevailing as an epidemic in the city; he was not acclimated, not living in the city; but he was compelled, of course, to give his special care and attention to these unfortunate creatures; and although the Department and the President expressed their entire approval of his course, and their high appreciation of his zeal and energy, when he came to present his bill for pay, they refused to allow it; the Department saying that they could not do it, because they could not decide out of what particular fund it was to be paid, and, of course, the matter hung in that way until the appropriation was passed. As soon as it was passed—and it was amply sufficient to cover all the expenditures in the case of the marshal to the Secretary of State. I saw him personally. He said that the marshal ought to be paid; that there would be no difficulty or trouble about it, and that he would undoubtedly be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interfere with the gentleman from South Carolina, but I must insist on the rules of order with regard to these appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he should read his amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. MILES. I will read it myself. I propose to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

And that the Secretary of State be directed to pay out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000, made last year in the consular and diplomatic bill, in the case of the Echo Africans, the sum claimed by the United States marshal for the district of South Carolina. Provided, in the opinion of the Attorney General, said marshal is legally entitled to receive the same.

The Attorney General has already delivered an opinion to the effect that he is entitled to this pay. Judge Wayne, of the Supreme Court, has said the same; and Judge Magraw, of the district court, has delivered a written opinion to the same effect; but the President did not agree with the Attorney General or the judges, and refused to allow the bill to be paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object to the amendment. It is clearly a private claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment proposes independent legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. McRAE. That is the very point I wish to raise, and upon which I wish to ask the opinion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman from South Carolina, at the point of order on the gentleman from South Carolina, that that amendment is not germane to this bill. Now I want to ask him if he considers this appropriation in regard to the slave trade as germane to the consular and diplomatic bill? I want to know what part of the consular and diplomatic expenses are provided for in this clause? And I shall ask the gentleman to state, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether he considers this appropriation germane to the consular and diplomatic bill. I want to know what these particular sums are to be applied? Because, the money may be applied to purposes much less worthy than that which the gentleman from South Carolina proposes. I want to know the position that this section of the bill is not germane to it, as it provides for no part of the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government. I have just as much right to offer an amendment to this bill, providing for the faithful execution of the fugitive slave law, as the committee have to bring in an appropriation, in the consular and diplomatic bill, for the suppression of the slave trade. I therefore ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if he can show for what particular objects this amount is to go, and whether the point of order which he has raised on the gentleman from South Carolina, and which the Chair has sustained, does not go to the appropriation in the bill itself?

Mr. SHERMAN. My answer will be very brief. I believe these negroes, who brought here, are foreigners. The section relates, therefore, to our intercourse with foreign nations or people. But that is not all. I can sustain it on the ground of the same principle upon which I sustained the bill of last session, and, I am told, in previous appropriation bills. But there is still another ground. I can claim that this expenditure is estimated for among the consular and diplomatic expenses. It grows out of the law against the slave trade—a law which can only be carried on with foreigners, and therefore properly coming into the consular and diplomatic bill, which covers all our intercourse with foreign nations.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman makes three points, each of which is satisfactory. In the first place, he says that the provision is germane to this bill, simply because it relates to persons brought to this country who are foreigners. That is no reason why this should be made a portion of the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government; because there are no consular and diplomatic agents concerned in reference to this question at all, and, of course, that point does not meet the case.

The gentleman gives as his next reason, that a similar provision was in the bill of last year, and that there are precedents for attaching it to the consular and diplomatic bill. Why, does not the gentleman know that that provision was attached to the diplomatic and consular bill for the purpose of carrying it through this House securely and safely; and that it was then objected, by every gentleman upon this side of the House opposed to that appropriation, that it was not legitimately connected with the diplomatic and consular expenses of the Government?

The gentleman says, further, that it is in order, because it is estimated for. Why, is that a good reason? I am glad to know, however, that the gentleman has come to the conclusion to attach no much power to the committee of the Democratic Secretary of State as to consider them an authority with him. They are, at all events, upon this question; because, I presume, they accord with the particular sentiments of the gentleman in reference to the suppression of the slave trade.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that my opinions are in favor of the reopening of the trade. But I am in favor, also, of observing the laws as they exist; and it is for that reason, because I am a law-and-order man, and will even sustain bad laws until they have been adjudged to be unconstitutional, that I am opposed to inserting upon this bill any such provision.

I ask the gentleman upon the other side of the House what he would be willing to introduce into the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill an appropriation for faithfully executing the fugitive slave law? Of course they will say no; that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether any such law exists?

Mr. McRAE. I think there is such a law in existence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must rise to a question of order. This debate is all out of order. The bill has been gone through with, and nothing is in order but the motion to lay it aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. McRAE. I will yield in a moment. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he considers that there is such a law in existence as the fugitive slave law?

Mr. LOVEJOY. I know of no law of that title.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must insist upon my question of order. The question is on laying this bill aside.

Mr. McRAE. I do not yield at present.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill has been gone through with, and no amendment is in order. The bill was taken up with the understanding that it should be reported to the House, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Love] should resume the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio. Debate has not been closed upon the bill, and general debate is in order upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I should like to know by what rule general debate is in order upon this bill. It has been gone through with by sections; no amendment is in order, and how is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is before the committee until it has been laid aside by a vote of the committee, and it is open to debate.

Mr. MALLORY. I proposed an inquiry a moment since to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in relation to the object which was sought to be accomplished by this appropriation of $40,000. He responded that he understood it was appropriated to pay bounties under the law prohibiting the slave trade under which law provision is made for the payment of bounties. Now, I wish to inquire further of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he has any statistics, or whether there are any in the committee, which will lead him to the conclusion that the amount would be necessary for the payment of bounties under that particular law? I should like to know further, whether any bounties have ever been claimed or paid under that act. I am not aware that any bounties have been claimed or claimed under it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you put that question to me?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir. Mr. SHERMAN. Bounties have been paid under that law. One of the clerks was paid to the captain of the brig Echo and the Secretary of the Treasury has estimated that $40,000 will be required for the coming year. Of course, these estimates must be merely an approximation. It cannot be told in advance what vessels will be captured, or what expenses incurred under this law. I have before me a law showing the expenses which may arise in suppressing the African slave trade. I will not read it, but the gentleman can read it for himself.

I now appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi to give way, and allow this bill to be laid aside, to permit the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Love] to go on with his remarks upon the President's annual message.

Mr. McRAE. I have no objection at all to this bill being laid aside now, if it will come up tomorrow in the position in which it now stands, and that I shall have the floor upon it.

Mr. MILES. I must, with all due respect, for the Chair, take an appeal from his decision ruling the amendment which I offered some minutes ago out of order.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the appeal. The Chair will state the question.
Mr. McRAE. The gentleman cannot take the floor from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor. When he shall have concluded, the Chair will give the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina, unless the gentleman yields to the gentleman from South Carolina now, to take his appeal.

Mr. McRAE. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose, with great pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I appeal to the gentleman to allow this bill to pass over informally for the present, and to allow the President's message to be taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he understood it to be the decision of the committee that this bill should be taken for half an hour, and that if it was not disposed of within that time, it should be laid aside, to allow the gentleman from Georgia to proceed with his remarks upon the President's message.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then consider that the order of the committee.

Mr. MILES. I am perfectly willing to give way to accommodate the gentleman from Georgia. I desire, however, first to inquire if the Chair will receive my right to speak from his decision?

The CHAIRMAN. Should the present occupant be in the chair when the bill is again taken up, he will recognize his right to take an appeal.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The committee then resumed the consideration of the annual message of the President of the United States.

Mr. LOVE occupied the floor for three quarters of an hour, upon two relations between the people of the North and the South, especially in connection with the issues growing out of the next presidential election. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois, followed, in a speech nearly two hours' length—the time having been extended, by general consent—upon the subject of the alleged connection of Senator Douglas with Republicans in his reelection to the Senate of the United States. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. McCLELLAN replied to Mr. Kellogg upon the same subject. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. VANCE occupied the floor; but yielded to Mr. COX, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.
So the committee rose, and Mr. Davis, of Indiana, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill (H. R. 4) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1861, and had come to no resolution thereon; also, that the committee had had under consideration the annual message of the President of the United States, and the resolutions proposing to refer the same, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

INDIAN AGENCY IN JEFFERSON TERRITORY.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish an Indian agency in the Territory of Jefferson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

And then, on motion of Mr. LEAKE, (at six o'clock, p. m.), the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Wednesday, March 14, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GREGG.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, returning, in compliance with an order of the Senate, the papers in the case of C. J. Cook and A. A. Lockwood; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of Hetty G. Dorr, daughter of John D. Alvey, postmaster of the American Army, at head-quarters, during the revolutionary war, praying that the laws passed for the relief of the officers and soldiers of that war, or their widows or orphans, may be so construed as to include his late husband's legal representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. TEN EVACK presented a petition of citizens of New York and New Jersey, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in, and monopoly of, the public lands of the United States; and that they be laid out in farms or lots, of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. F. LITTLE presented the petition of H. L. Doussan, in behalf of himself and other owners of land at Prairie du Chien, praying that the surveys affecting farm lots numbered one to twenty-three, inclusive, made by Lucien Lyon, United States surveyor, in the year 1839 or 1840, may be corrected; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented the memorial of Daniel J. Brown, praying compensation for extra services while acting as a clerk in the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of James Harrington, a laborer on the public grounds in the city of Washington, praying that he may have the benefit of the joint resolution of August, 1856, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER. I present various memorials, praying for an alteration of the existing tariff laws of the United States. These memorials are signed by a large number of citizens and electors of Connecticut, residing in Hartford, Windsor, Weathersfield, Windsor-locks, Manchester, and New Britain; also, by citizens of New Haven and Naugatuck, in New Haven county; in Norwich, Yantic, Mystic, and Jewett City, in New London county; in Plymouth and Wolcottville, in Litchfield county; and in Hebron, Vernon, Rockville, Ellington, and Stafford Springs, in Tolland county. These memorials are signed by that one of them be read at the Clerk's table.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:
The situation of the undersigned, citizens and electors of the State of Connecticut, respectfully sheweth: That foreign wares and fabrics are now pouring into our country in such unprecedented quantities, that the glim of importation, the Federal Treasury is in an embarrassed condition, the public debt has been more than doubled within the last three years, and $20,000,000 of Treasury notes are soon to fall due, for which no provision has been made. Your memorialists, therefore, entreat your honorable bodies to revise the existing tariff, replacing ad valorem by specific duties, so far as practicable; and according to the value of our own country's manufactures, to impose duties as may be consistent with the creation of a revenue adequate to all the legitimate and economical wants of the country.

We are, respectfully, your fellow-citizens, &c.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, the signatures to these memorials are so numerous and so respectable, that I should hardly discharge the duty I owe to my constituents if I did not say a few words in regard to the general subject before moving the appropriate reference. It seems to me that what is asked in the memorials is just and necessary, and ought to be granted. The subject involves the present condition of the country in regard to its imports and revenues, and the effect of our present laws, especially on the industrial classes. From an examination of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid on our tables a short time since, it appears that the whole amount of imports into the United States during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last, was $338,708,130, of which gold and silver coin and bullion made up $17,434,779, leaving $321,273,351, of goods and merchandise. Of this, $100,000,000 was of foreign origin, imported into the country in a single year. Of this amount, however, there was exported abroad $20,595,077, leaving to be consumed at home within our own country, $810,438,264. The whole amount of our exports during the same period was $335,594,365; of which gold and silver coin and bullion made up $57,592,305; leaving, therefore, an amount of exports, aside from gold and silver, of $278,392,060. Thus, the excess of imports over exports was $232,046,184.

I am aware that there is one theory that goes on, and grows, that the tariff is laid in proportion to the amount of its imports, and that large imports are a proof of large wealth and of the increase of wealth. For myself, I have not been accustomed, at any period of my life, to deal in such large figures, and I am not sure that I am able to comprehend all the philosophy of that school of political economy. It seems to me that if we simplify it a little, and take the case of an individual, a planter or a farmer, and try the question on a small scale, we may understand it better. Suppose, then, that a planter or farmer takes the surplus product of his farm or plantation, all that he has to dispose of, and sells it to a neighboring merchant, and that he buys from the merchant all that he wishes for family consumption. At the end of the year he settles his account, and finds that he owes the merchant $500. Now, that planter or farmer is certainly not taking a thrifty business, he is not making money; but is losing it, although his imports, so to speak, are $500 a year more than his exports. I take it to be very manifest that the individual case is the same in substance, is not on the road to wealth, but is on the road to the alms-house; and I am utterly at a loss to conceive of any difference in point of principle, between an individual and a nation under just such circumstances.

We, as a nation, last year, imported more than we exported, to the amount, as I have already stated, of $232,046,184. I believe that that is a losing business, and that a nation pursuing that course is tending to bankruptcy. Now, look for a moment at some of the imports which go to make up this enormous amount of our imports. I have looked over the tables, as prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and find that we imported manufactures of cotton, $236,315,081; of manufactures of wool and worsted, $33,221,596; of iron and steel, $10,000,000; of iron and steel, $19,221,547; amounting, in the aggregate, to $79,085,984 of these three classes of articles—manufactures of cotton, manufactures of wool and worsted, and iron and steel, and manufactures of iron and steel.

Now, Mr. President, I must say that I believe this country ought to have manufactured all these several articles here at home, and not imported one dollar of the more than seventy-nine million dollars' worth that we did import. That, I believe, is the course we ought to pursue. A national import, ought to have followed. It is pretty apparent that we are not raising revenue enough to meet our expenses. Our expenditures during the past year, as appears by the message of the President of the United States, were $53,731,511.57. The estimated deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1861, was $66,714,928.79; and the estimated deficiency for the fiscal year is $5,988,424.04. I shall confess myself much mistaken if our expenditure does not exceed the estimate, and, of course, if the estimated deficiency is not about of the reality. But, sir, even if both should be right, or both be wrong, the subsequent facts shall prove to be true, it is very clear that proper legislation requires the revision of the tariff laws, and requires such a change as shall make the receipts of the Government equal to the amount of the expenditures. The expediency of this principle must certainly be recognized.

from Delaware withdraw his motion, to allow petitions and reports to be introduced?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir; I cannot. I think the bill ought to pass. If it gives rise to any debate, I will move to lay it on the table myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senate that, under the rule of the Senate, he calls for petitions and reports, if no motion be made after the reading of the Journals; but under the power of the Senate to regulate its own business, if the Senator gets the floor and moves to take up a bill in the morning hour, it is clearly in order. It is moved to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays, that the power of the Senate to regulate its own business may be given to the presenting of petitions, we will ask the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will come to order until it gets in possession of the question on which the yeas and nays are asked. The Senator from Delaware moves to take up the bill (S. No. 3) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855; and upon that motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from Delaware will suspend his motion for a minute, to allow Senators to present petitions. They will take but a few moments. That is the easiest way to get out of the difficulty.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not desire to obstruct the business of the Senate, nor to interfere with order in any way. If the Senate do not desire to pass this bill, I have no particular interest in it. It concerns the decency and the morality of the country. I am sure Senators would not be disposed to pass it during the whole of the last Congress. I have now moved to take it up, because it will take no time to consider it. The Senate has already taken up another bill this morning, and passed it. I do not desire to interfere with Senators or anything of that kind. I will postpone the motion; and I hope the Senate will afterwards take up the bill, and pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion may be withdrawn by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. If the Senator hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that pension may be allowed to the surviving militia of the year of 1812, and to the widows of those deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that the militia who served in the Indian wars, and in that of 1812, may be placed on the same footing in regard to bounty land as those who served in the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented seven petitions of manufacturers and mechanics of Clay county, Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the tariff which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Charles H. Robinson, praying that his pension may commence from the time of the injury for which it was granted; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEARCE presented a petition of merchants and underwriters of Baltimore, praying the restoration of the mail service between Charleston, South Carolina, and Havana; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. IVERSON presented the memorial of H. T. A. Rainalds, praying compensation for his services as United States consul at Elsinore, Denmark; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of B. F. Rittenhouse, a clerk in the office of the Register of the Treasury, praying extra compensation for preparing the estimates of appropriations; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LATHAM presented the petition of Charles Hare, praying Congress to pass a law changing the name of the schooner Emma, a foreign vessel, and for her enrollment, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, it was Ordered, That C. C. Cook and A. A. Lockwood have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, it was Ordered, That the letter of J. M. Winchell, president of the National constitutional convention, proposing an enrolled copy of the constitution of Kansas adopted at Wyandotte, July 29, 1859, presented March 6, 1860, be referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of P. Thier, praying compensation for services on the boundary survey between the United States and Mexico, and an allowance for transportation from said survey to his home, submitted an adverse report, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of F. W. Lander, reported a bill (S. No. 284) for the relief of F. W. Lander; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of John Brannan, an employé in the Department of State, praying compensation for extra services, reported a bill (S. No. 285) for the relief of John Brannan; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by Mr. SCHMKA, on the 14th of February, directing the committee to consider the expediency of amending the existing statutes so as to abolish all discrimination between American citizens and foreigners in the office fees on the issue of patents, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the committee having already acted on the question; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of M. C. Grizner, praying compensation for damages sustained by the non-fulfillment of a contract made by the Commissioner of Patents with him for the execution of descriptions and illustrations of patents, and the bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of M. C. Grizner, reported the bill without amendment, with a recommendation that it do pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of R. L. Dorr, praying that the Secretary of State may be authorized to demand of the British Government indemnity for a violation, by its subjects, of the rights of Samuel G. Dorr, under a patent for an improved method of shearing cloth, issued by the United States Patent Office, October 30, 1792, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Eliphalet Brown, jr., praying for the difference between the pay of master's mate and artist in the Japan expedition, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BARRACKS AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. LATHAM submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this body with site plan, estimate, and reports relating to the construction of new barracks for the troops at the Presidio of San Francisco, and centrally the office of the inspector general, relating thereto, of May, 1859.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. FOWLER, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 398) for the relief of Peay & Ayilife, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The bill was read a first and second time, by unanimous consent; and on motion of Mr. Johnson, of Arkansas, it was ordered to lie on the table.

A subsequent message from the House announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 192) authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $300,000, for building a market-house, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 228) relative to the printing and distribution of the annual message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 228) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Pearson, deceased.

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to offer a resolution, to which there will be no objection, as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs agrees to it. I am satisfied that the matter to which it relates needs attention at this session very much; and I hope that the Committee on Naval Affairs, if the Senate recommit those bills, will take the matter into immediate consideration and report, in order that it may be got through this session. I believe it is a branch of the service which requires action:

Resolved, That Senate bills numbered 28 and 33 be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing the pay of each grade of officers per annum, in dollars and cents, with an increase at stated periods, up to twenty years of service.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MALLORY. I will suggest to my friend from Maine to leave the alternative to the committee, to require them to inquire into the expediency of it. I agree with the principle, but I would suggest to the Senator that he amend his resolution, so that the committee will be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting such a bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine make the modification suggested by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is going to lead to debate I will; but I introduced the resolution after consulting with the Senator, and he agreed to it in the form in which it is presented.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, I will take it in that form.

Mr. SLIDFELL. I trust that a question so grave as this will not be passed as a matter of course. I think the committee ought to have some discretion on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary will modify my resolution so that the committee will be directed to inquire into the expediency of it, and report. I do not care about the form.

The resolution as modified was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate bills Nos. 28 and 33 be recommended to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing the pay of each grade of officers per annum, in dollars and cents, with an increase at stated periods, up to twenty years of service.

HOOR OF MEETING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will now call up the special order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the special order is taken up, I wish to submit a motion in relation to the hour of meeting of the Senate. We have a very large Calendar, and the session is now being procrastinated. We all know that after a late hour in the day it is impossible to keep Senators here. I think the easier and better way would be to meet earlier in the morning. I think we ought to meet earlier, and for that purpose I submit a motion that the daily hour of the meeting of the Senate shall be twelve o'clock, meridian, until otherwise ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. HAMLIN. I submit that it is not a matter which must lie over, because a Senator objects to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine can move to postpone the special order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do so for the purpose of submitting that motion in regard to the hour of meeting. I do not suppose it will take up the time of the Senate.

Mississippi, while he was Secretary of War; but although I have very great respect for his opinions, I think the facts will show that four years is long enough. Certainly, when we have such instances before us every day as we see of gentlemen who have gone through the Academy for a term of four years, and arrived at great distinction, both in the Army and out of it, I think it would be concluded that the term that is usual at our colleges is sufficient for the Military Academy.

Now, sir, I stated that I understood (and it has not been denied by the honorable Senator) that the teachers of that Academy are in favor of the term of four years. I think they are competent judges of what education it is necessary to give a young man in order to take the grade of a lieutenant in the Army. I have always supported three appropriations for the Military Academy. I know there are many that are opposed to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine whether the professors of the Academy or the academic staff, have not coupled with this another recommendation: that the standard of education shall be elevated, in order to enable a young man to become a cadet?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that is their opinion.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that to be the case; that they have coupled with the opinion that four years is all that is necessary, that a young man should receive a superior education to that which he is now compelled to receive in order to gain admission. The effect will be, that those whose parents are able to educate them thoroughly before they go there can secure admission, but those not so fortunate cannot be admitted because not competent to pass the examination.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, I do not know how it may be in point of fact in other places, but I have known many young men enter the Military Academy, and they went there with what is called a common education, such as is usually attained in our common schools, to which all have access; and if a boy, with the opportunity which boys of all classes have in this country to go to school, arrives at the age of sixteen years and has not sufficiently accomplished himself to enter the Military Academy, what can I but conclude that I am rather inclined to think he is not fit to go there at all, or would not stay there long after he entered the Academy. I do not regard that as a sufficient argument. It is not true, in this country, that there is no opportunity to be had at sixteen years, which is about the age thought most advisable, to acquire all the education that is necessary. This is simply a proposition to extend the term of the Academy another year, and to give a preliminary education there, instead of requiring that it should be obtained elsewhere.

I have no sort of feeling about this subject. I care nothing about it. I think it my duty to offer this amendment for the simple reason that if we are to undertake to educate young men for the Army, with all the objection there is to the Military Academy at present, it is not quite advisable to take them upon an early age and give them the rudiments of education. By so doing we extend the term of the Academy, and it expenses very much, and make it more odious than it is now among many. But, sir, I have not the slightest pride of feeling about it one way or the other. It is a matter I have deliberated upon, and with the judgment of the academic staff in favor of this change. I have thought it my duty to submit it to the Senate, with perfect indifference on my part whether they vote it in or vote it out.

Mr. DAVIS. I will make one remark as to the last words of the Senator from Maine. I do not see how he reaches the conclusion that the board which is now examining the programme of studies is composed partly of the academic staff. The superintendent of the Military Academy is the president of the board which now has the subject under consideration. If the board has not reported, if I had all the information to be presented by that board, I might make a decision; I might be ready to act upon it. As at present I pressed, I should say if the term is to be fixed, I would fix it at five years; but I dislike to make a motion to amend, by fixing five years, because I prefer to have the advantage of the report which is to be made by that board. I think any action upon it at this time premature. If we are to fix it by law, do not do it until we have all the facts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the board is now sitting upon the subject and examining it?

Mr. DAVIS. The board assembled, progressed to a certain extent, and adjourned to meet again. At the next meeting, the professors of the branch in the Academy were required to make out the total schedule of studies in each division of the Academy, which is in process of preparation; and the board is to reassemble some time during this month or the next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be a very good reason for delay. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment under those circumstances. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; I withdraw it. Mr. HALE. I have an amendment to offer. It is to insert, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, provided for by the act of April 7, 1860, shall not receive the bounty or gratuity of the United States, in the opinion of the lieutenant general of the United States, in the event of the mounted regiment of the Army, or so much thereof as may be necessary, can be safely ordered to the defense of Texas.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WIGFALL. I would merely suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that it would be better to amend his amendment, and make the lieutenant general the commander of the Army, instead of the President of the United States. The object clearly is to kill the bill. I will not discuss it.

Mr. HALE. I will only say, in my humble opinion, with the highest respect for both these gentlemen, the President of the United States and the lieutenant general, that I think I would rather have the lieutenant general's opinion in a question of military tactics than that of the President. Mr. WIGFALL. But the fathers happen to differ with you. The Constitution makes the President the commander-in-chief.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this is really giving a stone, when bread was asked for. The executive department asked for more mounted troops. He wanted some regiments added to the regiment of Texas. The President of the United States, however, chose instead of giving him what he asked for, to give him a regiment of mounted volunteers. Having passed a law providing for that increase in certain contingencies, one regiment of mounted men and two regiments of cavalry, which two might be mounted in the discretion of the President, the Executive thought proper not to call them into service, because Congress had made no appropriation. The question before us now is to make an appropriation to execute a law of Congress. It is not that the Executive has asked you to substitute regular troops by volunteers or irregular troops. The reverse is true. From no action taken by the executive department, the Senator from New Hampshire makes his proposition. Congress had a right to judge what kind of troops to give; but this proposition assumes to judge that because Congress substituted one kind of troops for another, as a measure of economy, therefore a reduction must follow. You are only giving what was asked for—an increase. Congress exercised its discretion in deciding how that increase should be given; but now the Senator appends to that a proposition to reduce the existing force, to take away the northern frontier of Texas at the scene of daily raids by roving and murderous bands, and when the Rio Grande frontier, which is the international boundary between the United States and Mexico, is the scene of such disturbances, and the western frontier of Texas and this. It is a strange time to propose a reduction. You have thrown upon the President the responsibility of calling out the kind of troops which you yourselves have thought proper to adopt. Is not that correct? Must you, in the face of the declaration of a necessity for these additional troops to save the property, to save the lives of the people of Texas, propose a reduction so as to diminish the power of the Executive to give that protection both to the northern and western frontiers of Texas which devolves on us as one of the highest duties under our constitutional existence? It is quite clear, sir, that those who seek to give protection to that country, sooner than adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, would reject the proposition entirely, leaving the President with the force he has, and the power he has to call out the militia; leaving also the Governor of the State with the power which he now exercises to employ the volunteer companies of Texas, and with an existing law upon the statute-book providing for the calling out of regiments from that State, and with the certainty that those troops not having been controlled and directed by the Federal authority would soon come here for payment, and that we should have to pay the bills of all expenses incurred.

I do not see the purpose of the Senator from New Hampshire. I cannot comprehend the object which he has in view. He surely does not thus expect to initiate a reduction of the Army. He cannot believe that because we are asked for more troops, the time has come when a reduction may properly be made. He should wait for a season of peace. He should wait for a time when the troops have been concentrated, when the large force now in Utah has been brought back to the duties in which it was formerly engaged. If then it shall be found that we have an excess of troops, that would be the time to propose a reduction; not now, when the want of troops causes us to look for all conforming volunteers to perform those duties which ordinarily devolve on the regular Army. The State of Texas is entitled to consideration in her present condition, and when the Executive makes a request, which request is complied with in a manner consistent with the views of Congress, it is but little that he should ask you for the money with which to carry out your own views. That is all he asks.

I do not wish, Mr. President, to prolong a debate which may perhaps only delay the rejection of an amendment, the object of which I do not comprehend, the objections to which I have briefly stated, and the purpose of which I shall be glad to learn from the Senator from New Hampshire if he has real purpose in it.

Mr. HALE. I would be glad if the Senator from Mississippi will tell the Senate how many Federal troops there are in Texas, what kind of troops they are, and how many are ordered there now.

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot state the number. I have recently seen an order sending some companies to the Rio Grande. I think the whole of the second cavalry should be in Texas. Whether it is or not, I cannot say. Some remarks made in debate by the Senator from Massachusetts were that there are six companies of the first cavalry stationed just above Texas, perhaps in the military department of Texas, just north of the Red river.

Mr. WILSON. I have a return here, with a note of the adjutant general of the Army, showing that there are twenty-four military posts now in Texas, and two thousand six hundred and fifty-one men. There have been some ordered there; but how many I cannot tell.

Mr. HALE. How many of those are mounted men?

Mr. WILSON. I have not looked to see; but the description is all down here. I can tell in a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. If you will read the designation of the troops, I can tell whether they are in Texas or not. I think it likely that the adjutant general includes in the department of Texas troops stationed north of the Red river. The department of Texas is addressed to the Secretary of War, and the Senator from Massachusetts is probably aware.

Mr. HALE. I understand, then, that there are at least two thousand six hundred men there; and the Senator from Mississippi says the second cavalry should be in Texas. I would like him.

Mr. DAVIS. If I do not mean "should be," in the sense of giving any direction as to where they ought to be; but, from such information as I possess, I suppose them to be there.

Mr. HALE. That is what I understood, that from such information as the Senator possesses, there is now one mounted regiment in Texas, consisting, I suppose, of about a thousand men, and there are sixteen hundred others, besides, from the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, and there are others as route for Texas; and yet, because I offer this amendment, it is intimated that I am against affording protection to Texas, and that the Senator from Massachusetts, every soldier of it; for there they would find some legitimate purpose and object to set themselves about.

There is something curious about this, Mr. President. The act which has been referred to was passed on the 7th of April, 1846, nearly two years ago. It was passed in view of an existing emergency. It provided—

"That the President of the United States be authorized to receive into the service of the United States one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers, to be raised and organized by the State of Texas, for the defense and protection of the frontier therein."

That which was temporary in its purpose, and to continue, when the act was passed but eighteen months, has been continued by the President, from that day to this. The eighteen months have expired long ago; and now we propose to raise this new regiment, just exactly as if the emergency upon which it was authorized now existed.

If Texas requires everything the gentlemen say—and I am not going to gainsay it—I want to know if twenty-six hundred of the Federal troops now there are not sufficient? And if, in the opinion of the lieutenant general, a sufficient number of other Federal troops cannot be ordered there, then I am willing to give a regiment of Texas mounted volunteers. But, sir, I do not believe that the exigencies of the service there require this particular kind of force. Yet, I will not obtrude my own opinion upon the Senate, I am willing to rely on the opinion of the lieutenant general. I suppose nobody will impeach his judgment or his patriotism or his entire integrity in the opinion that he will give, if he is called upon to give this amendment which I propose, to give one. I simply want to say that if, in the opinion of a man perfectly competent to give it, this regiment is not wanted, we will not, at this time, put our hands into the Federal Treasury, and take out $1,000,000 a year, for the purpose of sending this regiment out, when it is not wanted. That is all that I mean by the amendment. I do not desire to argue it. I simply content myself with asking for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt, sir, that there is a general feeling in the Senate and in the country, that the expenses of the Army have been very large; but I find, on examination, that the Army is stationed in nearly one hundred and thirty posts scattered over the country, and in very small numbers at each. There are, in the department of the West, comprising Minnesota, Nebraska, and Kansas, eight military stations, with two thousand two hundred and eighty men. I suppose that those troops are necessary there, and that those familiar with that country do not propose to withdraw them. In the department of New Mexico there are fourteen military posts and two thousand and ninety-six men; in the department of Utah, two military posts and one thousand nine hundred and nineteen men; in the department of Oregon, fourteen posts and two thousand three hundred and fifty-three men; in the department of California, fourteen posts and one thousand two hundred and seventy men. Here, sir, in the Territories of Spain, there are, in seventy-six military posts, nearly thirteen thousand men, scattered over a vast expanse of Territory, and I suppose that those who have stationed those troops understand the wants of those vast sections of our country.

Now, it is said that the troops from these distant portions of our Territories cannot be placed at once upon the banks of the Rio Grande for the defense of the State of Texas. I have reflected somewhat on this subject, and have made up my mind to vote for the proposition to raise this regiment. I do not like to disagree with those with whom I commonly concur; but, in my judgment, we need all the care of the Government of this country to keep out of a controversy with Mexico. I do not say that we are drifting into a war with Mexico; but I believe it will require the watchful care of every department of this Government to keep out of a war. The Governor of Texas has sent a communication to me in which I think amounts to just this—no more, and no less—that there have been invasions of the State of Texas which will not be submitted to; that if the Federal Government will take the matter in hand, and send troops there, and protect the frontier of the State against the State against the Mexicans and against the Indians, the authorities of Texas will take no action; but if you decline to do so, they can draw out ten thousand men in a few weeks, and he will take the responsibility of doing it. I believe that, if he does it, he will cross the river, and carry out an idea which we all know he entertains, of extending over Mexico a protectorate, or conquering that country. We may, therefore, by voting down this proposition, involve the country in a war; and I think it the part of prudence, of safety, of peace, of humanity, to raise this regiment, and take, ourselves, the control of the affairs of that frontier.

It is said the Governor can call out troops, and we shall have to pay for them. I do not want the Governor to call out troops, or to have the command of them. I want the Government of this country, with all the responsibilities that devolve upon it, to take care of this boundary question, and to take care of this question concerning the Indians, and I would rather trust this force under the Government of the whole country, than under the government of the people living on the frontier—a people who regard the lives of Indians as of little more value than the lives of a horde of buffaloes that range over the prairie. While we have, in the annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, a statement of the action of a portion of the people of that State in regard to the Indians placed upon a reservation. First, they demanded the removal of the Indians. After the Government, under the present administration, that they should be removed, then they said they should not be removed; and when they were removed, and the Indian agent returned, he was murdered. We all know that on these frontiers, North or South, in any part of this country, there is a hostile feeling between the frontier settlers and the Indians; and I would rather trust the Army, and the officers of the Army, and the Government of the whole country, than trust the people who live on the frontier, in the management of these matters. For these reasons I shall vote for the appropriation of seven hundred and odd thousand dollars for the support of this regiment. The President will take the responsibility of calling it out, if it is needed, and he will do so, because I want to preserve the peace of the country, and to take every precaution necessary for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have listened to the statement from Massachusetts as I always do, with pleasure, but he gives attention to the strange logic that I ever heard in my life. The Senator says he does not want to trust this matter to the inhabitants of Texas, the frontiersmen; that they do not regard the lives of Indians more than they do buffaloes; and therefore he is going to vote for this bill. What does this bill do? It puts a regiment of these very mounted Texas volunteers on to those buffaloes and Indians. I want to send the regular Army there. I want to send forces there, officers and command, by our own men, subject to Federal authority, and subject to the rules and articles of war. But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is afraid to trust the Texans to manage this matter, and yet he is willing to do so in the case of the regular Army, but he will not have the Army, but he will vote for a regiment of Texas mounted volunteers to be raised and organized by the State of Texas, and for the defense of the frontier, and all the officers of this regiment of Texas volunteers are to be commissioned under the authority of this very State of Texas, that he says he is afraid will run over into Mexico and involve us in a war!

Well, sir, I yield to his fears; but how does he reconcile this argument with sending to Texas a regiment raised by Texas under the authority of that very Governor of Texas whom he is afraid to trust? He allows him to raise a regiment, officered by Texas, accountable to Texas, and not accountable to us; he is afraid to trust them in their critical state of affairs, which we want to send the Federal Army, officered by Federal officers, and subject to Federal control; and, that we may not be mistaken or misled in this matter, I will judge of the highest military merit that there is in the subject—officers whose judgment and integrity and skill and discretion I presume everybody has the most unlimited confidence. If the Senator is afraid to trust the Governor of Texas, why on earth is he afraid to trust him with us and send the Federal force there, and if he has not all the confidence he might have in the discretion of the Governor of Texas, repose in the discretion of the lieutenant general?

Now, sir, with all my respect for the Senator, I am obliged to meet his argument, and to strike my mind; and it does not follow, because you have great respect for a man, that you are bound to respect his arguments, particularly when they strike you as a little absurd, as they do me in this instance. I declare that, on this subject, I do feel, and feel deeply. What is the use of continually strengthening the military arm of this Government? I do not desire a reduction of the Army, as the honorable Senator from Mississippi said, at this time, on this occasion. I do desire it; for I know that we have got more than four times as many as we need; but the difficulty is, that, whenever we have an actual occasion to use them, we always want to increase. It would seem, according to the logic of gentlemen, that we want about twenty thousand men and arm, at an expense of about twenty million dollars a year, to do nothing; and when there is something to do, we must have an extra supply and some extraordinary force raised.

But I am glad to be content against this. It is going through. All the trucks are one way—to increase the Army—and there are none backward. It is not to be diminished. It will not be diminished. All the expenses are increasing. Here we are about to increase the expenses of this Government at least $1,000,000 annually. Gentlemen tell us these troops may be disbanded some time. So the world may come to an end some time; and I shall thank Divine Providence if ever get our Army diminished before that event comes round. But it will never be diminished as long as you have any Federal Treasury to spend, or Federal credit to borrow money with. Just as long as you have that, the Army will be increased.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from New Hampshire does not understand my logic. If the Senator understood the facts of the case, perhaps he would understand my logic better. Now, sir, the point is this: a demand is made for troops for the defense of the State of Texas, and the Senate is called out, it is not to be called out by the Governor of Texas, and is not to be under his control. If it is organized and called into the field by the United States, it will be officered, it is true, by Texas men, but the troops will be under the articles and regulations of war, and the commanding officer of the Army of the United States, precisely as the regular Army is. This regiment will become part and parcel of the Army, subject to the control of that officer. That is the fact; however, the Governor of Texas calls out troops himself, on his own authority, they will be under his own control, and will be marched where he chooses to march them. That is the distinction. It is because I want these troops to be under the articles of war, and to be under the control of the Government of the United States, to be absolutely under the direction and control of the commanding officer of the Texas military department, that I prefer to make this appropriation to meet these contingencies, rather than to trust to the contingencies that may arise if we refuse it and the Governor calls for volunteers and raises, perhaps, ten thousand men, as he says he can do in thirty days. If he does so, and brings them into the field under his own control, he may involve us in an expenditure of millions of dollars, and may involve us in a war with Mexico. That is the distinction. I think it is a plain and clear one; and I think if the Senator from New Hampshire will look at the facts of the case, he will understand the reason I have given for this vote of mine. At any rate, they are satisfactory to my own judgment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. HALE, read—yeas 12, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ringham, Chandler, Dixon, Durkee, Grimes, Hale, Hiram, Hiram, Smith, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—12.

AYES—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Briggs, Brown, Chace, Hays, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Gwin, Hammond, Humphreys, Hunt, Ireland, Johnson, Johnson, Johnson, Johnson, Johnson, Kennedy, Lane, Nicholson, Pearson, Pomeroy, Rusk, Thomson, Toombs, Wigfall, Wilson, and Yates—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that the course of instruction at the Military Academy ought to be fixed at four years; and, with a view of having the sense of the Senate upon that question, I renew the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Maine, to add to the bill, as an additional section:

Section 1. Further education at West Point. The West Point Academy shall be, and the same is hereby, fixed at four years.

I dislike very much to oppose the views of the Senator from Mississippi, who has had great experience in relation to the Academy, and also in the case of the country; and I have very great respect for his opinions; but I have spent portions of several summers at West Point, and I have noticed the course of instruction, the character of the Academy, and the attainments of the young men constituting the corps of cadets, and I am satisfied myself that there are many good reasons why the course should be fixed at four years.

First, that is a sufficient time for any young man who is fit for the service to prepare himself for the duties of a soldier. It is a sufficient time for him to obtain such education as was contemplated when the Academy was established; and I think I may say that the world has not produced finer soldiers than many of those who graduated at West Point under the four years' term.

There is another reason why it should be restricted to four years. It is that the Academy as presented does not afford a sufficient number of graduates for the service. We are making citizen appointments every now and then. The object of the Academy was to prepare young men for the Army. By repeating the course in two years, you are not able to educate the same number that would graduate under a four years' course; and, in fact, there were not enough graduated under the four years' course. Then, why should we deprive the country of the service of those additional officers who would be produced by extending a four years' term? I believe—I do not speak certainly—I leave it to the Senator from Mississippi to say—that ordinarily, less than half the cadets who enter the school graduate. A five years' term is too long.

The standard of preparation is not right, let it be raised. The board of examination can raise it, and require such a course of preparation as will enable young men to go through in four years. I am satisfied that very much inconvenience cannot grow out of the change. Now, if the first class will graduate in June next. The second class can graduate in January following, if you please; that would reduce their term to four years and a half; and then the third class could graduate in June of the year following, making their term four years. There will be no more inconvenience in reducing the term than there was in raising it. The first graduates under the five years' course graduated last June; and if I recollect aright, about twenty constituted the number of that class, or perhaps it may have been twenty-five or twenty-three. That was the extent of the class that graduated at the end of the five years' term. It must be apparent, I think, to everybody, that no inconvenience could grow out of the change; and that, if good graduates are to be had, and more graduates, we should have more young men qualified for the service than we can have under the present system.

But, in addition to all that, I am satisfied that five years is too long a period to keep a young man at West Point. It is the hardest school in the world; and to keep him there five years is not necessary to prepare him for the Army, and that too after he has been, perhaps, three or four years in college before entering the Military Academy. I hope the Senate will reduce the course to four years, and fix it at that, so that they shall not have other change by the action of the Department. My recollection is not exactly like that of the Senator from Mississippi in relation to the changes that have been made at West Point. If I am not mistaken, during the first year of the late Secretary of War, he ordered the course up to five years. My recollection is, that summer before last, the present Secretary of War reduced it to four years, and the order was published and read at West Point; and then about the 1st of April last, another order was issued from the War Department ordering the term up to five years again; and I think I am not mistaken about the matter. But at any rate, Mr. President, I want the sense of the Senate in relation to fixing the course at four years; and I think the interests of the Academy would be promoted by it; and in my opinion the interests of the country would be consulted by allowing each Senator the right to appoint a cadet. Now the appointment of cadets is now made by lot from each Representative district; and less than one half of them graduate; and when you bring the course up to five years the country derives very little benefit from the Academy. If Senators would come with me that the number of graduates ought to be increased, and that it would be better to provide that each Senator should have the appointment of one cadet, and that the interests of the country would be promoted by extending the privilege to them, I trust that some one will propose an amendment. I simply make the suggestion. I hope the Senate will now fix the course by law, so that there shall be no changing it back and forth as heretofore. Four years is long enough. Fix it at that, and young men will graduate as well, and be as well qualified for the service at the end of four years as they will be at the end of the present long term.

Mr. DAVIS. The course of a great institution cannot be varied about like a weathercock. The Secretary of War certainly never committed such a blunder as to send an order for with to reduce the course to four years. What the Senator must have heard, was an order to prepare a programme for a four years' course, which programme, I have learned, was prepared, but was never approved, and consequently the change was not made. I could not make the change without further action by the War Department. It is a serious matter; it takes years to bring it about; and when Congress goes into the Academy to arrange the studies, it is as great a misfit as a bull in a china shop. The academic staff had been for some time looking an inch or two behind, and when finally it was decided upon, it was necessary to wait until by accident a very large class was appointed, which was susceptible of division into two, and the opportunity was thus offered of increasing the classes from four to five. The Secretary of War was easy to reduce the course; it is a difficult thing to do either; the reduction the more so of the two, because when he attempts to reduce, he throws the whole line of studies into confusion. It is a thing which must be done progressively. Now, will the several years be taken from one programme of studies to another; and this easy mode of fixing a date by which studies are to be completed, without any reference to the books to be mastered, and the capacity of the students to learn, is more facile in legislation than in academic execution. I may reach the conclusion that a four years' term is long enough; I want the advantage of the thorough investigation which will be before us when the report of the board which is now sitting upon the programme of studies and the course of discipline, shall have been presented to the Secretary of War, and referred to us.

As to the capacity shown by graduates of the Academy, I think that is a very poor rule for the purpose for which it is now cited. It does not always mean that all the knowledge a man possesses was acquired at any one of the schools at which he may have been; and it is a fact, which is very well known to the Senator, that when he finds an officer in the Army able to perform that duty, which so frequently devolves on the officer, of sketching in the field, it is not because he was taught it at West Point. The course has never provided for sketching in the field. It has never provided for the study of the manufacture of arms in armories, and arsenals, and foundries. It has never provided for studying miningology, and geology, and botany, in the field. It has never provided for the practicing the construction of temporary intrenchments; never provided for any of those portions of practical military instruction which must be learned in a school of application if the student is to be a soldier.

Our Army is too small for schools of application, and nothing is more idle than to borrow our theories from Governments maintaining great armies with schools of elementary instruction, and schools of application to which graduates are sent. We have no school of elementary instruction, and the school of application combined in the small military establishment which we maintain; and it is by those who overlook this striking fact—who those who insist that Congress in its generosity shall establish schools of application—that this argument has been made, so far as it has been made, by those who comprehend the whole bearing of the subject. Those who made an effort, for a long time, to get a commission and to serve the academic board. It is true of a majority, as I am informed, that they have now changed their opinion—that they find the course too tedious; but is there no other remedy than to reduce it to four years? Is human capacity exhausted by declaring a particular number of years, or by employing superintendents, professors, commandants, and instructors who cannot take the trouble to govern men by some of those moral forces which are applied in every institution that attempts to teach? Why shall there not be two classes of cadets? Why may not one year's practical instruction be of those who have no near regard to the commission as to be governed by different rules of discipline, and the tedium be relieved by relaxing the discipline applied to them? There are other means of government than to make men choose to study the question; and I am not disposed to lower the standard of instruction for our officers of the Army beneath the highest measure of attainment which may be reached by a course of application in the Academy; in order that we may make it a school of administration and of the duties of those who are charged with it, for that is the beginning and the end of the question.

As to the number of graduates being too small for the wants of the Army, that is no grievance to me. I propose to introduce new elements into the service. I prefer that all the officers of the Army should not come from one school. I prefer that some should be drawn from civil life. I prefer that some should be drawn from the ranks; and Congress, I think, acted not only generously, but wisely, in the looking an inch or two behind, and when finally it was decided upon, it was necessary to wait until by accident a very large class was appointed, which was susceptible of division into two, and the opportunity was thus offered of increasing the classes from four to five. The Secretary of War was easy to reduce the course; it is a difficult thing to do either; the reduction the more so of the two, because when he attempts to reduce, he throws the whole line of studies into confusion. It is a thing which must be done progressively. Now, will the several years be taken from one programme of studies to another; and this easy mode of fixing a date by which studies are to be completed, without any reference to the books to be mastered, and the capacity of the students to learn, is more facile in legislation than in academic execution. I may reach the conclusion that a four years' term is long enough; I want the advantage of the thorough investigation which will be before us when the report of the board which is now sitting upon the programme of studies and the course of discipline, shall have been presented to the Secretary of War, and referred to us.

I think, Mr. President, that the Senator from Maine acted judiciously in withdrawing his amendment, on the exhibition of the fact that the programme of studies was now a subject under consideration, so that, as it is revised, I will take occasion to say that, for my part, I accept the concurrent testimony of all the members of the academic board that, by the introduction of English studies into the first year of the course, they have prepared the cadets better to comprehend the higher branches of mathematics, natural philosophy, and thus they have gone to more advantage in their subsequent studies than under the old course, to which we must return, if we recede to the four years' term.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am the last man in the world who would shut the door upon merit. I am glad that Congress has made the way for the private to reach command; and I shall always be glad to see the soldier win his way from the ranks to the higher positions of the service. From such material the armies of the world have obtained their most illustrious commanders.

Now, Mr. President, I cannot for my life see any inconvenience that could possibly occur in the change, when the course was changed. The class that would have graduated June a year ago, under the four years' term, would have graduated last June; and those who had progressed well, graduated at that time; but the younger half of the class were kept over to the end of five years. I am sure the same rule will work in bringing it back to four years.

Mr. DAVIS. I will tell the Senator exactly the number of men employed in a particular year, happened to be admitted in a particular year. All south boundary of Kansas, in the direction of Fort Gibson and Galveston Bay; a railroad from the western boundary of the State of Missouri, south of the fourth standard parallel line, so as to connect with the Oange Valley and Southern Kansas railroad, thence westerly, in the direction of Burlington and Emporia, in Fort Riley.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That there be, and are hereby, granted to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska alternate sections of the public lands, in the same extent and in the same manner, and upon the same limitations and restrictions in every respect, as are by the preceding sections of this act granted to the Territory of Nebraska, in aid in the construction of a railroad from Elmwood, in Kansas, or some other eligible point, to be determined by the Legislature, so as to connect with the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad, at Fort Kearny, in the Nebraska Territory.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That none of the lands herein granted shall be disposed of by said Territories, upon the line of any of the roads herein mentioned, until after the construction and equipment of twenty consecutive miles of said road.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GROW. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist upon that call. Let us introduce our amendments.

Mr. GROW. I must insist on the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being called for, reports are in order from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CASE. [Mr. KULLOOG.] I know, has a report from that committee, which he is desirous to report. He is not in his seat at present. I hope he will be allowed to make his report when he comes in.

APPEAL IN CERTAIN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain criminal cases, with an amendment.

Mr. HICKMAN. I ask that the bill and amendment be printed.

Mr. SPEAKER. What disposition does the gentleman propose for the bill? The bill is on its passage, unless the gentleman proposes some other disposition of it.

Mr. HICKMAN. I did not suppose it was necessary to make any reference. If so, I move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was accordingly referred, and ordered to be printed.

THE NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 104, to amend the naturalization laws of the United States; which was laid on the table.

CHARLESTON COURT-HOUSE.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported back the presentation of the grand jury of the city of Charleston, South Carolina, urging the necessity of a new court-house in that city; which was laid on the table.

PHARMACEUTICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Samuel M. Coleolic and others, asking the incorporation of the American Pharmaceutical Association; which was laid on the table.

JOHN S. CHANCEY AND OTHERS.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of John S. Chancey, George Miner, and others, securities for Dangerfield; which, with the petition, was laid on the table.

GENSUS LAWS.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported back the following resolution, with a recommendation that it do not pass:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an amendment of the law providing for the taking of the seventh and subsequent censuses of the United States.

The resolution was laid on the table.

McFARLAND & DOWNING.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of McFarland & Downing; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

PAPER CURRENCY.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the same committee, reported back a bill to establish and regulate a paper circulation of uniform value throughout the United States, and for other purpose, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KULLOOG, of Illinois. I desire to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and to ask that the bill be printed. It is a matter that has reference to the commerce of the country. I suppose there will be no objection to that reference.

Mr. HICKMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that bill ought not to go to the Committee on Commerce. It is a bill, if I understand it from its caption, having reference only to the currency for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KULLOOG, of Illinois. Oh, no; the bill provides for the deposit of gold and silver bullion, and the issuance of certificates of deposit, which may be used as currency throughout the United States.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then, I take it for granted the bill ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I would suggest to the House that this subject should be appropriately referred to the Committee on Commerce, that committee now having before them the question of the National Bank for the City of New York.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, if no objection be made.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object. It is clearly the business of the Committee of Ways and Means to be charged with all such subjects as this. It has nothing to do with the duties of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRANCH. I desire to know what reason the gentleman from Illinois can give for moving that this bill be printed. It is certainly an act of the House, and I would like to refer to standing committees of the House to be printed.

Mr. KULLOOG, of Illinois. For the reason that we are continually receiving requests for copies of the bill by persons outside the House, and for the further reason that I desire to have the bill printed for the information of the House.

Mr. BRANCH. Well, sir, I think the system which is in use, of printing all the bills reported from committees, entails expense enough upon the House, without printing the bills referred to Commerce.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask that rule 83 be read, which defines the duties of the Committee on Commerce.

The rule was read, as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Commerce to take into consideration all such petitions and matters as shall be presented to the committee of the House as shall be presented or shall or may come into question, and to report thereon to the House, and to report from time to time their opinion thereon."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will my friend from Pennsylvania declare that this matter of currency has nothing to do with commerce?

Mr. FLORENCE. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, in my opinion, no such subject can be referred to the Committee on Commerce under the rule of the House. I do not say that it has nothing to do with commerce, when one point of the country to another it may be connected with commerce; but I submit that the matter of a currency has nothing to do with the duties of that committee, as laid down in the rule which has been read. And further than that, it has been, I believe, the uniform practice of the House to refer all matters connected with the currency of the country, or with bank issues, to the Committee of Ways and Means. That has been the uniform practice, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. HOUSTON. So far as my opinion is concerned, I do not care where the bill goes; but I will say that, so far as that subject has heretofore been considered by the House, it has been referred always to the Committee of Ways and Means. As I understand this bill—and I have not read it at all out of context—I understand it to be a bill to regulate the deposit of bullion, the transmission of it from one point of the country to another, and the issuance, perhaps, of drafts of some sort or character, to be transmitted from one point of the country to another. I think it has been the uniform custom, and I think the proper course is to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I do not concur in the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina to the printing of new bills. The Senate is in the habit of printing all of their bills, even bills introduced by a member on leave; and I think one reason why so much of the legislation of this House passes without the knowledge of its members is that its bills are not printed. They are reported, marked here, sir, and are frequently put upon their passage. A motion to reconsider the vote by which they were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is made; and then that motion is called up, the previous question is demanded and sustained, and the bill passed under the operation thereof, the members knowing nothing of it, except that which they may gather while the yeas and nays are being called. I think that it would be a wholesome innovation to adopt here the practice which prevails in the Senate, and in most of our State Legislatures, that all bills brought into this House be printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. What we have here is one of the results of a violation of the rules of this House. I think that if, every morning, we proceeded in order, and that the rules were inviolated, and that the confusion and disorder which generally prevail here, it would facilitate our business very much. We would then avoid a good deal of the difficulty which now obstructs the course of legislation in this body. I have no objection to the printing of this bill, I think, as a general rule, that that should afford every means possible for the communication of information to the members of the House, in order that they may act intelligently. It is not the order to print that I object to; but I do object, sir, to the reference of this bill to the Committee on Commerce, when, under the rules, has nothing whatever to do with the matter in hand.

Mr. Speaker, the proposition made the other day by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE,] that a bill in relation to the establishment of a new department, the new department of the Mint of the United States, should go to the Committee on Commerce, was made, I think, in defiance of the rules of this House. I think that that bill ought to be brought back from that committee, so that it might be referred to a further consideration, and referred to some more appropriate committee. I am of the opinion that it ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means, who, under the rules, have the custody and consideration of all subjects relating to the currency and revenues of the country.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. FLORENCE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I take it, sir, that when the voice of this House refers a matter to a particular committee, it is tantamount to making it itself a rule for that case. We of the Committee on Commerce have found that that subject was, with eminent propriety, referred to us. We have found that it is intimately connected with the commerce of the whole country—with the commercial interests as well as of Philadelphia and New York of New York. I trust, too, that we shall be able to make to this House such a report as will be extremely satisfactory to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have great confidence in the gentleman's ability, integrity, and sense of justice. I sell him that I have nothing to do with particular localities of the Union, as such, so far as this subject is concerned. I stand here with "no pent-up Ulster" contracting my powers. I stand here with "no pent-up Ulster" contracting my powers. I do not believe that I am in any way actuated by selfish local prejudices. In this matter, I speak of a general principle which should rule and govern the action of this House. I do not object or favor a reference because Philadelphia or New York is concerned. I have nothing to do with either, except to take care of the interests of the people I represent whenever occasion offers. I am upon this floor, first of all, to watch and guard the interests of Philadelphia. That I am frank to admit.

Mr. Speaker, one word on the reference of this subject being an expression of the voice of the

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not call for the reading of the papers. This was the committee, and so far as I am concerned, I voted for the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HICKMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKER, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act to constitute Tampa Bay, in the State of Florida, a district of delivery; also, an act to amend "An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States," approved February 24, 1855; in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

DISTRICT JUDGES.

Mr. HICKMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported a bill to authorize the district judges of the United States to act out of their districts in certain cases, and moved to put it upon its passage.

The bill, which was read, provides that whenever any district judge of the United States shall file in the office of the clerks of the district and circuit courts of his district a consent in writing, under his hand, that his judicial duties may be performed and discharged by the district judge of any other district or districts to be therein named, the district judge of the district, or either of the districts so named, shall have power to sit in and hold any circuit or district court in the district of the judge signing such consent, at any stated, adjourned, or special term, or session thereof, with the same authority, powers, and duties, that might have been exercised or discharged therein by the district judge by whom such consent shall have been signed, until such consent shall be withdrawn and vacated by an order in writing, signed by the judge signing such consent, or, in case of his death, or other vacancy in the office, by his successor, and duly filed in the office of the clerks of the district and circuit courts; and while such consent shall remain in force, as aforesaid, the district judge of any district therein designated shall, whilst in the district of the judge signing such consent, have and possess, and may at his discretion exercise, all the powers, and perform and discharge all the duties, and be deemed the judge of the district of the judge signing such consent; and that all acts and proceedings before the courts so held, and all other acts and proceedings by or before any district judge so acting out of his own district, shall have the same validity, force, and effect, as if done and performed by and before the district judge of the district in which such consent shall have been filed; but that no district judge, acting out of his own district under the provisions of the bill, shall become entitled to any allowance, compensation, or expenses to be paid by the United States.

Mr. McKNIGHT. I would like to hear from some member of the Committee on the Judiciary an explanation of the provisions of this bill. It provides for leaving one judge in a district within the judicial district of another judge, on filing the consent of the latter, and without any application. It looks to me as though it might enable any judge of the United States court to shirk his own duty, and throw it upon the shoulders of some judge from other districts.

Mr. BINGHAM. It might have occurred, I submit with all respect, to the gentleman, that the law already existing provides sufficient protection against any United States judge shirking his duties. This bill is necessary; for if oftentimes happens, by reason of the sickness of a judge of a district court of the United States, that the public business cannot proceed. This bill is intended to provide against the occurrence of that kind, and to enable a district judge of any given district, who is alone authorized by existing laws to hold the courts within his district, by his certificate, if the public interests require it, to appoint another district judge, who, by the provisions of this bill, if passed, will have authority to transact the public business of that district, which otherwise might remain suspended for an indefinite period. It ought to occur at once to every one, upon this statement of the case, that such a bill is absolutely necessary.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio, that if such is the object of the bill, the provisions of the bill ought to have looked to that effect. As I understand the provisions of the bill, it gives the gentleman from Ohio power to send a district judge to confer his authority upon another judge, out of his district, at his discretion. If this is to be permitted, a judge may go into all the districts surrounding his, and confer power upon other judges to supply his place. If the design of the bill is to provide for the contingency to which the gentleman from Ohio refers, the bill ought to look to that particular object.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave of the gentleman from Missouri to make a suggestion, which ought to satisfy him that the bill contemplates no such result.

Mr. NOELL. I do not desire to be understood as saying that such was the intention of the framers of the bill, but that such would be the effect of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The bill provides that the appointee, thus selected by a district judge to hold his court, shall receive no compensation whatever for his services. What motive could judges have in that case, except to discharge faithfully their duty as judges, and promote the public interests?

Mr. NOELL. I think the principle of the bill is objectionable, and that the result will be bad.

Mr. HICKMAN. I suppose I shall hardly be heard to-day; but I will suggest a single reason for the passage of this bill, in addition to the reasons already given by my colleague upon the committee, [Mr. BINGHAM.] It is, that there are a number of bad laws very much in the way of the work and effect of which is now proposed by this bill. Judges occasionally find it absolutely necessary to make application for laws of this kind, applicable to their own particular districts. I think the House will see that there is a necessity for transferring such a power to the district judge, in this bill, upon judges of the United States in many cases. I think they will see that, inasmuch as occurrences of that kind, calling for that power, must necessarily arise, as they have before, it is a great saving to the public to have them by a general law, than to have applications made here extending that power in particular cases.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I would like to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether there is not now a provision by which, upon the recommendation of the Attorney General, a district judge may assign to another judge the power of holding courts in his district? It has long been a custom for the district judges of the State of Connecticut, and of the judges of the northern district of New York, to hold courts in the southern district of New York. It is a practice which has prevailed a long time in the city of New York, and I suppose, in some other courts also. If a provision for this purpose already exists, and it is now under the control of some proper authority, as that of the Attorney General, or the President of the United States, it seems to me that it is much better than to allow this change to be made any time upon the certificate of a district judge.

Mr. BLANCHI. There is no part of the legislation of this country that I would touch with more caution and delicacy than that relating to the removal of judges from office. The act of act has received scarcely any essential amendment since it was drawn up by Chief Justice Ellsworth, as long ago as 1796. Experience under it has proved the wisdom of the act; so much so, that when a case arises where the Legislature of the country has been unable to stand for five years without being pulled to pieces, in order to suit the whims of Congress, this act of Chief Justice Ellsworth has stood the test of time. I confess, sir, that I feel some reluctance to propose this bill without a little more consideration than we have an opportunity to give to it here.

I can well conceive, as stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that there may be cases where it is important to the public interests, and highly important to private parties, that one district judge should have the power of substituting another district judge in his place; but ought not the bill to provide that that substitution shall only be made in cases in which the district judge properly belonging to the district is unable to attend to the case by reason of sickness, absence, or some other disability?

I am not prepared to pass judgment on this bill. I have not time to do so. In my opinion of the Judiciary Committee about matters relating strictly to the judiciary; but I confess that, before this judiciary act is amended in a particular so essential, I would rather that there should be time for discussion and consideration. I think, therefore, that the bill had better be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may discuss and amend it, and hear it discussed by the members of the Judiciary Committee themselves, and make the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. HICKMAN. There is no disposition on the part of the Judiciary Committee to force the passage of this bill. They were unanimous in recommending its passage, believing that such law existed as that spoken of by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUMPHREY.] I am perfectly willing, however, that the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina shall prevail. The question now is on Mr. BRANCH's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS W. B. KEIM.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an adverse report on the memorial of the Hon. William H. Keim, in reference to his pay as a member of the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS C. WARE.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a joint resolution for the House to concur in, and to ask the House to put the same upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. BINGHAM. If it be the pleasure of the House, I will ask that the resolution be put upon its passage, and if agreed to, will give me for a moment, I think no member will feel obliged to make any objection to its passage. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read. It directs the payment to Thomas C. Ware, of Cincinnati, Ohio, of the sum of $1,500, in full for services rendered by him to the Government of the United States, at the request of the United States district attorney of Ohio, in the case of the United States ex. Lyman Cole et al., indicted and tried in the United States court of Ohio, in the October term of 1853.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to say that the resolution is reported unanimously by the committee; and I ask that it may now, by general consent, be passed. It is a joint resolution, and it is for the payment of a suspended fee earned six years ago, and which was not paid, for the simple reason that the district attorney of the United States, who employed additional counsel under the existing law, neglected to notify the Secretary of the Interior in pursuance of the requirements of the statute, of his employment, and of the amount stipulated to be paid. Under the existing law, he could not pay it.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROHIBITION OF POLYGAMY.

Mr. NELSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disqualify any person who is guilty of the same from being a member of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah. I am instructed by the committee to ask that the bill be put upon its passage, and to ask the previous question upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to hear that bill read. The Clerk read the bill. It provides for the punishment of the crime of polygamy in the Territories of the United States, or other places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, by a fine not exceeding $500 and imprisonment not less than two nor more than five years, and also annuls certain acts of the Legislature of Utah countenancing the practice of polygamy.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is an important bill, and I ask that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary may be read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought I was entitled to the floor. I asked for the reading of the bill. I am willing, however, that the report shall be read. The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, in part, by the Clerk. Mr. HOUSTON. That report seems to be a pretty long one, and I do not think it is necessary that it should be read at length. I desire to move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the House sees no objection to it, of course the report will be printed with the bill, and its members can read it for themselves, without taking up the time of the House with its reading now. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to send the bill to the Committee. I think it is too important a bill to be thrown through without the consideration that we shall be likely to give it here. I did not know that this bill was to be reported from the Committee on the Judiciary this morning. I was not present when it was acted on by the committee, but I was surprised to see the bill make its appearance in the House this morning. I hope it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of order. I understand that my colleague [Mr. NELSON] has the floor upon this bill.

Mr. NELSON. If I understand the rules of the House, I am entitled to the floor upon this bill, having reported it to the House. If I am, I now, as I have been directed to do by the Committee on the Judiciary, move to put the bill on its passage, and call for its reading.

Mr. MAYNARD. My point of order is, not only that my colleague is entitled to the floor, but that, the reading of the report having been commenced, it was in violation of the rules to interrupt the reading before it had been concluded. It is an important bill; and desiring to understand its provisions thoroughly, I asked that the report should be read; but, before the reading was concluded, the gentleman from Alabama, in violation of the rules of order, interposed, and made a motion which I think it was not in order for him to make, my colleague being entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state what are the facts in connection with this matter. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NELSON] reported this bill. I took him aside, and desiring to understand about to put the question on the third reading of the bill, no one claiming the floor, I addressed the Chair and was recognized, and leaving the floor, I had the right to make the motion which I did.

Mr. STANTON. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I saw the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NELSON] upon his legs, ready to take the floor when the reading of the report should have been completed.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NELSON] did not call for the reading of the report; but, on the contrary, the Chair was putting the question on the third reading of the bill, when I called for the reading of the bill myself. I took the floor, and the Chair recognized me, no one else claiming it, and I was entitled to the floor and had a perfect right to make the motion which I did.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. I submit that, after the reading of a paper has commenced, it is not in order to interrupt the reading, unless it be for a motion to dispense with the further reading. I think the gentleman from Alabama, therefore, was not entitled to the floor to make his motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had the right to make the motion, for I had the floor upon the bill, to make any motion which could properly be made in reference to it.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman could not obtain the floor for that purpose while the report was being read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state how the matter stands. I obtained the floor before the bill had been read. When the Chair was about to put the question upon the third reading, I called for the report to be read, and, as it had been read, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] having called for the reading of the report, that there might be no mistake as to my right to the floor, I stated that I was entitled to the floor, having called for the bill; but that I would allow the report to be read, if I still retained the floor. The Chair having recognized me as entitled to the floor, I moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as I had the right to do.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have submitted a point of order, which I ask the Chair to decide. No debate is in order upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that, according to the uniform practice of the House, as understood by him, the member reporting a bill has the right to open and close the debate upon the subject. If the gentleman from Tennessee, who reported this bill, claims the floor, he is entitled to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee did not claim the floor, and, not having closed it at that time, he certainly has not the right to take it from me after I have occupied it, and made the motion to refer the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to claim the floor?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee cannot claim the floor now. He did not claim it when he was entitled to it, and it is too late now for him to claim it.

Mr. NELSON. I will state what occurred. At the time the bill was presented to the House, I stated that I had been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, which, in accordance with the instructions of that committee, I moved to put on its passage, and called the previous question. That was what I stated; and, if I am entitled to the floor, I now move to put the bill on its passage, and call for the previous question, as I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee, then, as I understand, calls for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He does.

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. No debate is in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not going to debate. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point, without debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir; I will state it without debate. The point I present to the Chair is, that admitting the statement of the gentleman to be correct—and I am not disposed to controvert here, when he states that the gentleman instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill, and call the previous question on its passage, he could not then call the previous question; because the bill was not before the House until it had been stated by the Chair. After the bill had been stated, the gentleman did not claim the floor to call the previous question; and the Chair agrees with me that his former call was not recognized, because, when I rose and obtained the floor, the Chair was putting the question upon the third reading of the bill, and not upon seconding the demand for the previous question. And when I rose and proposed to submit some considerations to the House upon the bill, the gentleman from Tennessee did not then claim the floor. These are the facts; and the Chair certainly agreed with me, that the previous question was not pending when I obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Tennessee did call for the previous question on the bill. He was entitled to the floor for that purpose; and if the Chair did not hear the call, that does not deprive the gentleman of his rights under the rule. If the gentleman from Tennessee claims the floor, he is entitled to it.

Mr. NELSON. I claim the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman cannot take the floor from me. If the gentleman and the Chair so manage that the question is being put upon the bill, and its open to amendment, debate, and I get the floor, and propose to debate or to amend it, I would like to know by what process I can be deprived of the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Tennessee could not lose the floor and his right to occupy it, because the Chair did not happen to hear him. The Chair holds that he is now entitled to his position here, under the rules, as the reporter of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee did not call for the bill to be read, and the Chair was putting the question on ordering the bill to a third reading when I took the floor. He did not claim the floor when I took it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Then I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. It would have been the previous question for the Speaker to have called for the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask my colleague to withdraw his demand for the previous question until the House can hear the entire report of the committee read. I am anxious to hear it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the bill be laid upon the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GROW. The House is dividing, and that motion is not now in order.

The SPEAKER. The motion has been repeatedly ruled to be in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am appealed to by friends around me to withdraw the motion that the bill be laid upon the table; and I do so in deference to their judgment, and not my own.

Mr. W. WHITELEY. I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee to withdraw his demand for the previous question. This bill relates entirely to the Territory of Utah, and I understand the Delegate of that Territory is absent. I think that the bill ought not to be acted on until he is present, and can be heard in reference to its passage.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. He is here.

Mr. WHITELEY. They let him be heard.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. NELSON. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; and, that motion being entered, I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to recommit keeps the bill before the House, and, as it will come up in the morning hour to-morrow, I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. GROW. I ask, first, that the bill reported by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. NELSON] with the accompanying report, be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered, if there is no objection.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARKET-HOUSE FOR WASHINGTON.

Mr. KILGORE. Before the question is taken on the motion that the House proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that I should be permitted to make a report from the Committee for the District of Columbia, which I would have made this morning if I had been present when that committee was called.

There was no objection.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate bill No. 192, authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $200,000 for building a market-house, with an amendment.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Let the bill and amendment be read.

The bill was read in extenso. It authorizes the corporation of Washington to contract for a loan and issue stock to the extent of $200,000, on the faith of the corporation, for the sole purpose of paying for the erection of a market-house on the site of the present building; and stock to bear interest at not more than six per centum per annum, and to be redeemed at the pleasure of the corporation, within the space of fifteen years from the date of the issue thereof, the interest to be paid quarterly; provided that the entire revenue of said building shall, after payment of contingent expenses and interest on the stock, be appropriated to the payment of the stock issued, in accordance with the provisions of this act; and it provides further that no more than $250,000 shall be expended in building said market-house, nor shall any contracts be entered into which involve a larger expenditure for the completion of the same.

Mr. KILGORE. Let the amendment of the Committee for the District of Columbia be read. I will ask that it be adopted, and that the bill shall be put on its passage.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof, insert:

That all the grounds lying between Seventh and Ninth streets, and fronting on Pennsylvania and Louisiana avenues, now and heretofore used and occupied for the Crier market, be, and the same are hereby, ceded to the corporation of Washington, on condition that said corporation, within two years after the date of the passage of this act, build a market-house, together with such offices and apartments in the second story thereof as may be deemed necessary, to be used by the corporation for the purpose of receiving passengers through only one entrance to the market on the north side, market wagons and other vehicles on the south side only, with means of exit and entrance on both the north and south streets, and to exclude marketing from Pennsylvania and Louisiana avenues, and the sidewalks and pavements thereon. And for the purpose of carrying out such market-house and improvements connected therewith, in case a majority of the freeholders and householders, who are legal and competent voters, within said corporation shall vote as hereinafter provided in favor thereof, it shall be lawful for said corporation to create a debt in such form as may be found expedient, not exceeding the sum of $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, and such restriction in the exercise of such power as to raising loans to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That at the first annual election held in said city of Washington, the Mayor, the person or board receiving the vote of each voter shall election who is a freeholder or householder of said city, shall proposing in each voter ballot the question in this: "Are you in favor of creating a debt of $200,000 for the building of a new market-house, together with such offices and apartments, whether yes or no, shall be set down upon the poll-list opposite the name of each voter; and, in case a majority of such freeholders and householders, who are legal and competent voters, within said corporation shall vote in the affirmative, then this act shall take effect and continue in full force, but not otherwise.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Mayor of said city shall cause notice to be given of the taking of said poll, by publication in three or more of the newspapers published in said city, at least ten days before the day of holding said election, which notice shall distinctly state the question to be propounded, and shall be given to the freeholders and householders of said city.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in case this act shall take effect as hereinafter provided, it shall be so construed as to treat the title in said laws in said corporation so long as the market-house and apartments shall be continued thereon and used for the purposes aforesaid, and no longer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KILGORE moved to reconsider the bill by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the House proceeded to consider the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business was Senate resolution No. 19, being "A resolution suspending the fifth section of the act making appropriations to defray the deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department, for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and in support of the Post Office Department for the year ending the 30th of June, 1860," being the action relating to printing.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER announced the next business to be House bill No. 228, relating to the printing and distribution of the annual message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents.

The question was upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and move that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed. Mr. SHERMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled Senate bill No. 239, for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Pearson, deceased; when the Speaker signed the same.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. JENKINS. I took occasion, some days since, to cast enquire upon the telegraphic agent of the Associated Press, for a statement that appeared in the papers in relation to certain doctrines which were ascribed to me. I wish to say now, that, from the papers I have since seen, I am satisfied that the fault was not upon the part of the telegraphic agent, but was the result of a typographical error.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to take up the diplomatic and consular bill. And before that motion is put I desire to submit the usual motion that, within ten minutes after the committee shall proceed to the consideration of the consular bill, all general debate shall cease; and also, the same motion with regard to the Indian bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Would it not be better to close all debate? I believe we have had opportunity to debate anything that has been passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion I have made does not cut off the five minutes' debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Everything that has passed in the House is brought up and discussed under the whip and spur of the previous question. It seems to be favored not only by the House, Mr. Speaker, but I think by yourself. As fast as the previous question was moved, I noticed that it was announced as having been seconded. It was moved yesterday, when the House members voted for it. And would it not be better to cut off all debate, and render all our rules nugatory in that respect? We passed a bill before yesterday involving millions' worth of public lands, and yet, not without one motion to amend, or even to offer a single amendment to the bill. And it does seem that, neither in the House nor in the Committee of the Whole, are we to be allowed to debate any important measures presented for our legislation.

The proposition now is to close debate in the Committee of the Whole in ten minutes upon these important bills. There is one provision in one of these bills that I wanted to say something about myself. It is that provision in the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill which proposes to appropriate $40,000 to execute the laws for the suppression of the African slave trade. I want to say to the House and to the country, that I am not at all disposed to be met in executing the laws. Attempts have been made, that law, $40,000 is wholly inadequate to do it. It is the law of the land; it has been pronounced to be a constitutional law by the judicial tribunals of the country; and without expressing any opinion as to the propriety of that law, as it stands upon its merits, I am willing to place a sufficient amount of money at the disposition of the President to execute that law. I know something about the expense and the cost to be met in executing the law. Attempts have been made to violate that law in the State of Georgia; similar attempts have been made, without a doubt, in other States of the Union.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman's speech is not in order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will get through in a very few minutes. If it is the intention of this House to enforce the laws of this land, the President of the United States is entitled to have a sufficient amount from the Treasury to enable him to enforce them.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order upon the question before the House.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. Sumner, and the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that debate be closed upon the consular and the Indian bills in ten minutes after the same shall have been taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHINGTON, of Illinois, in the chair.)

CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; upon which Mr. McRAE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman from Mississippi yielded the floor to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from South Carolina that he understood the floor to be yielded to him for the purpose of raising a point of order.

Mr. BOCCOCK. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the President's annual message was under consideration before the committee when it last rose, and that it is therefore first in order now. I wish to know how it is got rid of? Yesterday, by unanimous consent of the committee, the President's message was laid aside, and other bills taken up for consideration for half an hour.

They were considered for half an hour, and then, by virtue of an agreement, they passed from the committee. Yesterday, the President's message came up again for consideration, and was under consideration when the committee rose. Now, upon that question the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. CHASE) had the floor. Nobody could get the floor without his consent to give it to the President's message. How, then, was the message got rid of?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ruled that the motion to close debate being carried, it made the bill a special order.

Mr. BOCCOCK. That cannot be. The order to close debate was made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the usual form, and that is, that the debate upon this particular bill be closed in ten minutes after the President's message came up again for consideration, and not in ten minutes after the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now you cannot, by virtue of such a resolution, get rid of the President's message in order to take up another bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the determination of the House to close debate upon this bill is in the nature of a special order. The Chair decides that the debate be limited to ten minutes, and the bill will soon be disposed of. The gentleman from South Carolina rises to a point of order, and he will send up his amendment to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. MILES. I propose to add the following to the end of the last clause in the bill:

And that the Secretary of State be directed to pay out of any unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 made by the Act of March 3, 1857, in the consular and diplomatic act, passed at the last session of Congress, the amount claimed as compensation for his services as such Secretary of State, by the United States marshal for the district of South Carolina; provided, That, in the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, the said marshal is entitled to receive the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise a point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was raised yesterday, and the Chair decided the amendment out of order, upon the ground that it was infringing legislation of a private nature upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MILES. From that decision of the Chair I take an appeal; and I presume I am entitled to argue in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to ten minutes, if the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. McRAE) gives way to him.

Mr. McRAE. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MILES. I contend that my amendment is strictly in order. It certainly is as much in order as the last section of the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. That last section made an appropriation for the purpose of precisely similar to that for which the appropriation of $75,000 was made in a bill at the last session of Congress. That $75,000 was to pay the expenses in the case of the Echo Affair. The claim against the Government was certain, upon the face of it, one of those expenses. The claim has been the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means for the courtesy which he has shown me. They are now due.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

NEW SERIES.....No. 73

Treasury what it is intended for. I have put myself to the trouble this morning—though I have Provided, No part of said $40,000 shall be applied towards the education and maintenance of the Echo Africans in Liberty: And provided further, That the same amount be placed at the disposal of the President for the faithful execution of the act of Congress in reference to the rendition of fugitive slaves.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I rise, sir, not for the purpose of discussing the propriety or the propriety of this law in reference to the suppression of the slave trade. I wish to be distinctly understood, that whether this law be right or wrong, I am in favor of its faithful enforcement so long as it remains of the statute-book. And if this $40,000 shall be actually needed for this purpose, and called for by the President, it ought to be given. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, however, is so indefinite in his statements and estimates upon this appropriation is asked, I confess I have some doubts as to the propriety of this legislation. My mind is inclined against this prospective legislation, taking it for granted that there will be violations of the law. It strikes me it will be fine enough to make this appropriation when we find it shall be actually needed. We have just as much right to presume there will be violations of the fugitive slave law, and ask for $40,000 to carry this law into effect. And for this reason, I offer this amendment, providing that no part of this money shall be used for the education and maintenance of the Echo Africans in Liberia, and the same amount called for to execute this law for the suppression of the slave trade, shall also be placed at the disposal of the Executive to enforce the fugitive slave law. The enforcement of the one is as necessary as the other, and I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not understand that this Government provides for the educating these Africans, and therefore there is no necessity for the passage of the amendment.

Mr. BONHAM. I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether such is the fact?

Mr. JONES. The word education, I believe, is used in the message which the President sent to this House on this subject.

Mr. REAGAN. The President may have, in his message, recommended that these Africans should be educated at the expense of the Government; but there is no provision of law, that I have ever heard of, for their education.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to state this fact: under the eighth article of the Ashburton treaty, a squadron was placed on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave trade, which is now maintained there at an expense of nearly a million dollars per annum, certainly at a cost of $800,000, which, I think, is the amount stated in the last report of the State Department upon the subject.

Yet now, sir, without any reason being assigned for it, we are asked to appropriate $40,000 more to enforce the laws against the African slave trade. I admit that this slave trade has not been suppressed, and it will not be suppressed. It is still carried on, and it will continue to be carried on until a check can be put upon Yankee avarice and Yankee cupidity, for it is their ships which are engaged in carrying it on. So far as I know, but in a single instance has a southern vessel been detected in that trade. It is carried on by vessels from northern ports and manned by northerners. This is a fact which I desire to state in addition to the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. REAGAN. I make the question of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill. It has no reference to the subject of it, and it is an unnecessary obstruction upon the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the question of order raised by the gentleman from Texas comes too late.

The amendment was then agreed to.
Mr. MAYNARD. I now renew the amendment offered by me yesterday, which was withdrawn temporarily at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MILES], for the purpose of allowing him to introduce a matter which has been disposed of. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That the sum of $520,000 be appropriated for running and marking the lines between the United States and British possessions bounding Washington Territory, shall be so expended as to be for the work.

The amendment was adopted.
Mr. SHERMAN. I move to lay aside the bill, to be reported to the House.

Mr. MILES. I desire to offer a modification of my amendment, which has been decided to be out of order. I understand that there were some particular words left out of the other amendment, which induced some gentlemen to vote in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair. This proposed application is in accordance with existing law, and I am certain that it is in order.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. There is no amendment pending upon which any remarks can be predicated.

Mr. MILES. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. GROW. What I want is, that the gentleman shall offer his amendment in advance, so that we may understand upon what his remarks are predicated.

Mr. MILES. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill as follows:

And that the Secretary of State be directed to pay, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, of $50,000 made for expenses in the case of the Echo Africans, in the consular and diplomatic act passed at the last session of Congress, the amount claimed as compensation for his services in said case, by the United States marshal for the district of South Carolina: Provided, That, in the opinion of the Secretary of the United States, the said claim is entitled to receive the same, and that the expenditure thereof is authorized by any existing law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order for two reasons. It is in order in one respect, for it is substantially a private bill, and because it is independent legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, upon the same grounds on which he decided the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, offered yesterday, which was substantially the same, out of order: on the ground that it is not in order to incorporate a private claim in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MILES. I dislike to appeal from the decision of the Chair, especially when so large a majority of the House, a short time ago, voted to sustain his decision; but, sir, I consider that the modification which I have made brings the amendment into order within the rules of the House. I do not consider it as new legislation at all; nor do I consider it as a private claim. We last year appropriated a certain sum of money for certain purposes.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. The question is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hearing the gentleman from South Carolina by the indulgence of the committee. The Chair is desirous of being enlightened upon the question of order, if the committee will indulge the gentleman.

Mr. MILES. If gentlemen will not listen to me, I simply submit the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McRAE. I wish to put a question to the Chair. As the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means cannot state a single item of those going to make up this $40,000, I would like to know whether, if it so happens that this claim which is presented by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] is a part of that $40,000, the last section of the bill is then in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not undertake to rule upon the last section of the bill. The question now is upon the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. McRAE. Then the Chair declines to decide whether the last section is in order, if this claim is included in that $40,000 provision?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina. From that decision the gentleman has taken an appeal.

Mr. McRAE. Then the Chair declines to give a decision on this point? I am not sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to give an opinion on that subject at this time.

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BONHAM. Mr. Chairman, is it now in order to move to strike out the last section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. BONHAM. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. A new clause has been added to the paragraph which the gentleman from South Carolina moves to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, an amendment has been adopted, on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD], limiting the appropriation for the Washington Territory boundary survey.

Mr. BONHAM. My motion is to strike out the paragraph as it stood before that amendment was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Have we not passed from that second section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, but that the last section of the bill is now before the committee.

Mr. BONHAM. I do not propose to interfere with the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. I move to strike out these words:

"To enable the President of the United States to carry into effect the act of Congress of 34 March, 1819, and any subsequent acts now in force for the suppression of the slave trade, $40,000."

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the committee have passed from this part of the bill; that, as a new section has been added to the bill, it is now too late to go back and move to strike out the words indicated by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Such a motion, under the circumstances, is utterly unprecedented.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the motion of the gentleman from Maine. The last section of the bill is before the committee for amendment. We have not passed from that section. If we had, then there would be nothing before the committee. So long as any member proposes to offer an amendment, that part of the bill is before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment is germane, and therefore overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BONHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand the memorandum furnished the Clerk by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. My object is to inform the House that, in 1846, and I found no estimates, except for the last year, for the purpose now contemplated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a point of order. The second section has been passed. Independent legislation in reference to the north-western Territory is now before the House. That could not have been received or acted upon until we had passed from the second section. Having passed from the second section and having adopted this new and independent legislation, which, I grant, was not in order, and could not have been received if it had been objected to, this amendment, I hold, is not now in order, not being germane to what is before the committee; to wit, the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine reaches his point of order upon the ground that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] having been adopted, it becomes a part of the last section now before the committee, and that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina is not germane to that amendment.

Mr. BRANCH. I motion to strike out would not be in order pending a motion to amend.

Mr. BONHAM. I have only five minutes, and I hope that I will not be further interrupted. I am sorry, sir, to see the gentleman on the other side so sensitive on this subject. The first appropriation was for $50,000, passed to carry the law of 1819 into execution. That was rendered necessary because immediately after the passage of that act, certain slaves had been captured by the United States authorities. The subsequent appropriations have been much smaller. They were not more than $5,000, in 1856. Of late years they have not been more in any year than $10,000. The appropriation for 1842 was $10,000, and then appropriations ceased for fourteen years. What necessity exists now for this appropriation which did not exist during those fourteen years? Why are we asked to appropriate $40,000 at this time, when no reason for it is given? I trust that this House does not mean to squander the public money without knowing to what purpose it is to be devoted.

It is said, sir, that this appropriation is necessary to execute the law of 1819. Let that law be executed; but what I want to know is, why is it necessary to appropriate $40,000 to the law to carry that law into effect? That law, as I understand, provides for its own execution. It authorizes payment to the officers and crew, as well as to the informers. We are not informed by the members of the Committee of Ways and Means whether one dollar of this amount is needed, nor are we informed how it is needed. I hope, then, that my motion to strike out will be adopted by the committee.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that there is an undoubted necessity for this appropriation of $40,000 may be a very needful one; and if, so, then no injury is done in passing it; and it may be very unnecessary one; and if so, not a dollar will be squandered, for the money will remain unexpended; and after the expiration of a few years it will revert to the Treasury.

The plain object of the appropriation is this: by the act of 1819, certain duties are imposed upon the President. It is made his duty to return to the coast of Africa any castaways who may be taken from slave vessels. If these negroes should be captured and brought to the United States by the ships of war, as they must be, the President is required to return them to the coast of Africa. He ought to have some fund at his command out of which to meet the expenses thus incurred. A want of appropriation was felt last year, when the President was obliged to make a contract with the Colonization Society, dependent upon a future appropriation by Congress. If you require this to be uniform, you must put it in the power of the President to discharge it. Sir, there is also a Department of the Government for whose convenience contingent appropriations are not made.

We have to appropriate contingent sums for the Treasury Department, for the State Department, for the War Department; and out of the contingent appropriations such expenses are defrayed. This is appropriately one of the contingent appropriations for the executive department, or the department of the President. If vessels are captured with slaves on board, the President will need the money; and he ought to have it, to enable him to perform the duty imposed upon him by Congress. If no captures are made, the money will remain in the Treasury; there is no expenditure, no squandering of the public money at all. We should at all times provide the President with the means of executing the solemn duties devolved upon him by act of Congress.

Mr. BONHAM. I would ask the gentleman why was not this amount appropriated from 1846 to 1859? I believe the gentleman was a member of this House then.

Mr. MILLSON. Because it was not asked for, I presume. And the mischievous consequence of not asking for it were felt last year; and it became the duty of the President to send a special message to Congress to obtain the appropriation, a special appropriation, to enable him to defray the expenses which, by the act of 1819, it became his duty to meet.

Mr. HILL. I move to strike out the appropriation of $40,000; and I do this to enable me to obtain some information from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I will ask him this question: does he know of any special service to which this fund is to be appropriated; or is it merely to be provided as a contingent fund for such cases as those now before us, in the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Millson]? If, for example, there should be a capture of negroes by any vessel of war of the United States, and those negroes were brought into an American port, do I understand that this fund is to remain in the Treasury for that purpose; or is it to be used for secret-service money by our naval officers, to enable them to interfere with the trade upon the coast of Africa or elsewhere?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a mere contingent fund, placed, by the law of 1819, at the service of the President to pay certain expenses defined by law growing out of the suppression of the slave trade. It may be that none of this money will be used; it may be that more will be needed.

Mr. HILL. I understand, then, that if there should be no capture made of slaves, there would be no expenditure of this appropriation. I will withdraw my amendment.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. Bonham; which was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN moved that the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the committee took up and proceeded to consider House bill No. 215, making a bill meeting appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1861.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It is known that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cress] has the floor for to-day. And I would suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he will allow this bill to be laid aside, and permit the President's message to be taken up, so as to allow the gentleman from Alabama to go on with his remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee of Ways and Means have instructed me to report but one amendment to this bill. The bill proposes merely to carry out existing laws. We can adopt the bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It will take an hour to read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reading of the bill can be dispensed with.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It would be necessary to read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask that the reading of the bill be dispensed with; and I will submit the only amendment I am instructed to offer.

Mr. BRANCH. That would be not to read the bill by paragraphs at all, and I cannot consent to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then let the bill be read, and at three o'clock, if we have not concluded its consideration, we can lay it aside.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the bill will be read the second time by sections, for amendment. The Clerk understands the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Seward] that this is a regular appropriation bill, and confined strictly to appropriations to carry out existing laws.

Mr. GROW. The bill can be read by clauses, and if no amendment is made, it can be disposed of in half an hour.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Very well; with the understanding that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cress] will have the floor at three o'clock, I will ask nothing more.

The reading of the bill was then proceeded with until the Clerk had reached the following clause: For presents to Indians, $5,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether this bill is made up of sums that are prescribed by acts of Congress, by what act of Congress this appropriation of $5,000 is recommended?

Mr. SHERMAN. Those are some items prescribed by treaty stipulations.

Mr. MAYNARD. What treaty stipulation calls for this appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. As to the tribes of Indians in California, we endeavor to treat them the same without treaties as we do other tribes with whom we have made treaties. The appropriations for the Indian service in California are made without treaties.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is the reason I wished to ask the gentleman the question whether this is for some general secret-service fund, to be used by the Secretary at his discretion; or whether it is to be bestowed upon some particular tribe of Indians.

The reading of the bill was proceeded with a few lines further, when

Mr. STOUT offered the following amendment, to come in after the twenty-first printed bill:

Provided, That, in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington, the superintendent shall be allowed a salary of $5,000 per annum; and each of the Indian agents in said State and Territory shall be allowed $3,000 per annum; and the several sub-Indian agents in the said State and Territory shall be allowed $1,500 per annum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to this amendment. It is not in order to offer such an amendment to that portion of the bill, as we have passed by that portion of it.

The amendment was ruled to be out of order. Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I move to amend the bill by inserting, after line fifty-three, the following:

For making treaties with the Indian tribes of Washington Territory, not included within existing treaty stipulations, $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the amendment. It is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules out the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to move to strike out a part of the bill making appropriations provided for by another bill. I move to strike out all from line eight hundred and sixty-one to line eleven hundred and sixty-seven.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I desire to say a word in reference to that amendment. The portion of the bill which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to strike out contains appropriations according to the regular estimates for the Indian department, and are required to carry out treaties. They are to pay the second installments of a treaty. If these appropriations are not made now, there will be a deficiency in the next year.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It is now three o'clock; and it was agreed that at this hour the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cress] should occupy the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the understanding of the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose the gentleman from Washington will be entitled to the floor when the committee resumes this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. He will be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to lay aside this bill, and resume the consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the President's message, the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, none of the opinions I shall utter will probably meet the approbation of a majority in this House, but I shall seek to challenge confidence, if not concurrence, by the manner in which I shall avow and discuss them. Much of what I shall say will not be new to those who have studied the question, but it has been said, with much truth, that it is necessary for each generation to discuss anew the great problems of human speculation, which continually come back, after certain intervals, for re-examination.

Scarcely a speech has been made or an essay written, for ten years, against slavery, in which the opinions of the early fathers of the Republic are not introduced. These, however, were but mere speculations, and were not ingrafted upon the organic law; and actual results are a safer standard by which to measure abstract principles. Besides, times have elapsed since this Government was first inaugurated as an experiment, not yet satisfactorily tested. Then there were but little over half a million slaves, and scarce a pound of raw cotton exported. In 1784, a vessel containing eight bags of cotton was seized at the custom-house in Liverpool, on the conviction that so much cotton could not be the growth of America. In 1787, in the debate on slave representation, in the convention that framed the Constitution, Mr. Pinckney said:

"North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in their early and indigent, had a peculiar interest which might be sacrificed."

Cotton was not mentioned, for in that year there were but one hundred and eight bales shipped from the United States. Now there are near four million slaves, worth $3,500,000,000; and of southern products, there were exported last year $200,000,000, and those exports enter materially into the comforts, necessities, and luxuries of the world. Last year the cotton crop of the South was valued at two million two hundred and fifty thousand bales; $161,000,000 worth was exported. Bain, in his History of Cotton Manufacture, says:

"It is impossible to estimate the advantage to the bulk of the people from the wonderful cheapness of cotton goods."

And—

"The peasant's cottage may, at this day, with good management, have as unobtrusive furniture for beds, windows, and tables, as the house of a substantial tradesman fifty years since."

African slavery is now a great fact—a political, social, industrial, humanitarian fact. Its chief product is king, and freighted northern vessels, drives northern machinery, feeds northern laborers, and clothes the entire population. Northern no less than southern capital and labor are dependent in great degree on the slave. The poor who were wholly unanticipated by the good men who are so industriously paraded as clouds of witnesses against the institution.

Slavery has altered, and men's opinions have altered. It is now of tremendous significance and consequence. The interests associated with it and dependent upon it are too momentous for it to be treated as an idle thing—made the football of politicians and fanatics, and its existence and security imperiled by rash counsels and rash action. Involving and comprehending so much; being the source of wealth and power and greatness; contributing so abundantly to civilization and humanity, it is unreasonable that the South should demand its extension and protection, and exhibit sensitiveness at the threat to surround her "with cordon of free territory, of the most complete class, like a serpent in a ring of fire, to sting itself to death."

"The North has demanded expansion; and is now so urgent in getting rid of a superabundant population as to demand that the Government shall gratuitously provide free homes as an inducement to emigration. But for an outlet, subsistence would have pressed close on the heels of production, and there would have been that irrepressible conflict between capital and labor which excites so much apprehension among reflecting men, and of the destruction of the American Republic. England is now reaping the 'first fruits' in the strikes at Lynn, Natick, Marblehead, and other neighboring towns. To deny future expansion to the South, is either cold, ferocious, malevolent cruelty, or it is a significant concession that our system is not subject to the same evils which afflict or threaten the more populous North. The South needs expansion, now or hereafter. The right, the liberty, must not be gained or restricted. We legislate for the future. A decade, a century, may be wasted in an unproductive war. He is a poor statesman, and worse philanthropist, who will do nothing for posterity because posterity has done nothing for him. Keeping the slaves, increasing rapidly, within circumscribed limits, while the whites diminish by emigration, is the incoherent effect or purpose of the mercenary policy which denies to us expansion. The numerical ascendancy of the blacks, or the vast disproportion of the races, with the exhaustion of the productive capabilities of the soil, will render emancipation certain, or slavery unprofitable, or the destruction of the white race probable, or the establishment of another Jamaica but a question of time; where, according to a late English work (Tropiques), there are three hundred thousand blacks, seventy thousand colored people, and only fifteen thousand whites; and the African brood, through the parliamentary system of the electoral franchise, has the control of the Government.

This normal law of national being, this necessity of growth, must find development, if possible, in the limits of the Union. For years, the action of the General Government denied or qualified this essential right, and prohibited to the South that equality of condition, without which the Government could not and ought not to have been established. Mr. Webster, who was ostracized for not keeping pace with the precipitate trend of anti-slavery opinion, was right.

"We should take the first, last, and every occasion which offers, to oppose the extension of slavery."

And in 1848:

"I shall oppose all such extension, at all times and under all circumstances, even against the interests and against all limitations of great interests; against all combinations; against all compromises."

The Republican party, so powerful and well disciplined, harmonizes to-day solely in its advocacy of this one controlling, overmastering dogma.

All "territory," outside the limits of a sovereign State, "belonging to the United States," is in common property, and every citizen has equal rights in and to it. It was acquired by the Federal Government for the common benefit of the States united. It is held by the Government, acting as the agent of the people of the several States, for their common use. The universal conviction at the South is, that we have the right to emigrate unmolested, with our slaves, to any Territory belonging to the United States. Seward and the Republicans say, "No; Congress, and the positive legislation must exclude us." Prominent men in the North, some of whom act with a more healthy organization than the Republican, say, "No; the Territorial Legislature, may lawfully exclude us"—only a question about the mode of exclusion, which is to be accomplished by either process. "In one event, we are to be killed by the congressional garrote; in the other, by the more stealthy process of territorial poison. Bear with me, while to both I endeavor to apply the touchstone of logic.

The doctrine of congressional exclusion is tenderly and boldly expressed in the Republican platform, which declares that "the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government; and that, in the exercise of this power, it is the right and duty of Congress to prohibit slavery in the Territories. The powers of the Federal Government are expressed in the grants of the Constitution; and, to authorize the exercise of power, it is not barely necessary to show the absence of prohibition, but an affirmative grant, or a positive and proper implication from such affirmative grant. What clause warrants the inference of such supreme power? The unsuccessful search of the bird nest from Noah's ark typifies the effort to locate the exact clause which authorizes the exclusive claim of sovereignty. As Mr. Clay said of the constitutional power to incorporate a national bank, it is a vagrant power. Mr. Curtis, in his argument in the Dred Scott case, has been called upon by the opposing counsel to point out the precise clause on which he based his power of exclusion, and not to support an assertion of the power by citing the Constitution passim. 'Their call,' said Mr. Curtis, 'shall be answered. I give them notice that my argument will be confined to the third section of the fourth article.' And in his elaborate argument, as well as in his recent able and eloquent address before the Senate, Mr. Benton, in his review of the Dred Scott decision, scornfully repudiated the idea that that clause contained any such substantive power; and asserts that the Territories, as political entities, are never subject to the Constitution, and that the term "territory" occurring but once, and that as property, assimilates to other property—as land, in fact; and as a thing to be "disposed of—to be sold."

Most usually, however, the advocates of this position agree with Mr. Curtis and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONWELL], and base the assumption upon the power of Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." This claim was adopted by the Union in the constitution; and, says Judge Campbell, "was demanded by the exigencies of an exhausted Treasury, and a disordered finance, for relief by sales, and the preparation for sales, of the public lands. It was little regarded at that time as involving under the apparently innocent verbiage a supremacy in Congress over the territory nearly equal to that claimed by the British Parliament over the colonies; and that Congress, when it exercised jurisdiction over this public property, could launch out into the shoreless sea of discretion, destroying the rights and disabilities of inhabitants, and disfranchising whole communities of their property-rights. It is an assertion of the power to create and establish the social and political system of every new State; and hence the action of the Republican Legislature of Ohio, Vermont, Connecticut, &c., instructing their members of Congress to vote against the admission of new States into the Union, thus concurring in the recommendation of the Hartford convention, to surtail the slave power by preventing the admission of any more slave States."

In this view, "territory or other property" is the subject, the corpus of the grant. The power given is to make needful rules and regulations for the property of the United States. The most common analysis of the phraseology shows that "territory" is spoken of as one of the kinds of property. If it be a general, absolute, unlimited, sixteenth grant of territory, including the property, the other clause in the Constitution giving exclusive legislation over the seat of government and places purchased for forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings, was entirely superfluous. It was such a specific grant of what was, in more general and comprehensive phrase, elsewhere granted. In the case of the United States vs. Gratiot, as well as in the Dred Scott case, the judges say that "the term 'territory' is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word 'land.'"

If the construction placed on this clause be correct, and unlimited legislative power be conferred, and a substantive authority for civil government be conveyed, the conclusion seems irrevocable, that Congress can exclude slavery from every foot of the public domain, whether in Alabama or in Kansas, whether in the States or in the Territories. The power to "make rules and regulations" applies as well to "territory or other property" in the States as in the unblighted wilderness. From this source of legislative derivation, Congress has the power to dispose of the public domain, and this power operates in as well as out of the States. Towards the common territory, Congress cannot adopt any rule which is not common and uniform to every State, and has no rightful power to exclude property recognized by the constitution of the United States, or by the constitution and laws of any particular State.

The claim of sovereign power over the inhabitants of the soil, as derived from the power to dispose of the soil, or lands, or territory, is a renegeant and revival of one of the "essential facts and constitutive elements of the feudal system." That system blended sovereignty with property, and attributed to the proprietor of the soil, over the inhabitants, almost all the rights we call sovereignty, and such as are possessed by the Government. It asserted to the proprietor of the soil all the rights of the sovereign power; and the proprietor of the soil could enact laws, impose taxes, and render justice. Guizot, in his History of Civilization of France, says the feudal regime was considered by the mass of the population as an enemy to be fought, and a system every day nearer to its origin to its destruction, from its epoch of splendor, and at the period of its degradation and decay, the feudal system was never accepted by the people. The Republican doctrine, deduced from the proprietorship of the soil, from the position of real property, is in repugnance to all American ideas of personal rights and personal liberty—to the elemental necessity of the consent of a people to the existing Government—as feudalism was to France, when whoever struck a blow at it had popularly.

To this claim of sovereign power over the Territories, as derived from any source, I might, as against the Republicans, have conclusively referred the decision in the Dred Scott case, wherein the act of Congress prohibiting slavery in the Territory was solemnly adjudged to be unconstitutional. Besides the fact that the judiciary is not proper and essential. So satisfactory and grateful was it to the South, there is danger of forgetting one of the old State-rights landmarks. The Supreme Court is not to be regarded as the ultimate arbiter for the decision of all constitutional questions.

Besides the fact that the judiciary must take cognizance of technical cases—and there are many political questions that cannot be drawn within its authority—it should never be elevated above the sovereign parties to the Constitution, who, as sovereign and independent States, having formed the compact, have the unquestioned right to judge of its infraction. The judiciary, as well as the executive or legislature, may usurp dangerous powers, and is alike subject to the ultimate right of judgment by the parties to the Constitution. To use the language of Madison's report:

"However true it may be, that the judicial department has all opportunities to be furnished by the Constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government. In relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial, as well as the other departments have their origin, the judicial is not the proper arbiter. On any other point, the designation of judicial power would assume the authority designating it."

We accord to this decision a higher authority than that claimed for the ordinary current of judicial decisions, because the constitution, in this instance, was made the umpire of the question by express legislative enactment; and to its weight as a law-judication is superseded the authority of an ad-judicium by its opponents to be not unconstitutional.

The second mode by which exclusion from the common property is to be accomplished, or the right of the South to expansion, is to be or may be defeated, is through the alleged power of a Territorial Legislature. This theory is of recent birth, and is differently explained and limited—sometimes not without confusion of ideas and misapplication of terms; but its zealous advocates press it, under euphonious and popular names, as if it were some kind of medicine, with equally attractive nomenclature, it were the never-failing cathartic for all the ills that our body-politic is heir to. It is an erroneous opinion that this mode of exclusion is advocated solely by a fragment of the Democratic party in the North. Not an instance can be cited, since 1820, wherein the Republicans or Free Soilers, whatever may have been their paper theories, have failed to vote for every measure practically carrying it out. During the Kansas controversy, various amendments were proposed and adopted, the effect of which was to empower the Territorial Legislature to exclude slavery, or constraining the bill so as to recognize this power. I am informed that that party in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Oregon, incorporated this doctrine into their platforms, and conducted their political campaigns on that issue. Once a Territorial Legislature was regarded as the creature of Congress, limited in its powers of legislation, as having no sovereignty, and as being wholly subordinate to the creature power. Its action was revocable; and a single act of Congress could sweep it out of existence. Its power being derivative, it must conform to the law of its being; and neither by direction or inhibition could it transcend the powers of its Federal creator. Lastly, however, territory is only common property, if then, until it is organized into a territorial government; when, by some legesimism or hocus-pocus, it becomes a quasi or absolute sovereign, and is invested with the inalienable right of self-government. If, on any subject, the will of the Territory is not supreme, slavery is not the exception; for the great expounder of this new dogma asserts that a Territorial Legislature can lawfully exclude slavery, rather by not recognizing its right of introduction. This power is variously derived, from the alleged inherent power of self-government, existing in every distinct political community, and from the Kansas-Nebraska bill, as endorsed by the Cincinnati platform. To the first derivation, I have no answer to make beyond the statement that it is in entire consistency with the first great experiment of squatter sovereignty—the creation of the State of California, whose admission into the Union, under the circumstances, was the only unparalleled outlier ever perpetrated on the people pretending to be free. To the second source of power, I reply that, if found there, the South was most miserably duped in that famous measure for seceding agitation. We are aware that the purpose of the framers of that bill was to say in his contribution to Harper, that it was to remove any obstacle to the free exercise of popular sovereignty—it was supported at the South because of its repeal of the Missouri restriction, and because we thought we had secured a precedent against territorial unfriendly legislation, by the provision rendering all such legislation subject to the Constitution of the United States, and by the further provision giving an appeal to the courts of the United States, in all cases where property in slaves was involved. If we were mistaken, this power to exclude slavery by unfriendly legislation—this squatter sovereignty covered up under ambiguous language in the Kansas bill, after the rejection of the Missouri restriction, was a reduced imitation of the barbarity of the petty Celtic tyrant, who fed his prisoners on salted food till they called eagerly for drink, and then let down an empty cup into the dungeon, and left them to die of thirst.

A territorial government is the creature of Congress; is provisional and temporary; and it is idle to pretend that it can usurp authority not conferred in the act of organization, and exercise power beyond the constitutional competency of Congress. Any argument drawn from the supposed analogy between such government and the American colonies is imperfect and illusory, as most analogous reasoning is. According to the British theory, Parliament is omnipotent; and no American citizen has ever claimed over the Territories what has been claimed over the colonies—the power to bind in all cases whatsoever. The dependencies are essentially different, and are held by a different tenure. The British Government regards its colonial condition as permanent and unchangeable. Canada was a colony one hundred years ago. She is a colony now. Territorial governments are temporary and permissive public corporations; and the Federal Government leaves them to manage their local affairs, in the full control of their domestic policy, save as restrained by the limitations of the Constitution and the purpose of equal enjoyment, for which Congress, as the trustee of the common and joint property, holds and exercises its trusteeship. The colonies relied upon the charters received from the Crown as the guarantees of their freedom from oppressive interference by the mother country; and also upon revolution—the power to make good their claim to liberty by the bloody arbitrament of the sword. Our colonies are not colonies, and are not colonies outside the limits of the States; held in pupillage and training, until prepared to take rank and position with sister confederate sovereignties. If organized Territories possess inherent rights of self-government, and exercise during its progress, fix and determine absolutely its social institutions, decide what shall and what shall not be property, and by unfriendly legislation to exclude slavery; it is superior, in some respects, to a State organization; and its tyrannical power has been introduced by the government from Illinois (Mr. Lincoln, ibid.), providing for the election of all officers by the inhabitants of a Territory. We should forthwith abdicate our ill-bred power, and carry out the logic of our consequences this doctrine of squatter sovereignty. Our laws appointing judges, and judges, our defrayment of the expenses of the government, and our claim of authority to repeal the organic act, and transfer the inhabitants to a different jurisdiction, are unauthorized and inconsistent assumptions of control and superiority.

If a Territorial Legislature be sovereign; if it can exercise legislative supremacy while it does not violate the Federal Constitution even, if its authority is not limited to the extent of a mere solicitor, it is more sovereign than a State government, and the difficulty presented in the case of Utah is remediless; for obviously it is contrary to this majestic theory of popular sovereignty to repeal the organic act of the Territory, so long as nothing is done in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. In addition to the Federal Constitution, States are restrained by fundamental laws of their own imposing. Judicial, executive, and legislative powers are distinctly mapped out, and their limits strictly defined; but under this modern political discovery, a majority in a Territory is absolute, save, as hindered by the prohibitions of the Federal compact, the Government may become despotic and unbridled, and outrages may be committed revolting to decency, shocking to the moral sense, and subversive of personal and proprietary rights. A political theory involving such consequences is an instructive lesson against departing from established landmarks.

Every southern State has repudiated this doctrine of squatter sovereignty, and pronounced it a wrong, destructive of their rights and equality. Last summer it was announced and heralded by telegraph, that a distinguished and able President would not accept from the Charleston convention a nomination if tendered to him, if that convention should declare that slavery existed, by virtue of the Constitution, in the Territories. The power of the Convention to so exclude it. Whether conditions so defiantly prescribed will be accepted, remains to be seen. Certainly the nomination of such a man would be an endorsement of his doctrines, and a constructive platform, according to the views that he carried into the practical administration of the Government; would be dishonoring to the South; demoralizing to the party succumbing to a menace, and a practical negation of the right of southern citizens to emigrate to the common territory with that form of labor to which they have been accustomed. If it should be so, it would be sincere in their declarations of hostility to squatter sovereignty, or the claim set up of the power of the Territorial Legislature to exclude slavery; they will insist upon a clear, distinct, and unequivocal repudiation of the heresy. It should be done in unambiguous terms, not susceptible of a double construction. We want no Villafraña treaties to be discussed in tedious Zerrich conferences; but a manly and honest assertion of principle. However, Ohio, Texas, and Alabama has spoken. For twelve years nearly every political convention of all parties, held in the State, has condemned this doctrine of popular sovereignty, as applied to Territories. Between its advocates and her, there is great good faith, which the mechanical genius and inventive facilities of a presidential convention cannot brood over.

The true principle is, that if a master can go into the Territories or upon territory, his slave can accompany him; and neither Congress nor a Territorial Legislature can divest him of the title to his property. Just as soon as territory is acquired slave property is legal and constitutional, and no power can invalidate until a sovereignty interposes. The Constitution, as it regards and sustains, extends over the acquisition; and in the language of Chief Justice Taney, in the Dred Scott case, "the right of property in a slave is distinct and expressly affirmed in the Constitution." The condition of a negro is not changed by his entrance into a Territory. There is no law, constitutional, international, or local, which will make him a slave or a freeman. If he was a slave at the time of entering, he remains such; free, his condition is not changed. Freedom adheres to him on the territory belonging to the United States. There can be no law in a Territory excluding slavery, as there is no power having jurisdiction competent to emancipate or alter the condition of a slave. If a negro was a slave in a State, his servitude continues in a Territory.

Slavery is not unknown, as asserted in the Harper Magazine article, "the creature of local legislation, or of local custom, or of local usage." That it must be established and supported solely by positive municipal law, is a gross error, sustained chiefly by judicial dicta, which were irrelevant to a decision on the particular facts of the cases discussed. It is not necessary that our statute-books authorizing the introduction of slavery; and if positive precept is essential to the valid existence of slavery, the tenure by which our slaves are held is illegal and uncertain. A citizen of southern State, or a slaveholding country like Brazil or Cuba, can carry with impunity his slave into any country where, "by the law thereof," slavery is not prohibited. The passage of a master with his slave through the territory of non-slaveholders, and the consequent increase of the condition of the slave, unless there is a legislative enactment to that effect; and the law of nations protects the master in transitu, enforces the law of the domicile, if that protection does not contravene public policy and the common interests of the community. It is a well-settled legal principle that a person born into slavery in a foreign State, would not be liberated by the accident of intermigration into another country, where there was no law opposed to the existence of slavery; and our Government is no exception in this relation; any interference with the rights of the master, without valid cause, by the authorities of another State, is a violation of that law. (See Judge Campbell's opinion in the case of Dred Scott vs. Sandford.) If there is a State prohibiting slavery in a foreign State, I can take my slave there, and have him protected. Mr. Webster, in his correspondence in the Croire case, contended that property in slaves did not cease extra-territorially, and our Government, on several instances, has maintained the same doctrine.

It has been frequently stated in Congress that slavery was not introduced into a single British colony by authority of law, and that there is not a statute in any one of the colonies authorizing African slavery, or "constituting the original basis and foundation of title to slave property." Mr. BENJAMIN, in a very masterly speech in the Sentributions. Protection is the price paid by Government for the support of its citizens, and I can conceive of no disgrace more heavy, no degradation more bitter, than the denial of this right of protection, with a simultaneous claim for maintenance against the slaveholder.

It may be said that there are judicial questions and mere abstractions, which can be safely left to the future, to be determined as exigencies may arise. In a late memorable case, appeals have been made from the Supreme Court to popular prejudice and passion, and interpretations of the decision form parts of political platforms. History is full of instances of judicial subservience, and political opinions of every control judicial conduct. The famous Somerset case, the direful spring of unnumbered woes, was decided under circumstances that reflect no credit on the moral courage of the eminent judge. The proposition of Senator SEWARD, to put the Supreme Court on the side of freedom, is fearfully admonitory of the influence of popular excitement on the judiciary. If I could lift my voice so as to be heard, I should feel bound to denounce the loyal men, in tones of earnest rebuke, who would breach her not again to commit the fatal mistake of yielding to party necessity what may be essential to future safety; not to concede a principle, which, however apparently abstract or impracticable, is in the same hour and hour, and hour, prove a potent engine of mischief or destruction.

[The hour expired at this point, but, by unanimous consent, Mr. CORY was allowed to proceed.]

As said Pitt, on the East India bill:

"It would be folly in the extreme, that the principle once it would operate only on the present occasion. Good principles might sleep; but had ones never. It is the curse of society that, when a bad principle is once established, but only will always be found to give it full effect. Mr. Chairman, for what is the Democratic party contending? Is it for spoils and patronage, or for principle? Is this immense array of means, this combination of agencies, this drilling for the strife, but to win a victory, barren and fruitless and pyrrhic? Are we to struggle for a President, whose disposal depends on patronage and feed a greedy swarm of leeches? This is of no avail, is mischievous, unless accompanied by practical results, by a triumph of principle. The election of a President, however pure and patriotic, will be as despotic as Despotism itself, unless accompanied by a corresponding change of public sentiment. Sir, there is no strength in numbers, in a mere aggregation of men. A party must be animated by a common faith; be vitalized by principle; must embody imperishable truth; and its principles must not be mere exceptional maxima, politic and convenient forms, applicable only to temporary exigencies, and to be laid aside as a snake sloughs off its skin.

I have finished, Mr. Chairman, what I have to say on these questions, endeavoring to compress into a few words what formerly I elaborated and have required several; but I cannot close without repelling an accusation which has been made on this floor, and at Chicago and elsewhere, that the President and the Democratic party, in favoring the admission of Kansas, with the Lecompton constitution, were exercising a power to institute upon the country, and "force a constitution upon the people of Kansas against their will." One Senator, [Mr. DOUGLASS], who was most conspicuous in his hostility to the Administration, and his warfare on the Democratic organization, while recording his own services, and fighting the battle against such an "arrogant demand," and against the consummation of such a "fraud" as the admission of KANSAS, congratulated his Republican allies for the successful and valuable aid rendered in this contest against the "Lecompton fraud."

The Kansas struggle has passed into history. Violence and wrong were committed on both sides, and there is much connected with the question discreditable to the country. As one member of the last Congress, I repel with scorn all imputations on either side. I am not a member of the organizing and recusant Democrat, of a purpose to "consummate a fraud," or "force" an unwilling State into the Union. It is demonstrable that the Lecompton constitution was legally and validly established as the organic law of the Territory of Kansas, so far as the organic law of the United States government. The "scene" of the inhabitants was taken upon the expediency of calling a convention to frame a State constitution. They decided in favor of the convention, and the Legislature passed a law authorizing the election of delegates, and, at a subsequently legal and fair election, the delegates were chosen. The country was divided into two great camps, the one in support of the slightest fraud, nor of a single illegal act, any of the elections I have specified. Up to this time, there is no pretense of fraud or illegality; and the refusal of a majority, even, to vote on the question, does not affect the previous legal proceeding. The right of a convention to convene, to frame and ordain a fundamental law, I only interpose this brief explanation lest silence might be construed into acquiescence, into an unfounded excuse.

The Alabama Legislature unanimously passed resolutions authorizing the Governor to call a convention of the State, in the event of the refusal to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, supposing that these alleged irregularities were but only pretenses to keep a slave State out of the Union. The President and the Cabinet, the great bulk of the Democracy in Congress, including every Democrat from the South, sustained and favored the admission of Kansas under that constitution. It is too heavy an exaction upon party fidelity, too entire a surrender of personal integrity, to demand support of this man for the highest office in the world for any man who denounced what so large a majority of the Democracy desired and sought to accomplish, as "the consummation of a fraud."

Mr. VANCE, Mr. Chairman, it is a favorite saying and the right of all accusers with conservative men, that the further agitation of the slavery question is to be deprecated as fruitful only of evil. In this I have, ever since my first venture in politics, fully concurred, and do now concur. The abstaining from the discussion of all dangerous and exciting topics, as far as it is possible, is a cardinal maxim of that party to which I have the honor to belong. But, so long as this subject continues to be the great and overshadowing issue in American politics, upon the disposition of which depends the destiny of the Republic, it amounts to nothing more than an abstract opinion in regard to an unattainable good. It will be agitated and discussed so long as one spark of available vitality can be struck out of it to add the ambition of politicians. It is a blank upon the face of the earth, and, however, if, within my power, to calmly discuss the subject of slavery in the United States. Such discussion, if conducted alone with a view to the elucidation of truth, will not serve to increase, but to ally, agitation, and restore peace to the popular mind.

I do not flatter myself that I shall be able to give the committee anything new upon the question; I may not even achieve the more ordinary feat of putting old ideas into a new dress; but every remedy of old ideas is a new dress, for the assault needs a fresh repulse; a fresh group of the same disease needs another dose of the same medicine; and the remedy being old and well known, prevents not its application nor hinders its efficacy.

With an assumption of superior morality, that I must regard as to the last degree impudent, the opponents of slavery every day assert here and throughout the country that it is a sin against God, and, inferentially at least, that slaveholders are sinners against all the laws of God. The original slave trade, or the original introduction of a man-stealing slave into our Territories, until then free, is sinful; but that slavery, as it now exists in the South, is in violation of natural law, cruel and inhuman, and a sin against God. This, I believe, is a statement of the position of the Republican party. It is my purpose briefly to examine this proposition, together with its inevitable corollary, that it is wrong to permit it to enter the Territories.

I affirm, says the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. FESS], "that nature itself does not and cannot exist of natural right." Natural rights, in some respects, Mr. Chairman, resemble the Cincinnati platform—they are extremely plausible to talk about, and open to many different interpretations. Nothing, however, signifies anything more governed by circumstances or prejudice. The doctrine is the incentive to much that is good, the excuse for nearly all that is mischievous. In all ages of the world men have sought to overturn well established principles, or to nullify existing laws under its sanctions, from the patriot who strikes a blow for his country to the thief who robs his neighbor's dwelling, under the idea that he has a natural right to live by bread. Now, sir, where are your natural rights? Are they the natural rights of all living creatures? The wild horse stands upon the prairie, free and untamed, where nature placed him, what right have you to catch him, to put a bridle in his mouth, and make him amenable to your superior rule of the beasts of the field? What natural right have you to subdue and destroy them at your pleasure? Has not nature given them both life and freedom as their natural right? How, then, can your right prevail over theirs, since both are the gift of nature? Vegetation itself is endowed with life and certain rights pertaining thereto; yet the lower animals ruthlessly destroy vegetation; and they, in turn, are destroyed by man, natural rights and all. How is this? How can natural law destroy itself, and on one page of the statutes thus repeal the other? If all are your natural rights, will gentlemen tell me where and what it is?

To me there is only one natural law perceptible in all this, and that is that immutable principle which extends through all creation, from the smallest organism to the highest intelligence, and which scope up to the great Author of all—the principle of superiority. It is this that enables one class to prey upon the other. Now what is easier than, by the strictest rules of logic, to extend the principle to the whole series, and to say legitimately from the premises, that superiority gives to all man a natural right to the person of his African slave? If gentlemen will agree to this, then our controversy is at an end; or if they will show me any other natural right whatever, by virtue of which the superior orders of existence exercise dominion over the inferior, then also will our controversy cease. I would not be understood as confounding right and power, but only as attempting to demonstrate the impracticable nature of these high-sounding phrases and party catchwords. I would not say that you exercise dominion over the inferior of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the face of the earth." True, but here you forsake nature, and resort to Divine right, and in attempting to avoid Scylla, run point blank upon the rocks of the other horn of the dilemma. vis media et tuta is untouched. I am not of those who, regardless, perhaps, of its unmistakable condemnation of their own practices, seek to pledge doubtful passages of the Bible to the certain damnation of their neighbors. If we are to regard the Bible as an exposition of either physical or political science, we will be apt to bring both into false positions, and many a favorite dogma of modern politicians would fall to the ground for want of this token of Divine approbation. The coal and iron resources of the earth, the power of the wind, the bad way, for I find nothing in that book which requires me to tax my constituents enormously for the benefit of Pennsylvanians, especially since their Representatives so gloriously backed down from the support of my worthy colleague for Speaker. And, for the purpose of this, I stand still suffer, for the command is express, "Thou shalt not steal." No, sir, every school-boy has learned, from the numberless stories of monkish ignorance and superstition, how dangerous both to religion and to physical truth it is to assign any character to the Bible than that of a Divine guide to Heaven. The late Hugh Miller, whose melancholy death scarcely startled the reading world so much as the boldness and originality of his speculations in geology, has in fact introduced in that work one of the most striking illustrations I remember to have seen in support of the truth of Christianity, from the circumstance, that the Bible alone, of all the known expositions of religion in the world, did not pledge its disciples to any theory whatever of either political or physical science. The Bible alone, which is the natural text in professed the southern slaveholder, he accepts it with the most unbounded confidence.

Every one at all familiar with its pages knows, that for one single recognition in the Bible of man's dominion over the inferior animals, the dominion of man over every other relation of man and servant, will be recognized twenty times at the Smith would desire to live in the State? Such a condition of things would be absolutely intolerable. The land that is now the seat of so much wealth, taste, and order, that furnishes so much valuable commerce to the world by the means of slave labor, would become a penal colony, with four hundred thousand free negroes ruling by the very liberty which would give them—roaming up and down, thieving, plundering, and infesting the very atmosphere with idleness and crime. The only thing it could effect for you, would be to nationalize the Black Republican party. Neither free nor property could be safe; such would be the case in every southern State. Generation after generation would pass away before we could recover from the shock, and our fertile fields would again resume the primeval look of the forest before other lands could be found to open their bosom to the sun. Any one at all acquainted with the history of emancipation in the British West Indies will know that I do not exaggerate, but rather fall short of the actual picture.

Says General Henningsen, in his recent masterly letter to Victor Hugo:

"In Africa, the negro, according to Egyptian paintings at least four or five thousand years old, and to which doubt that age has recently been assigned, has been, for at least the former period, content with his condition. He is as unchanged to type and in condition.

"The cultivation of the Egyptian, of the Persian, of the Greek, of the Carthaginian, of the Roman, of the Arab, have left him what they found him—barbarian, a savage, or a slave.

"Since the Declaration of American Independence, left to himself in Egypt, with the advantage of a large number of highly educated half-breeds to direct him, you know the savagery into which he has relapsed. Hardly has the grotesque despotism and virtual serfdom which Souleauque imposed been superseded by the presidency of Gerdif, can he be a bright exception to his race? when you have a hideous sample of Hittite civilization in the unprecedented murder of his unoffending daughter.

"In the West Indian islands free negro has rich lands, a congenial climate, and protection against self-imposed despotism or slavery. In California, the negro, in the North, he is surrounded by free civilized minorities, who extend to him countenance, sympathy, and aid. Yet in the South, it is everywhere the case, that he falls into barbarism, despotism, and virtual serfdom."

A distinguished abolition missionary, sent out to Jamaica to labor among the free negroes, and to furnish evidence to the world of their capacity for civilization, says:

"That nothing, save the furnishing of the people with more ample means of education and religious instruction, will save them from relapsing into a state of barbarism."

The seventh annual report of the American Missionary Association says:

"For most of the adult population of Jamaica—the unhappy victims of long years of oppression and degradation—our missionaries have great fear yet for even these there may be hope, though with trembling."

From the annual report of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 1853, I quote again:

"The friends of emancipation in the United States have been disappointed in some respects, at the results in the West Indies, which they expected too much. A nation of slaves cannot at once be converted into a nation of intelligent, industrious, and moral freemen."

And again:

"Licentiousness prevails in a most alarming extent among the people. The almost universal prevalence of intemperance is another prolific source of the moral darkness and degradation of the people."

With much more to the same effect. The London Times, about the same year, speaking of the results of emancipation in Jamaica, says:

"The negro has not acquired with his freedom any habits of industry or morality. His almost universal prevalence of intemperance is another prolific source of the moral darkness and degradation of the people."

The Times goes on, in terms too long for quotation here, to express its belief, founded upon the very highest authority, that the whole "names of the population will retrograde to barbarism." The New York Evening Post, known to be a violent Abolition journal, in speaking of the decline of the industrial interests of the island a few years ago, says:

"This decline has been going on from year to year, daily becoming more alarming, until at length the island has reached what would appear to be the last period of distress and misery."

Governor Wood, of Ohio, on his way to Val-

pariso, in 1853, speaks thus of what he witnessed in Jamaica:

"We saw many plantations—the buildings dilapidated—fields of sugar cane half-worked, and apparently poor; and noting that which will grow without labor appeared wasteful and fruitless. Since the blacks have been liberated, they have become indolent, insolent, degraded, and dishonest. They are a stolid, beastly set of rascals, living in the streets, as filthy as the Hottentots, and betwixt worse."

Bishop Kip says, also, on the same subject:

"The depth of degradation to which the negro population has sunk is, we are told, indescribable."

These are but a few extracts from the vast mass of testimony which all candid men have been compelled to give on this subject; and which, in the connected pursuit of my subject would have induced me to waste time in citing proof as to the utter degradation of free-negro communities.

"The scheme of removing and colonizing four million people is an utterly absurd in practice as well as only to be suggested to excite a nature impracticability. Amalgamation is so odious, that even the mind of a fanatic recoils in disgust and loathing from the prospect of intermingling the quick and jealous blood of the European with the purring hum of African barbarism. What, then, is the best and right to be done with our slaves? Plainly and unequivocally, common sense says, keep the slave where he is now—in servitude. The interest of the slave himself imperatively demands it. The interest of the master, the United States, of the world, of humanity, and of God, demands it. Keep the slave in his bondage; treat him humanely; teach him Christianity; care for him in sickness and old age, and make his bondage light as may be; but above all, keep him a slave and in strict subordination; for that is his normal condition; the one in which alone he can promise the least of good to himself or his fellow-men. If this is not the language of political philosophy and true philanthropy, if this is not right, then are my most ardent convictions and the most generous impulses of my heart but shallow and false delusions; and I pray to be the world's martyr, if I am wrong. I repeat, above all the surroundings of prejudice and section to view this great question solely by the pure and unflickering light of truth.

Such being our circumstances, and such our condition, it is time for the opponents of slavery to know, and to be warned, that it is no longer more than pecuniary interest that binds us to that institution. It is not, as we are often tauntingly told, a desire for gain, or an aversion to physical labor, that makes us jealous of any interference with the property principle in more deeply seated than this. The general welfare and prosperity of our country, the very foundation of our society, of our fortunes, and, to a greater or less extent, the personal safety of our people, combine to make us defend it to the last extremity. And with our considerations of the Federal Union, any other good, will allow us to permit any direct interference with our rights in this respect.

But we are to be lulled in sleep, and our fears quieted, as to the purpose of the Republican party, by its repeated assertions of your leaders, that we do not intend to interfere with the rights of property. You say, again and again, that you only intend to prevent its extension into the Territories; and you complain that southern men will unjustly continue to charge you with interference with it inside the States. Mr. SEWARD, in his recent apathy, says:

"The capital States (by which it is supposed to mean those States which do not practice slavery) believe legitimate and constitutional reasons to the extension of slavery into the common Territories, and the unconstitutional aggression against slavery established by local laws in the capital States."

And Mr. WADSWORTH has laid it down recently, as one of the grand principles of the Republican party, that there shall be no interference with slavery in the States. I, therefore, solemnly prohibit slavery in all the Territories, by an act of Congress, or to refuse to admit a new State because she recognizes slavery, would be a direct and unequivocal interference, about which common sense will admit of no sort of doubt. In the first place, because it materially impairs the value of my property to restrain my power to remove it; and especially to make it no longer my property when I take it into what Mr. SEWARD himself acknowledges to be "the common territory." If you refuse to admit a new State, because she would by Congress from entering the South, you would find their value impaired most woefully, and would needly regard it as an interference with the rights of trade.

In the second place, by surrounding the slave States with free territory, and building us in with an impassable wall, you would eventually force the abolition of slavery. Our population would become so free, and our slaves so numerous, that we could not live; their value would depreciate to nothing, and we would not be able to keep them. Do you not call this interference? If not, then what is it? A general desire to take a certain city; thinking it too strong to be won by storm, he attacks it with his army before it, draws his lines of circumvallation, cuts off its supplies, and, shutting off all communication, waits patiently for famine and domestic insurrection to do their work. True, he says, "Don't be alarmed in there; I am not going to interfere with your internal affairs; I have no right to do that; in fact, one of the rules of war in my camp is, no interference with the internal affairs of this city: my only intention is that you shall not spread, as you are a very sinful people." Yet that city, in spite of these protestations, would soon be starved, purged and ruined. You are interfering with our rights in the most dangerous manner, by thus seeking to violate one of the oldest and plainest principles of justice and reason—that you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly. The voice of the nation, speaking through its Representatives by a majority of four in one, North and South, affirmed this in 1838. In the Twenty-Fifth Congress, Mr. Atterton, of New Hampshire, moved a series of resolutions on this subject, the third of which set forth as follows:

"That Congress has no right to do that indirectly which it cannot do directly; and that the agitation of the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia or the Territories, is a means of protest with the view of doing indirectly that which is prohibited by the Constitution, and is an infringement of the rights of the States, and is a violation of the oath which they entered into the Confederacy."

Upon this resolution the yeas were 164, and the nays 40. Well may you complain that the South will not distinguish between your resistance to the extension of slavery into the Territories, and direct interference with its existence in the States. The ancient mounds can only see a direct means of attaining the same result.

In the third place, your agitation and eternal harangues have a direct and inevitable tendency to excite the passions of the ignorant and the bigoted, not only an intention to do so, but the effect also. But you speak in ignorance or disregard of history. It is unnatural to suppose that the noise of this great conflict will not reach the negro's ear, and that your violent professions of regard for his rights will not make him believe that those who shelter him when he runs away will not also help him to cut his master's throat. The constant denunciation of his owners by your crazy fanatics will make him regard them as monsters, and will cause him to cherish the coils of rebellion until they are ready to burst forth in a consuming fire. Wilberforce and Macaulay did not even intend to abolish slavery in the West Indies when they began their struggle for the rights of the negro—so they said—and they scouted the idea with scorn. But the negroes, in a few years, were in a state of war. And yet, when the shrieks of murder and outraged women went up through the hot roar of conflagration throughout those lovely islands, the raging demons of lust and brutality bore upon their standards the name of Wilberforce, the philanthropist, beneath the effigy of a white woman kneeling at the feet of a negro, and on which was inscribed "Liberty and white wives!" And so strongly do these facts press upon you, as the legal result of your abolition teachings, that we have witnessed the mortifying spectacle of gentlemen and statesmen, who in the unanimous voice of their people were not in favor of servile insurrection!

But all this injustice will you do, and all these dangers to our wives and children will you incur, rather than permit slavery to enter another Territory, or permit it to come into the Union as a slave State, because it is the unanimous voice of the people thereof so desired it. And this Territory, which you mock us by calling "common," what do you intend to do with it? Sir, there are some distresses in the South, in which the widows of slain Federal soldiers will obtain relief, and some of the forces which some of your northern States had in democratic election, my advice to the South is to snap the coils of the Union at once and forever."

"Mr. McKAY, of Mississippi, thus speaks for the Democracy of that State."

"I said to my constituents, and to the people at the capital of my State, on my way there, that if such an event did occur, while I was on that day to determine the course of the State would pursue, it would be my privilege to counsel with them as to what I believed to be the proper course; and I said to them, what I say now and will always say, is an event which my constituents would have no dependence on the Union in preference to the loss of the national rights, and national rights, and national honor, in it. That is my position, and it is the position which I know the Democratic party of the State of Mississippi will maintain."

Mr. SINGLETON, of the same State, said:

"You ask me when will the time come; when will the South be united? It will be when you elect a Black Republican—Hale, Sumner, or Chase—President of the United States. Whenever you undertake to elect such a man to preside over the destinies of the South, you may expect to see us undivided and indivisible friends, and to see all parts of the South arrayed to resist his inauguration."

"We can never question the right of the people to control of the Army and Navy to go into the hands of a Black Republican President."

Another member from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS]

said: "The members of the Republican party, I warn you, present your sectional candidates for 1860; elect him as the representative of your nation for 1860; elect possession of the Government, the instrument of your ruin, the instrument of 'irrepressible conflict,' and you of the South will tear this Constitution in pieces, and seek for our ruin and right against aggression and slavery."

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I might occupy the whole of the hour allotted me in this repeating what has been uttered by the Democracy on this floor in favor of a dissolution of the Union of these States. But I will not do it. I have no desire to pursue the negotiations that. Yet I should not do justice to the subject if I did not repeat here what has been said by the member from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON,] on the 27th of January last. He said:

"Much has been said of the Union, and love for the Union, on one hand, and much of the Union, and dissolution of the Union, on the other. I am about to present to you a view upon the merits of questions that have been discussed during the session. I content myself with making this remark, subject if it grate harshly upon you, what I have said whatever love may be excited for the Union on the one hand, and whatever may be declared on the other in reference to the Union; whatever may be said in regard to the maintenance of it at all hazards, I believe that a dissolution of the Union, in this day and age, is a subject that should be discussed now. It may be in the power of the conservative elements of this House to arrest it; but that cannot be done by the Black Republican of the South. I believe that I represent as conservative a constituency as any gentleman upon this floor; a people who are as devoted to the Union as people, and who are as devoted to the Union as people; and yet, by the very nature of their devotion by as much liberality and unselfishness, by yielding up what no other State in this Union has yielded, a separate and independent nationality in order to participate in this Confederacy which we all profess so much to love; and yet that same State, that same people, are now so completely resolved that it is better that the wheels of Government should be arrested where they are to-day, and no organization ever effected, than that the candidate of the Republican party should be elected and placed in the Speaker's chair."

What gives special significance and importance to this extract, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the gentleman who uttered it was for some days a candidate for Speaker of this House, and that he was, with perhaps a single exception, the united vote of all members on this floor in regular standing in the Democratic party. Northern and northwestern Democrats who opposed the election of Mr. SUMNER as speaker, very truly said, "I will not vote with a bitterness unparalleled in our history, with the utmost alacrity wheeled into line with the disunionists of the South, and cast their votes for one who, as if impatient of delay, declares 'the Union is being dissolved now.'"

"It is, be it clear to all, that this is sound Democracy! Is this doctrine palatable to the Democrats of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin? Whether it be or not, let it be ever remembered, their Representatives on this floor uniformly cast their votes for the member who uttered it."

I might, sir, adduce additional proof of the truth of the proposition that the Democratic is a disunion party, by reference to elaborate speeches made recently in the other end of the Capitol. But I will not pursue that. The single fact will show that the same spirit of disunion, the same disregard of the Constitution, the same wild and reckless fanaticism, find favor there, and in the Executive mansion, as well as here.

Our Democratic President recently nominated, and a Democratic Senate confirmed, Hon. Charles

A. Faulkner as Minister to France. This was a deliberate act on the part of the President, a deliberate act on the part of the Senate, and a very significant act in the present posture of political affairs. Mr. Faulkner's position was well known; and that position was most emphatically endorsed by the Executive when he nominated him, and by the Democratic side of the Senate when it voted for his confirmation. At the Democratic meeting, held not long since in Virginia, over which Mr. Faulkner presided, he said:

"When that noble and gallant son of Virginia, Henry A. Wise, declared, as was said he did in October, 1856, that, if Fremont should be elected, he would advise the NATIONAL ARMY AT HAZARD'S PERIL, how few would, at that time, have justified so bold and decided a measure? It is the fortune of some great and gifted minds to see in advance of their contemporaries. Should WILLIAM H. SEWARD be elected in 1860, where is the man in our midst who would not call for the impeachment of a Governor of Virginia who would directly injure that army to pass under the control of such an executive hand?"

Al! Mr. Chairman, it is the men holding these treasonable sentiments, the men who threaten to "tear the Constitution in pieces," and "disrupt every tie that binds this Confederacy together," that are the pets and favorites of modern Democracy. These are the men that are the party at the nation at home, and are sent to misrepresent us abroad. And sir, how that party must have fallen, how entirely it must have forgotten or ignored the teachings of the fathers, and how wickedly it betrays its trust, when thus it strengthens the hands of those that press their pretensions, crowns with high honors the fiercest enemies of this Confederacy of States!

Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue this investigation further. Enough, and more than enough, has been done to prove that the President and the Democratic side in both branches of Congress sanction disunion as well as pro-slavery doctrines. I turn from the black record chagrined, humiliated. It is a sad thought that scores of honorable members, our own fellow-countrymen, sworn to support the Constitution, and pledged to labor for the honor and welfare of the whole Confederacy, should be found willing to rise in their places here, and declare that the Union shall not survive the election of a Republican President. I say, sir, it is a sad, a humiliating thought. But as this humiliating thought, there is no terror in these threats. They have been often heard before, and the people of the free States have learned to look for their repetition at the approach of every presidential campaign. And these very threats have been the support of a war, and a civil war, of the North to the real danger that beset the country. Listening to these treasonable sentiments they have asked: "How and why is this?" And with all their native shrewdness, their indomitable energy, and a devotion to country unsurpassed by any race of men, they have turned to a careful and thorough investigation of political affairs. And what have they discovered?

They have found the General Government exclusively pro-slavery in its character.

They have found it devoted to the extension of slavery.

They have found it devoted to the perpetuation of slavery.

They have found it ignoring the rights and interests of free labor, and devoting its energies to the defense and support of slavery labor everywhere. They have found it denying all aid to harbor and river improvements, so much needed for the protection of our commerce, and squandering its millions of money upon party favorites and for party purposes.

They have found it ready and anxious to acquire southern territory, without regard to cost in men or money, but tamely yielding when our northern boundaries are in dispute.

They have found it offering millions upon millions for the purchase of Cuba, with its mongrel host of colored slaves and vicious criminals, while it was compelled to issue Treasury notes to defray its ordinary expenses.

They have found, in fact, that there is, back of the Government, and stronger than the Government, a power that for years has ruled the country with tyrannic and despotic sway. That power is slavery. It has made Senators and Cabinets and Presidents. It has made platforms for parties, and decisions for the courts. It has made compromises, used them for its own benefit, and violated them when they were no longer serviceable. It has sought, by fraud and by force, to control the new regions of the West, and for this purpose has used, as its willing instruments, the national Government and its hordes of dependants.

All these things, and many more, Mr. Chairman, have the people of the free States learned of the action, and the power which controls the action, of the Federal Government. And out of this knowledge, out of this state of facts, legitimately and necessarily, sprang the Republican organization.

Mr. Chairman, a more agreeable task now devolves upon me than that which I have been performing.

There are yet bright spots in American politics. There is a power for the country, the people own the Government, and they will preserve it. They will rescue it from the unworthy hands into which it has fallen. They will purge it of corruption, and restore it to its original purity. They will make it once more an agency for good, not an instrument of oppression. They will see that it is no longer destructive of the ends for which it was instituted, but that it is administered "for the benefit of the governed." To do this is the mission of the Republican party—high and noble, and worthy of the trust, it will fearlessly and conscientiously fulfill.

I doubt, Mr. Chairman, whether any political party in the United States has ever been more ferociously assailed, more malignantly traduced, or more recklessly belied, than the one of which I speak. And it is in view of the fact that I propose briefly to examine the position of the people of the free States upon the subject of slavery, that I may show what Republicanism is, and what it is not.

All will readily admit that the masses in these States are, to a greater or less degree, anti-slavery in sentiment. The most radical portion are those who sympathize with and follow the lead of William Lloyd Garrison. This class is confined chiefly to New England, and even there is not so numerous as it was some years since. The masses of the United States as pro-slavery instrument; in this respect fully agreeing with the disunionists of the South. And, if I am not mistaken, they join the fire-breathers of the South in clamoring for disunion. And I may here say that they are the only disunionists in the United States of the free States. There is no other portion of our anti-slavery population that seeks or desires to break up the Union.

From this class of anti-slavery men, earnest and conscientious, and self-sacrificing, they are the South has nothing to fear. They will neither office themselves, nor aid in elevating others to office. They utterly refuse to resort to the ballot-box to right the wrongs of which they complain; and being non-resistants, they will never join in a hostile crusade against the peculiar institution. They preach against slavery, pray against slavery, and print against slavery; leaving it to the Republicans to vote against it, and to "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon" to fight against it.

"The second class of anti-slavery men are those who sympathize with Gerrit Smith, and those who regard the Constitution of the United States as an anti-slavery instrument. They believe that the Federal Government has the power, and that it is its duty, to abolish slavery throughout the whole territory to break every fetter, and set the oppressed free." This class of men resort to the ballot-box to right the wrongs of which they complain. This party, though more numerous than the Garrisonians, embraces in all the free States but a few thousand men. Its chief strength, I believe, is in the States of New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, where it has five thousand four hundred and seventy votes, in an aggregate of five hundred and forty-four thousand eight hundred and sixteen; being but a very small fraction over the one hundredth part of the entire vote of the States. It cannot show the same relative strength in any other States, and I believe it is safe to say, that not one in two hundred of the voting population of the free States can be legitimately classed with this party.

The next and last class of anti-slavery men is that with which I am particularly proud to be associated; that class which I call the Republican party on this floor, and which embraces within its organization an overwhelming majority of the people of the free States. It is that class which is known to candid people, and to all gentlemen, as the Republican party; to those who have no regard for the ordinary politeness and no respect for the common civilities of life—whereby they be political editors or members of Congress—it is known as the Black Republican party.

This party, Mr. Chairman, holds the political faith of the fathers of the Republic. We believe that all men are created equal in rights, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We believe, nay, we know, that slavery, socially, morally, politically, is a blighting and a withering curse. We know that its influence is deleterious upon both the oppressor and the oppressed. We know it hinders the development of the material resources of the country. We know it checks the onward march of civilization. We know it impedes the progress, as it corrupts the morals and perverts the doctrines, of the Christian religion. We know it is surely, and with fearful rapidity, undermining the very foundations of our Government, and that if its onward course is not speedily stayed, our country will soon be a Republic only in name.

But, Mr. Chairman, we mean it shall be stayed. We say to slavery, "thus far, and no further." We design to combat it to its utter annihilation, now exists. Regarding it as a great evil, we cannot, as honest and conscientious men, as good and patriotic citizens, consent to its further extension. Hence, the great and lending idea, the cardinal principle, of the Republican organization is the non-extension, or, in other words, the limitation of slavery. If there is fanaticism in this principle, we are fanatics. If this is a treasonable principle, we are traitors. But those who so ferociously brand us with these epithets would do well to remember that in so doing they are assailing the memory of their own fathers, and justifying the course of George III., who published them as outlaws, and set a reward upon their heads.

The doctrines of the Republican party on the subject of slavery are clearly and authoritatively pronounced in the following resolutions, which I quote from the platform of principles adopted at Philadelphia, in 1856:

"1. Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, and embodied in the Federal Constitution, and the preservation of our republican institutions; and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the union as a whole, shall be preserved.

"2. Resolved, That with our republicans fathers, we hold it to be a self-evident truth, that all men are endowed with the inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that the primary object and ulterior design of our Federal Government were to secure those rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction, and to our republican fathers, when they had abolished slavery in all our national territory, or provided that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; it becomes our duty to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it, to prevent the establishment of slavery in the Territories of the United States by positive legislation prohibiting its existence there. And we declare the authority of Congress, of a Territorial Legislature, of any individual, or association of individuals, to give legal entrance to slavery in any Territory of the United States, while the present Constitution shall be maintained.

"3. Resolved, That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government; and that in the exercise of this power, it is both the right and the duty of Congress to protect it in its Territories from those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery."

The Republican party to-day, Mr. Chairman, stands upon this platform, and it will continue to stand there. Near the shores of southern disunionists, nor the pitiful appeals of northern conservatives, nor the persevering efforts of selfish, time-serving politicians, will cause it to abandon the position it has taken. And when it shall have obtained the control of national affairs, it will be governed solely by "the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution." And I hesitate not to say, that these principles, faithfully observed in the administration of governmental affairs, will lead to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; to the repeal of the unconstitutional and of the fugitive slave law; and to the limitation of slavery to the States in which it now exists. If these resolutions from the Republican platform mean anything, they mean no less than this. And, to limit slavery to its present position, is to destroy it. It must expand or die. These slaveholders know, and hence the earnestness and zeal with which they labor for its extension. This we of the free States know, and hence our anxiety to confine it within its present boundaries. We would "limit, localize, and discourage"

it. And for myself, I say, that while I desire constitutionally to observe all the "promises" and all the "compromises" of the Constitution, I would yet write in letters of gold, as the prime article of my political creed: "No SLAVERY OUTSIDE THE PRESENT SLAVE STATES."

I know, Mr. Chairman, and the people I have mentioned, we must stand by them. Our efforts are being made to modify the principles, and lower the standard of the Republican party. And I desire now, for my constituents and for myself, to solemnly protest against all such movements. Our principles, as enunciated at Philadelphia, are our very life. We must stand by them. We do not the remotest idea of relinquishing any article of our political faith, nor of suffering any article to remain in abeyance during the approaching struggle. We desire victory; we are anxious to wrest the Government from the control of the pro-slavery party; but we do not desire to triumph at the expense of our principles. We wish the people to believe that we are right. When they do thus believe, the national Government will be transferred to our hands; and, until it can thus be legally transferred by the intelligent action of men subjected to our views, we have no right to triumph.

Holding these views, Mr. Chairman, we expect that a man of our political faith, and for at least four years identified with the Republican party, will be presented to the people at the coming campaign. We—and by "we" I mean my constituents and myself—can never consent to take as our candidate for the Presidency a man who lent "aid and comfort" to our opponents four years ago. What I vote for a man who, directly or indirectly, aided to the present Chief Magistrate in the position he has so shamefully disgraced! The idea is preposterous; and I say, calmly, deliberately, emphatically, that the men who expect the Republicans of Michigan to do such an act as this, know little of the character of our population. We do not say we must have our favorite candidate; but we do say we must have a Republican candidate, one who believes in the Philadelphia platform now, and who believed in it and stood on it in 1856. Alas, that I could not say more! I have no plea to offer now, that the State which I in part represent will do her full share towards wresting the Government from the unfaithful hands that now control it, and restoring it to its original purity and vigor.

"SPEAKER, Mr. Chairman, during the protracted contest for the Speakership, I was often tempted to exclaim, with the Roman orator, "How long, O Cautine, will you abuse our patience?"

The expressions of disloyalty to our Federal Union, which were so profusely culminated from the Democratic side of the House, seemed so utterly repugnant to every sense of patriotic duty, that I could not sit in my seat without words of rebuke leaping to my lips and struggling for utterance. So, too, when I, in common with others, was arraigned for spirit which we do not understand for events which we do not understand, required great forbearance to withhold my immediate denial, and hurl back my indignant defiance. But impressed with the conviction that all our proceedings, with the exception of the ballots for Speaker, and the necessary adjustments, were required, I managed to hold my peace.

It is provided by statute that the members of the House of Representatives shall assemble on the first Monday of December, and choose a Speaker, previous to which, no business shall be transacted. I have felt myself called upon to observe this requirement of the statute, and I deem the present a fit occasion to call the attention of the people to the enormity of the recent transgression of the law by the law-makers themselves. The example which they have set has been one of manifest tendency to encourage the same spirit of lawlessness, which is unfortunately too prevalent in our country, and threatens more than any other thing, in my judgment, the stability of our Government and the permanence of our institutions. I judged, too, and the result has shown correct, that it was the part of wisdom to preserve silence while leading members of the Democratic party ventilated their schemes of disunion and elaborated the grievances under which they conceived the Federal Union to be groaning! Before we were fully settled here, these gentlemen thrust "the irrepressible negro" upon us, and most vehemently have they belabored him ever since! I felt persuaded that no advantage would result to the great interests in whose behalf I came to the Thirty-Sixth Congress by mingling in the heated discussions on that kindred subject; and I would perhaps only have fanned the embers of controversy, which were already glowing, rather than feed, and keep alive by constant irritation. Not that I felt indifferent to the grave character of the scenes through which we have passed. I trust I share the feeling of concern, so freely and so feelingly expressed here, for our country, our people, and for every slave in bondage. Certainly, I would be recreant to the high trust reposed in me by the patriotic and intelligent constituency which I represent here, if I failed on this, the first fitting opportunity, to declare their unaltered and unshaken attachment to the principles and policy on which rests the superstructure of our Government, and their determination to maintain the Constitution and the Union unaltered, unamended, and unabridged. In the past these have proved the elements of our greatness and our prosperity; and we stand without an anchor of our political safety; in the future, no one can contemplate their overthrow without emotions of dread, apprehension, and hopeless despair.

I am one of those who do not despair of the Republic. After two months of persistent effort we succeeded in electing a Speaker of this House; and that event, with concomitant circumstances, proved a complete answer to the impotent threats and vaporous harangues to which we had been subjected during that period of time. Since then, the public creditors, who were so ready to forsake their dues, have been satisfied; the wheels of the Government move smoothly on their freshly-greased pivots; and the African has been left to quiet repose! Had the Helper book not been dug from its obscurity by the New York Herald a week before Congress met, some of the malignancy would have been resorted to, with a view to the renewal of the negro agitation. Some men and some parties prefer strife to peace. They live in contention and they thrive in tumult. The political position of the Government, which was administered, was attempted to be renewed here. Under the pressure of the Union-saving people, many patriotic citizens were successfully duped into voting for Mr. Buchanan; and thereby he attained the summit of his life-long aspirations, and became a national idol. The Democratic party, for the Government, the party which elevated him to power has become demoralized, and is conceded to be powerless in almost every free State. He has effectually accomplished what his political opponents had hitherto failed to accomplish; he has extinguished the Democratic party North, and has sectionalized it so that it has virtually become the mere parasite of the slavery propaganda of this country. And now, in this hour of dire distress, that their columns are broken, their legions are scattered, and the proud memories of the past history of the party are forgotten, again made that the Federal Union is imminent danger of going to pieces.

All there is of truth in the assertion is the fact that the union of the Democracy with the power and intrigues of the present administration, will be interfered with by the present year comes to a close; and so "irrepressible" is this cohesion of the spoils of office, that the most discordant elements and the most opposite extremes of men and opinions are laboring together to prevent so catastrophic a catastrophe. The free States have had possession of the Federal Government, and have shaped its policy, nearly all the time since the adoption of the Constitution; and Senator Hammett, of South Carolina, in the Senate, not long ago, declared that southern statesmanship had been a masterpiece. The free States have followed a policy for half a century, without interruption or interference. And yet, on the slightest intimation being given that the free laboring interests of the North were seeking a recognition of their power in the Government, an absolute howl of contumacy is set up in nearly every southern State. South Carolina and Mississippi send itinerant commissioners to the capitals of neighboring States, to utter their lamentations over what they fancifully assume to be northern aggressions; and Virginia, the mother of States, the cemetery of Presidents, listens with some degree of patience to these recitals. Alas! that the pen of history, with remorseless accuracy, should record the degeneracy of these latter-day saints of a spurious Democracy!

When our fathers sealed their devotion to the cause of constitutional freedom with their blood, they hoped that the virtues which acquired the independence would be transmitted to their posterity; for countless ages, would syllable their praises and sound their fame along the corridors of time, in strains undying as the music of the spheres. But where now, in portions of the country, is the veneration for the great and good men of our golden age? Where the respect for their labors and achievements? Men high in public position scoff at the great names that adorn our history, and laugh to scorn the teachings of our glorious past! The political compact by which our fathers bound us in one common destiny is regarded as men regard a garment—to be put on and off, as it suits the caprice of the wearer. The duty we owe to a common country, the allegiance due to a common Constitution, are treated as incumbrances that may be thrown aside at will. The exalted motto of Democracy renounces the ancient and time-honored maxims of our political grievances; and instead of addressing themselves to the enlightened conscience and sober judgment of the people, they resort to the language of intimidation and menace to accomplish their purposes. When they are met by the people upon the intelligence and patriotism of the people—the true tribunal of last resort for the redress of political grievances—many of them boldly proclaim their determination not to submit to the election of a President who is distasteful to them, or their party, or their section. In other words, if a majority of the people of the United States, in pursuance of law, and under the forms prescribed by the Constitution, elect a gentleman who is not their choice, they will treat the election as if it had not been held—resist it by violence, and prevent its consummation by force of arms.

Sir, I have yet to learn that any respectable number of the people of any State or section of our country participate in these schemes of treason and projects of disunion. I am even unwilling to believe that the gentlemen who are the avowed and avowed representatives of the sentiments represented, in any fair sense, the opinions of the people at large in any portion of our country. There are, doubtless, political demagogues South as well as North, who are inflaming the minds of their people and exasperating their prejudices by malicious reports, and it is easy to see that they maintain a sort of undeniable notoriety before the people by their violent harangues and angry denunciations. Disunion is thus avowedly put forth as a remedy for political defect in the coming presidential election by many of the high-principles in the Democratic temple. Clothed in their sacerdotal robes, these gentlemen, solicitous to retain their loaves and fishes, and well pleased with the luxurious appliances by which they are surrounded, have broken out into this cry of disunion, and have taken them on the eve of a presidential election, with an unusual chorus of vociferation, the notes being pitched a little higher, and the emphasis being a little more tragic, by reason of recent events. No California miner ever struck a place with more real satisfaction, and turned his golden treasures with more zeal, than do the Democratic politicians, eager in the pursuit of the seven principles underlying the Democratic superstructure, (according to Mr. Randolph,) follow up the advantage which they suppose Brown's invasion has given them!

The right of the people to choose a Chief Magistrate of their own sovereign will and pleasure is, however, one of their essential liberties, and will be surrendered never to men or force. The Nation on these matters is not to be trifled with. It belongs not to the current politics of the day. Its existence is a fixed fact, and lies down amid the foundations of our political superstructure, firmly and irrevocably, as lie the mountains which encompass us about, the very impress of Divine sanction, and the surety of our safety. If its overthrow will meet the doom of felons the moment they put in execution one threat or commit one overt act of rebellion to its authority. One such example in each State will be sufficient to deter others from offending in like manner, for one generation at least. There is not likely to be another John Brown for some time to come, who will venture to invade a sovereign State, and defy its authority. Nor will more than one disunionist levy war or commit an overt act of treason against the Federal Government, without meeting his just deserts. His punishment will be speedy; his doom certain.

Let me call the experience of 1832. Mr. Calhoun then proposed to nullify an act of Congress; and for that comparatively simple proposition, General Jackson had made up his mind to execute the latest extremity of the law upon him. The people, North and South, in the presence of the fact of the nullity of the Government, threatened, and its power defied, pledged themselves to sustain General Jackson, with their means and their muskets, in enforcing the laws and maintaining their authority. We were nearer then, it is true, by a quarter of a century, to the times the tried men's souls, in the future of consuming fire. In the degeneracy of these latter days we see Democrats, clothed in the mantle that Jackson wore, and professing to be touched with live coals from the altar upon which Jackson offered his labors, to mention the free institutions of our country with overbrow and our political Union with disruption, "from turret to foundation stone." And now, we have a President who, instead of boldly defying the treason, and bringing the power of the Government to bear upon the traitors, affirms that he will, by one, and takes to his loving embrace the other.

But, despite these things, the fire of patriotism are not extinct. They slumber, it is true; else we should not hear these frequent appeals to disunion as the fabled remedy for the ills of the moment; but let the people be aroused to any real danger of such an issue, and the smoldering elements will be rekindled into a fervent heat, before which treason and traitors, North and South, will be consumed like stubble in the field! Who are you, gentlemen of the South, that assume thus and here to exercise the functions of sovereignty? The servants of your masters—the people; the delegated agents, for a little brief hour, of your respective constituencies, for a limited purpose! Dressed in a little brief authority, I will not say you lack the spirit to resist, but I say you lack the courage to resist, and you have no right to exceed your authority; and your threat of any sort of moral force, are impotent, and fall on our ears like the idle wind, which bloweth where it listeth!

Sir, disunion implies war! Secession means rebellion! Treason deserves death—the hangman to execute the sentence of sovereignty. How do you exercise the functions of sovereignty? How do you propose to divide the Union? Where will you begin? What is to become of my honored State, the keystone of the Federal arch? The Hall of Independence, the ark wherein was venerated our political constitution, stands there, and the spot is sacred in the contemplation of every lover of his country. Will you separate it from the sisterhood of States? Will you give up your share in the common glory which was achieved on the heights of Bunker Hill? The blood of our ancestors flows on the battle-field of Gettysburg, and I am unwilling to surrender the patriotic memories enkindled by their services on the soil of that gallant State! And do you ask us to give up our title to the glorious achievements in the sunny South? We share with you the glory of that heroic veteran, who we in letters of fire upon the forehead of the disunionists of his day "the Federal Union must be preserved!"

With you, we claim a share in the name and fame of America's greatest orator, who sleeps his last sleep beneath the soil of Kentucky. When, so a patriot, we regard the life, the words, and teachings of these illustrious dead, then, in my judgment, are our consciences seared as with a red-hot iron, and our brows crimsoned with an infamy so deep that the waters of Niagara cannot wash them clean. There are we are ready for the work of demolition. Then hatter down, from turret to foundation stone, this proud Capitol! level it with pickaxe and spade, so that, like the temple of Jerusalem, there shall not be left one stone upon another! Pull down the palatial building of this Federal Government, and scatter its stones upon their foundations! Let not these monuments of the virtues of your patriotic ancestors stand, if you mean to disrupt the ties which now bind us to a common and a glorious Union! And when you have done these things, go to yonder proud shaft, that is rising to the memory of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," and leave no stone of it standing, so that your evil infamy may be baffled to the drugs, and your work of disunion be thus effectually and thoroughly done!

Southern gentlemen have strangely misconceived the spirit and purpose of the great movement now peering the masses of the North "at every step, like a steam locomotive." It has been argued here as though the mad attempt of John Brown to run off negroes held to servitude in Maryland and Virginia had received the countenance of, and was approved by, the masses of the northern people. It has even been suggested that the animus of the great Opposition party to the Democratic Administration was the abolition of slavery where it now exists by force of positive law. Such assertions are entirely unfounded in point of fact. I am not commissioned to speak for any people but those I represent here; but I think I know the general and prevailing sentiment of my whole State well enough to declare that our people do not regard negro stealing as any part of their platform, nor negro equality as any remedy for political grievances. Our people do not profess insurrection, and we have never intended to make forays upon sister States, nor set at defiance the established authority of their neighbors. They cultivate relations of peace and friendship with all; and would rather cement than loosen the ties of fraternity and good-will between the States, geographically central, so she is equally removed from fanaticism and frenzy. There need be no apprehension felt anywhere as for her loyalty; for there is no sentiment more deeply imbedded in the hearts of her people than devotion to the Constitution and Union. We interfere not with the rights of any State, but cheerfully concede all that are guaranteed in the Constitution. No subject can be introduced here during this Congress, that I am aware of, that can justify the intemperate harangues to which we have been compelled to listen since first we met here. To violate and shatter the laws, as we find them on the statute-book, and expounded by the Federal judiciary, until altered or amended by competent authority, has always been a cardinal doctrine with the party with which I am associated. It is the duty of every citizen to change it, if it is found to be the binding force of its authority. That great party is eminently national and conservative. Progressive, it is nevertheless sure and steady in its progress; fearless in the avowal of its principles, it is yet moderate and conciliatory. It is a party, by the way, without any supporters, to dislodge the Democratic party from its possession of the Government, and to restore the policy of the republican fathers in its administration. The main elements of this party's strength are, opposition to the cardinal vices of the doctrine and practices of the Democratic party. These are, its anti-American or free-trade theories, and its anti-free labor or pro-slavery policy.

The protective policy is, in my judgment, the lifeblood of the body-politic, and especially so in our own great State. Whatever prominence may be given to other great questions, this is the paramount one with our people. Our soil is fertile to the hand of intelligent labor; and whatever surplus we have to sell of our vast productions, we prefer to sell to our own people, and at the market, constant in its demands, and not subject to the fluctuations of foreign trade. Stored away in treasuries strong as her ancient hills, yet of easy and cheap approach, our State holds immense wealth, in its enduring mineral resources, of extraction and of incalculable value. The two are in such close proximity that they will always aid to elicit and elaborate each other. This vast treasure lies so near her central regions, and both are so readily approached from all important centers of population, that it is not to be found there, more readily than anywhere else, may the five great industrial classes—the farmer, the miner, the manufacturer, the carrier, and the tradesman—exchange their labor and possessions for their mutual comfort and advantage. To aid her in developing this immense store of wealth, and to protect her own citizens against of Europeans, by the profit made between the cheap material and the rich result, Pennsylvania has vainly petitioned the national Congress for many years. Her facilities, if unhindered by the hostility of the Democratic party, are unequalled in the world; and yet her mines and mills and forges, in their best estate, have only been half worked. We have imported manufactured iron, when we ought to have supplied it to half the civilized world.

Look, for a moment, at my own, the capital district of the State. Its northern boundaries are the great anthracite rock regions, extending throughout the central and eastern portions of Pennsylvania, containing an amount of undeveloped wealth which passes the imagination of man to conceive. Its southern boundaries comprise the Cornwall hills; strewn along which, in prodigious abundance, are the largest and most valuable deposits of iron ore in this country. Not less than fifty million tons of the raw material lie there, awaiting the hand of the miner and the skill of the manufacturer. And between these two ranges of coal and iron mountains lies a valley of agricultural beauty and fertility unsurpassed in the world. With railroads passing through it, easy of access to the seaboard, and containing water power of rare excellence, that valley seems to be pointed out, as if by Divine signification, on account of its great natural and artificial advantages, as the locality best adapted to the establishment of the national government, so long in contemplation, and I trust, now soon to be firmly fixed in its "local habitation" in this, the garden spot of Pennsylvania.

Pennsylvania is a free-labor State. She was among the first, in her civil, deliberate way, to abolish human bondage within her own borders. The brows of her hardy yeomanry are moist with the sweat of honest labor, and their palms are browned with exposure to toil. Instead of being esteemed "manacles," in consequence thereof, we regard them as the salt of the body-politic, "leavening the whole lump," and the equals, in every noble attribute that belongs to our manhood, of the prouddest in the land. Many of our free-laborers seek homes in our Territories and rich stretch beyond the Mississippi, and we are anxious that they should there retain the dignity of freemen. Our great metropolis, already the first manufacturing and second commercial center of the Union, is interested in having those broad Territories preserve liberty and early practice the virtuous life of Arkansas. But our great State is equally bound to her southern and northern sisters by the ties of blood and patriotism, and wishes to perpetuate forever, and brighten continually, the golden chain of peace and harmony. It is consistent, and it is just, that we should shall enjoy their preferred constitutions and their constitutional rights, as she wishes to enjoy her own. She pours out no gratuitous upbraidings on her neighbors; she sharpens no pikes, and loads no rifles, for southern insurrections. She simply demands that the weight of the national Government shall be thrown in the scale of human freedom, rather than in the extension of human bondage; or that, at least, fair play be exercised; so that Oregon, with less than fifty thousand people, not warmed and fed by the national Government, while Kansas, with one hundred thousand, stands out in the cold, because her people do not choose to be Democratic and pro-slavery.

I have a thorough and earnest conviction that the protective policy is the only road to national wealth and independence, the only practice by which we can reach the stability and strength which it was the design of our forefathers that we should attain. It is, emphatically, a question of independence; whether we shall gather strength and enjoy property under a system that is the theme of Henry Clay, and clothed by his great mind and glorious patriotism, or whether we shall sink into driving dependence, worse than our former colonial condition. I believe, for my own part, that protection is the first duty of Government. We give our allegiance to Government as the correct policy of the nation. Why do we ride a Navy on the seas? To protect commerce. Why do we build light-houses on our coasts? To protect commerce. Why do we erect expensive fortifications on our frontiers? To protect the citizen and his property. Why do we maintain a Patent Office? To protect genius in the fruits of invention. When these are the features of the political system under which we live, I demand that he who dismembers wealth from the earth; that the farmer who raises his crops for the market, or the miner who penetrates the surface and sinks the shaft for mineral wealth, shall also, each and all, be protected. There is no true philosophy in the negative of the proposition. And just as often as we depart from the proposition itself, we are overtaken by languor in the body-politic, distress among those who represent labor, and find our Government plunging into embarrassing and ruinous expedients.

The example of England holds out an instructive lesson to us. Hers was a policy of protection, and under its operation she culminated to the proud position she now holds among the nations. She now professes free trade, but invariably practices protection to her home industry. The secret of her greatness is in the perseverance with which she has preserved that policy which invited capital and enterprise, and gave encouragement to her industry. Afterwards, it is true, when her manufactures and machinery had arrived at comparative perfection, she invited free trade with other nations less advanced in the arts than herself, but always maintained an advantage in favor of the home Government. She occupies this day all the great channels of commerce of the world. She has the palm of her power of her power, and her virtualization of colonial empire, already seized and held nearly every important bend of the earth; and her flag is continually carried to new conquests to feed her commerce. Her steamers traverse every ocean; their lines are continuous around every globe.

We sometimes speak of being the commercial rival of Great Britain; but I will be pardoned for saying the comparison is more flattering than true. We may ultimately compete with her, but we must become first her equal as a manufacturer, and accumulate wealth within our own borders, by cherishing every department of home industry. Then our spindles will make perpetual music, and our ships will bear away to other lands our surplus manufactures; bringing returns which will give profitable employment to our labor. Our pursuit will be levered down; the circle of happiness will be enlarged in the same proportion as the circle of energy is extended; and, as a people, we shall move forward to the high destiny which awaits us.

Protection is the only policy that is a fraud and a deception. I claim protection per se; that protection which recognizes American labor and affords encouragement to American enterprise. This demand is as old as the American Revolution. Benjamin Franklin asserted it before the British Parliament, when they asked him, "What protection do you wish for your colonies?" He answered, "I wish for a non-protective policy. It has been said that our revolutionary struggle was precipitated by the casting of a few tea-chests into Boston harbor. Not so. The stand-point of antagonism to the mother country was protection to American industry. The other colonies joined Boston, and entered into a compact that they would use no articles of foreign manufacture. That was the first Union of which we have any account in American history, and it led to the greatest and most successful result of the war, the free trade system. When the first Continental Congress assembled, what was its first act? An act to encourage American industry. It contained a preamble to the effect that the customs duties were levied for three purposes: for the revenue of the Government, the liquidation of the public debt, and the protection of American industry. I have no patience with that man or party who maintains, now-a-days, that protection must be inferential or circumstantial, incidental or accidental. Such a doctrine is absurd in principle, unsupported by precedent, and most pernicious in its application.

Our experience—what is it? If you refer to our history, you will find that all our prosperity has been traceable to the principle of protection. Your thrift and plenty have ever been in proportion to your protection. In 1816, and again in 1828, under protection, our industry was marked by unusual success. The moment that policy was abandoned, disaster and depression came upon us, and when we reached the sliding tariff of 1841, universal distress spread over the country. Under the non-protective tariff everything ran to seed, and in 1842, when protection was restored, and when we had our highest protective tariff, then was the period of our greatest prosperity.

And now that the issue is joined, let it go fairly and squarely before the country. No later than yesterday the friends of the protective policy in this House endeavored to introduce their measure, and asked that it be printed for the information of Congress and the country. They were met at the threshold by the united Democracy in opposition thereto, with the exception of some half a dozen members of that party. The conduct of that party yesterday was in striking contrast with their conduct here. The Democratic party, down by the Democratic State convention of Pennsylvania at its recent meeting. There it was again attempted to mislead the people of our State on this subject, and the idea was again held out that the Democratic party was favorable to the protective policy. Here the Democratic party has been the subject of ridicule; and at the first opportunity which offered, the Democratic party, almost to a man, refused even a hearing to our honored State!

Mr. Buchanan came into power with large Democratic majorities in both branches of Congress. If he had any influence whatever, why was it not exerted to procure a modification of the tariff, and to protect the interests of Pennsylvania? Had he expended a tithe of the effort which was employed to carry the Leecompton constitution through Congress, to force slavery into Kansas, the tariff would have been changed. The whole power of the Administration was devoted to those objects for two sessions, and not a voice was raised for "protection" on the Democratic side. Now, when a presidential election is approaching, and the people are about to go to the polls to elect the Administration, they are as loud in audacious professions as they were delinquent in duty when the opportunity of affording relief was offered. The record of the last Democratic Congress proves that every obstacle to a modification of the tariff was imposed by the Administration, and that the Administration was devoted to those objects in the Senate and House of Representatives.

The interests of our State were not only disregarded, but outraged, trampled upon, and subordinated to a pro-slavery propaganda in the Territories. The only politics professed by the Administration, and avowed by the President during the last Congress, when his party had complete ascendancy, was to make Kansas as much a slave State as Georgia. Such was the declaration of Mr. Buchanan's message, and everything else was sacrificed to that policy.

Again, and in conclusion, I say the issue is fairly made, and let an intelligent people decide it. I repeat now, what I said in this House on a former occasion, that, in my judgment, no man, and no party, can or ought carry the electoral vote of Pennsylvania, without presenting a living illustration of the protective policy, and that party fairly and squarely recognizes protection in its platform of principles.

Mr. WINDOM next addressed the committee. (His speech will be published in the Appendix.)

Mr. COX obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. LEACH, of Michigan, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and Mr. WASHINGTON having introduced the chair, Mr. STARKES presided. Mr. WASHINGTON, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill (H. R. No. 4) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1861, and had directed him to report the same, with an amendment, to the House, and a recommendation that the same do pass; also, that the committee had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 215) making appropriations for the contingent and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1861, and had come to no conclusion thereon; also, that the committee had had under consideration the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. WASHINGTON, of Illinois. I move the previous question on bill No. 4, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1861.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHINGTON, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and thirty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 16, 1860.

NEW SERIES, No. 74.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1860.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. IRVISON in the chair) announced that the Vice President had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 239) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Pearson, deceased.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 228) relative to the printing and distribution of the annual message of the President of the United States and accompanying documents, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

WASHINGTON MARKET-HOUSE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 159) entitled "An act authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $300,000, for building a market-house, and on that of Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented a paper in relation to the claim of Major William Williams, for expenses of fitting out and equipping men for the protection of the frontier, before the commencement of depredations at Spirit Lake; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of the marine underwriters of the port of New York, praying the publication of the results of surveys made by Captain Ringgold, of the Navy, of the passages through the coral archipelago of the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying the enactment of a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of A. A. Nicholson, and others, praying that pensions may be granted to the surviving militia of the war of 1812, and to the widows of those who have died or may hereafter die; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of E. B. Alexander, H. K. Craig, and P. St. George Cooke, colonels of the Army, in relation to their rank, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FITCH. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution relative to printing extra numbers of the Coast Survey report have directed me to report it back and ask its adoption.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, in addition to the usual number of three thousand, two hundred copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1859, twelve hundred of which for the use of the Senate and five thousand for distribution by said superintendent; that the same be printed and bound, with the charts and sketches, in quarto form, and that the printing of said charts and sketches shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope it will not be considered new. I object to it.

Mr. FITCH. I suppose an objection carries it over for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 19) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers and other purposes, have directed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, from whom I will state, for the information of that committee, a bill was reported and acted on yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred two memorials of insurance companies, merchants, and other citizens of Philadelphia, praying that steamers of light draught be authorized to be employed for the present class of sailing vessels in the revenue service, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of insurance companies of New Orleans, praying the substitution of steamers of light draught for sailing vessels in the revenue service, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 287) to incorporate the National Gallery and School of Arts, in the District of Columbia; which was, by its title, and by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CUSTOM-HOUSE OATHS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to consider whether the numerous custom-house oaths now required of officers of Congress may not with safety be abolished, and a simple declaration be substituted therefor.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION UNDER TREATIES.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire whether any further, and what, legislation is necessary to carry more fully into effect certain treaty stipulations between the United States and China, the Ottoman Porte, Persia, and Spain, respectively, concerning the civil and criminal jurisdiction authorized by the said treaties, and to report the result of their inquiries to the Committee on the Judiciary within three months.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF A MESSENGER.

Mr. YULEE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That there be paid, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the widow of Thomas Clarke, late a messenger in the service of the Senate, deceased, $125 for funeral expenses, and three months' pay of deceased, from the time of his death.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (No. 4) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1861;

A bill (No. 331) to repeal the third section of an act entitled "An act to increase and regulate the terms of the circuit and district courts for the northern district of the State of New York," approved July 7, 1858; and

A joint resolution (No. 15) for the relief of Thomas C. Ware.

THOMAS C. WARE.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take up the joint resolution which has just been read by the House of Representatives, for the relief of Thomas C. Ware, for the purpose of referring it to a committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) for the relief of Thomas C. Ware was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 4) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1861—to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (No. 331) to repeal the third section of an act entitled "An act to increase and regulate the terms of the circuit and district courts for the northern district of the State of New York," approved July 7, 1858—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MARY E. CASTOR.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask the Senate to take up bill No. 247.

Mr. SLIDELL. What is the bill?

Mr. GRIMES. It is a bill for the relief of Mary E. Castor.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as a Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary E. Castor, widow of First Lieutenant Thomas F. Castor, late of the United States Army, on the pension roll, at the rate of $26 66 2/3 per month, from the 9th of December, 1858, to the present date.

Mr. HUNTER. If there is any report in that case, I should like to hear it.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. GRIMES, on the 6th of March, from which it appeared that the petitioner was married, in 1839, to Samuel Whitehorn, who was then a first lieutenant in the United States infantry; that, in the year 1840, he was ordered to Fort Winnebago, Wisconsin, where he died on the 2d November following, of a fever caused by the malaria to the influence of which he was subjected while at Fort Howard, leaving her with an infant son, a few weeks old, in great destitution; that more than ten years after her husband's death, she married Thomas F. Castor, who was a cadet in 1841; brevet second lieutenant dragoons, July 1, 1846; first lieutenant, October, 1847; and was killed at Fort Tejon, California, December 31, 1855; that she resided with her husband at his post in California; that for some years prior to his death they resided under a tent, where, partly in consequence of exposure, she believes, he died; that her husband, at his death, left her almost entirely unprotected; that she returned to the Atlantic States, and has since remained entirely dependent upon her friends; that her father is a chaplain in the United States Navy, with small means and a large family, and, therefore, able to render her very little assistance; and that the state of her health is such as to prevent her from earning a livelihood for herself.

The records of the Surgeon General's office show that her first husband was, on the 24th August, 1840, attacked with a fever of an "inflammatory character," but did not remain entirely prostrated; and that the official report shows that, in all probability, Lieutenant Whitehorn's system was predisposed "to an attack of fever by the influence of malaria while at Fort Howard." The records also show that her late husband, First Lieutenant Thomas F. Castor, first regiment United States dragoons, died at Fort Tejon, California, of "phthisis pulmonalis," (consumption.)

Hon. Charles Mason, late Commissioner of Patents, testified that he had been well acquainted with the petitioner since many years previous to her first marriage, and that he well knew her, and that he substantially correct; many of the facts known to him personally.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senate, had known Mrs. Mary E. Castor more than twenty years, and knew the facts set forth by Judge Mason to be true. He also knew that the sight of Mrs. Castor is so far impaired that she is entirely disabled from seeing or reading, and unable to do anything towards her own support, and that the injury to her sight is permanent.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we can do very little but substantially correct; many of the facts known to him personally.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, United States Senate, had known Mrs. Mary E. Castor more than twenty years, and knew the facts set forth by Judge Mason to be true. He also knew that the sight of Mrs. Castor is so far impaired that she is entirely disabled from seeing or reading, and unable to do anything towards her own support, and that the injury to her sight is permanent.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we can do very little but substantially correct; many of the facts known to him personally.

the service, as most other officers do. I do not know what is her claim—whether it is as widow of one man, or as having been the daughter of a chaplain in the Navy. It is no case for a pension, it seems to me.

Mr. GRIMES. I will merely state that there was a unanimous report of the committee in favor of this bill. I am not disposed to argue it before the Senate, but I apprehend it is a case that must excite the sympathy of everybody, and that it would be nothing more than right to grant a pension in this case. The truth is, that the first husband of this lady died in the line of his duty, and she comes, under the first appropriation, within the spirit, although perhaps not strictly within the letter, of the law of Congress. The records of the Surgeon General's office show that he was attacked, whilst at Fort Winnebago, by a disease, the seeds of which were laid at Fort Howard, where he was stationed in pursuance of the commands of his superior officer. We granted the other day pensions to the widows of three distinguished officers—men, some of whom had not at the time they distinguished themselves, been so long in the public service as the husband of this woman had been at the time of his death. General Macomb, who distinguished himself at the battle of Plattsburg, had not been in the service of the United States so long as this first lieutenant had been in the service at the time of his death, and we have no reason to suppose that this man would not have distinguished himself as much as General Macomb did at that occasion, if he had only had friends at court who could have induced him from the position of a brevet second lieutenant to that of brigadier general in the short space of thirteen years. I protest entirely against the principle that the widow of an inferior officer—or a lieutenant or a captain—shall not be entitled to the same pension, in proportion to the pay that officer received, as the widow of a superior officer. These men take their lives in their hands and go to the uttermost parts of the earth to defend the honor of your flag and to maintain your rights. They die in the line of their duty; and because Heaven has not given them the talents of a Napoleon, of no reason why you should not take care of their widows and their children if they are cut off in the line of their duty.

Mr. HUNTER. This shows the danger of precedents. I did not vote for the bill to pension the widows of the officers who were killed in the war. I believe that has not become a law; it has not yet passed the House of Representatives. I think; certainly I am not aware that it has. But, at any rate, I should be very unwilling to extend that principle as far as the Senator from Iowa is disposed to go. If that is the case, we shall have to pension the widows of all officers who die in the service; certainly of most of those who die in the southern country; for most of those who die in their beds, die from some malarious disease. I believe that that is the case. If that is the other bill was put, was somewhat different from what is claimed here; still I did not think it was a case for a pension, and I was afraid it would lead to just such cases as this. If this is to pass, I believe there will be no limit hereafter.

Mr. FOSTER. I voted against the bill from Virginia against the bill that passed the other day, substantially for the reasons set forth by him; but I shall vote for this bill, for this widow is poor and blind.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word on this bill, although it is well understood in the Senate that I generally vote against all such bills, and did vote against this in the committee; but the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut, who has just taken his seat, constrains me to say something against the whole pension system. His remark goes to the very root and foundation of the whole system when you get beyond the invalid pensions. There is some reason to sustain invalid pensions. They are not purely a gratuity; they are founded somewhat in contract, implied if not expressed. Many of them are express. In several of them there are inducements among other inducements for volunteers in the service, provided in the acts of Congress that in case this soldier or officer were wounded in the service or should become disabled by diseases contracted in the service he should have a pension. There it is an express contract, and I say that where it is not express, there is generally an implied contract where a man engages in the military or naval service of his country and incurs great hazard of his life, or health, or limbs, that if he becomes disabled from disease or from wounds, that he be indemnified in some manner; but it only extends to the widow in only a personal contract, which does not apply to his widow or to his orphan children. All this class of cases are dependent merely upon the charity of Congress; they are mere gratuities. This case is one that depends upon very strong grounds, and if I was governed entirely by my own feelings, and my own sympathy for those in distress, and my disposition to relieve them; if I felt that I could make as free and discretionary a use of the public money, as I could of my own purse, I would not hesitate to vote for this bill, for there is none that has come under my observation that has touched my heart more or that has tried my principles more severely.

But, sir, I do not think that Congress is a charity hospital, or that we have the right to dispose of the treasure of the Government in pure charity; and this is a pure charity. The condition of the case is this: this widow is, for the second time, the widow of an officer of the Army. When her first husband died, she might have claimed a pension of the Government, and it is probable that she would have received principles which have governed those cases not provided for by any general law but under which several have been embraced, as several were provided for the other day. That is to say, I think there is persuasive testimony that her first husband died of disease contracted in the service of the United States. I think the evidence goes to this extent: that he contracted a disease arising from the malarial around the post where he was stationed; and the probability is, that if he had not been sent to this post, he would not have incurred the disease; that he contracted the disease, and he might have survived for a long time. Hence if she had applied for a pension as the widow of that officer, during her previous widowhood, I think she would have come within the spirit and probably the letter of the law, and a second husband and her second husband did not die of any acute disease, did not die of any epidemic; he died of a constitutional disorder which he might have had anywhere, and of which he would have probably died anywhere else.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me suggest to the Senator that the evidence shows that he died in camp; that he had been in camp for a long time, living in a tent with his wife. The fact was, that he was superintending the erection of some sort of a fortification at Tejon, in California. There was where he contracted the disease of which he died.

Mr. CLAY. I remember it; but he died of consumption, which is a hereditary and constitutional disorder, and very rarely, in my opinion, superinduced by such exposure as he incurred. The application in this case, if it has any merit at all, depends upon the mere appeal to the fact, because her former husband died of a disease contracted in the service, and in the line of his duty. It is not, in my opinion, because of the death of her second husband in the service and in the line of his duty, for I do not think the disease was contracted in the service, and I do not think that can satisfy the mind. The great objection to this case, and to all such, in that it opens the door to innumerable others, and that we shall be in the end constrained to provide pensions for the widows of all officers who die in the service of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. IVESON in the chair.) The Chair will state, that there are two verbal amendments which are necessary to be made to the bill: to insert in line nine, after the word "during," the word "and," and after the word "during," the word "her," so that it will read: "for and during her life or widowhood."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time? Mr. CLAY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Benjamin, Briggs, Hamlin, Brooks, Chandler, Clark, Colman, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Powell, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wall, Whittier, Wilson, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Briggs, Clay, Cushing, Fitch, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Rice, Sill, Tilden, Towner, and Wilson.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

JUDICIARY FEE BILL.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senate now to take up the bill S. No. 86, which is a general bill. We can get through it before one o'clock. It is one in which the public at large is concerned, and not for the relief of any particular individual. It is one of the reports of the committee on the Judiciary, and which we have had before as three sessions without reaching.

Mr. TOOMBS. What is it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is a bill to amend the existing laws relative to the compensation of the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. POWELL. I trust that we shall proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour of the Senate is now closed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. And during the morning hour the bill can be passed.

The motion of Mr. BENJAMIN was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 86) to amend the existing laws relative to the compensation of the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with several amendments.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I suppose the bill is better than the one which was last amended, without reference to the particular amendments, so that the Senate may be at it as now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it in that manner, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the bill as proposed to be amended by the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the taxable costs now allowed by law to the district attorneys of the United States, and marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States, the following fees for their services to the United States the following fees:

For drafting the declaration, writ, information, or other pleading necessary to bring the case to an issue, five dollars.

For arguing questions of law arising on the pleadings or documents in the case, but not more than one such fee shall be allowed in any case.

For drawing indictments on criminal informations, five dollars.

For collecting and paying over to the United States moneys, a commission of one per centum on the amount collected, but not more than one such fee shall be allowed on execution or otherwise: Provided, That when additional proceedings become necessary for the collection of money after the return of the execution issued against the defendant, a further commission, not exceeding four per centum, may be allowed, at the discretion of the Auditor of the Treasury, on the amount of the money so received by the Government, by virtue of such additional proceedings.

For examining a land title, and written opinion thereon, five dollars.

For making abstract of title when required, twenty-five dollars.

For examining and making report on any question or subject which may be referred to the President or any head of Department, thirty dollars.

For examining and making report on any question or subject which may be referred to the President or any head of Department, thirty dollars.

For each case arising under the extradition treaties of the United States, twenty-five dollars; and it shall so long be necessary for any district attorney to render account of the fees and emoluments received by him, as heretofore required by the third section of the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to amend the act of March 3, 1875, relating to the fees and emoluments received by the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States in cases wherein the United States are parties of record, and said clerks shall receive ten dollars for each day of attendance, and shall receive five dollars per case; and shall further be entitled to an allowance of five dollars per day for their attendance on court when summoned to attend in the district and circuit courts, five cents per mile for going from the office of the clerk, where he is required by law to reside, in the place of holding any court required to be held by law, and five cents per mile for returning; and the compensation herein provided shall be the only compensation allowed to the said clerks for their services to the United States, and shall be due and payable at the Treasury, from the Judiciary fund, on the 1st day of April following the term of court at which the case is heard, by the clerk and approved by the judge, which accounts it shall be the duty of the clerk to render to the first Auditor of the Treasury within thirty days from and after the last day of January and to the second Auditor, thereafter. That where the same person is clerk of both the district and circuit courts, he shall not be allowed to charge more than one compensation for attendance, to-wit: two on the same day, nor shall such per diem be allowed for attendance at nisi, nor at sessions held extra-judicially under the bank-law, nor at any other proceedings further. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as to deprive the clerk of his salary, or to curtail the fee to be paid to him under the eleventh section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the proceedings in criminal and civil cases at nisi, and to amend the act of the same date, and for other purposes," approved 8th August, 1846—9 Statutes at Large, page 74.

Sec. 4. And he is further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws requiring the rendition by the clerks of said courts of any other or further accounts than those specified in the provisions of this act, or fixing or determining the rate of compensation to be allowed to said clerks, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 5. And he is further enacted, That the marshals of the United States shall be entitled to charge for the services hereinafter ascertained the following fees, namely:

For travel in going and returning to serve any process, warrant, attachment, or other writ, six cents per mile.

For expenses while employed in endeavoring to arrest, under process, any person charged with or convicted of a crime, the sum actually expended, not to exceed four dollars a day, in addition to his compensation for service and travel.

For attending examination before a commissioner or other officer, and bringing in, guarding, and returning prisoners with or convicted of crime, five dollars per day, and two dollars per day for each deputy, not exceeding three.

For bringing into court any person in custody of the marshal, whenever so required by writ or by order of the judge, clerk, or district attorney, two dollars, and a five-cent return to his custody each person who is so seized.

For safe keeping, transportation, care, and necessary expenses incurred in cases where negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, are delivered to the marshal, under any provisions of the laws of the United States passed for the purpose of punishing or restraining offenders, one dollar per diem for each negro, mulatto, or person of color kept, from the date of the delivery to the marshal until the withdrawal of his custody under the provisions of the law, and this compensation shall not be included in the emoluments of the marshal, nor accounted for by him under the provisions of the third section of the act of 1853, but shall be retained by him in addition to the maximum compensation allowed by said section.

Sec. 6. And he is further enacted, That the bill of fees of clerks, marshals, and attorneys, and the amount paid printers, jurors, and witnesses, and lawful fees for exemplification of copies of papers necessary to the prosecution of a trial in cases where, by law, costs are recoverable in favor of the prevailing party, shall be taxed by the judge of the court in which the judgment or decree is rendered, and in and from part of the judgment or decree against the losing party; and before the account of the United States marshals, district attorneys, and clerks of the courts, and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department for settlements, they shall be examined and certified to by the judge of the court in which the action is commenced; and such examination shall be conclusive, and shall not be subject to revision, upon the merits, by the said accounting officers: Provided, That if it shall appear to said accounting officers that any charges so certified are not warranted by law, it shall be their duty to present to the judge granting said certificate a written statement showing the items so deemed illegal, with the grounds of the objections to their allowance; and it shall then be the duty of the judge to examine and decide upon the objections so made, and his decision thereupon shall be reported to the said accounting officers, and shall be final and conclusive, and the charges to which objections were made shall be allowed or disallowed, in conformity with the judge's decision so reported; and the certificate of the judge, or of the marshals, or United States circuit courts shall be examined and certified by the circuit judge, and received by him on any objections made by the said accounting officers, in default of which stipulation above provided; and the decision of said circuit judge shall be final and conclusive on said objections, and the charges so allowed in said accounts shall be allowed to the clerk, conformably with such decision.

Sec. 6. And he is further enacted, That in all cases of removal of a court, considered at the request of the head of a Department by virtue of existing laws, the compensation to be allowed for such services shall be adjusted in conformity with the provisions of this act, in default of which stipulation no compensation shall be paid.

Sec. 7. And he is further enacted, That in all settlements of accounts for fees, emoluments, and allowances of clerks, marshals, and other officers of the courts of the United States, the accounting officers of the Treasury Department shall not be required to account for any fees or charges not actually collected by them from the parties liable therefor, nor shall they be held to make such collection, but shall be held to result from the insolvency of the parties liable therefor; and the affidavit of the officer charged with the collection, and in relation thereto, shall be sufficient proof for the allowance to said officers of all fees and charges not actually collected by them, in all cases of removal of the settlement accounts of the marshals, before rendered, or hereafter to be rendered by them under the provisions of the said third section of the act of 9th February, 1853.

Sec. 8. And he is further enacted, That all the provisions of this act shall apply to the marshals, district attorneys, and clerks of said district and circuit courts, and to the marshals and clerks of Columbia, except this third section aforesaid, which shall not be applicable to said clerks; and said clerks shall continue to render their emolument accounts, and remain subject to the provisions of said third section of the act of 9th February, 1853.

Sec. 9. And he is further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. Shall the question be taken on the amendments separately, or in the whole?—All top to the yeas.

MR. HALE. Before the vote is taken, I wish the Senator who reported the bill would state to the Senate the reason for the amendment proposed to the end of the first section.

The Secretary read the amendment referred to, as follows:

And it shall be no longer necessary for any district attorney to render accounts of fees and emoluments, nor to pay into the Treasury any surplus of the fees and emoluments received by him in accordance with the third section of the act of 9th February, 1853—10 Statutes at Large, page 165.

MR. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, the principle upon which that is inserted in the bill is very simple. By the law as it now stands, every district attorney of the United States has to come here and settle the emolument accounts with the officers of the Treasury, and if his fees and emoluments from all sources exceed a certain amount, he has to pay the surplus into the Treasury.

Now, that system has been supposed to be it is hardly possible to get gentlemen of sufficient capacity and standing to accept the office of district attorney. They are thrown into constant trouble with the accounting officers of the Treasury for themselves five and ten, and two and three cents. They are brought here, and expected to be settling their accounts; and after all, with a corps of officers in the Treasury Department whose whole business it is to keep an account with every district attorney in the United States, there are but some three or four, or five at the most, whose emoluments exceed the limit allowed by law, and what is saved by getting their surplus into the Treasury does not pay for the cost of keeping up this corps of clerks.

Besides that, this limitation does not act except in some two or three districts in the United States, and in the remainder of the country, where the grade of professional capacity required is very high, and where the Government ought to have the very best talent in the country to defend its interests. In New York, I think the cost of the prosecution of the Government is very little—beyond the limit allowed by the law. In New Orleans, I think it would not reach it. In Boston it would not reach it. In San Francisco it might. There are some two or three officers who occasionally have to pay a surplus into the Treasury—really nothing worth mentioning; but in order to get that surplus we have to keep up a corps of clerks in the Department, and bother every district attorney in the United States to render an emolument account to the Department, and enter on a correspondence with the Department in relation to the emoluments. Now, if I think he has received during the year. There is nothing to be gained by it. It is an odious, oppressive, and disagreeable system upon the officers, and amounts to nothing, so far as the Government is concerned. For that reason, we propose to abolish it.

MR. HALE. I do not think the Government has found any difficulty in getting district attorneys, even in the districts mentioned by the honorable Senator, and I think this is a wholesome restriction. This act was passed in consequence of the enormous fees that were received by some district attorneys prior to its passage. I think it will be found by the return which was required to be made, that the district attorney of the southern district of New York received $50,000 a year. That will be paid by the returns now on file in the archives of this Government. I do not know how it was with others. I apprehend it will be found that in other districts they were higher, even than they were—

MR. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

MR. HALE. Certainly.

MR. BENJAMIN. There is no doubt there was a very great abuse prior to the act of 1853, and that arose from the fees as they existed prior to that act; but that act reduced the fees and emoluments to such an extent that since then, on the emolument accounts being rendered, it is found that the district attorneys are very often actually paid so much so, that in numerous instances there have been constant offers to resign their positions; and in many districts of the United States—some in my section of the country—we cannot get the first of the best talent to accept of the office, or three cases against the Government give an attorney more than the district attorney of the United States gets for his whole year's service. The act of 1853 was aimed at the previously existing abuse under the law, as it stood prior to 1853. The district attorneys' fees were aimed against the Government; but since 1853, with these emolument returns now made, it is found that there is nothing really worth accountability at the Treasury. The fees were so reduced, by the act of 1853, as to cut off a serious abuse.

MR. HALE. Mr. President, if that has been the effect—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call up the special order at this time, the morning hour having expired.

MR. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senate to let the Chair run for half an hour. I think we can get through the bill without any difficulty in that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana moves to postpone the consideration of the proposition for half an hour, in order to proceed with this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. HALE. Will the Senator be so kind as to state, for the information of the Senate, what is the maximum now?

MR. BENJAMIN. I think it is $6,000. It has reached that in one or two districts in the United States.

MR. HALE. Take this restriction away and it will be $60,000; not immediately, but it was $60,000 before the act of 1853 was passed.

MR. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, the act of 1853 cut down all the fees, and it is impossible now that they can go beyond a very moderate sum under the fees as now established by law.

MR. HALE. It was owing to the previous rate of fees that the abuse existed.

MR. HALE. I am asking something about the practice in that matter as to these fees. I do not know how it is with district attorneys, but I know how it is with clerks. They generally charge about two hundred per cent. over and above the statute fees. They have no ready experience when I have had anything to do with them, and I have had something. I say, as a fact, that in some of the offices the irregular charges they make, under various pretenses, are at least two hundred per cent. over the statute fees. If the maximum is not large enough, let it be raised; but I think it is well to keep some sort of restraint over these officers. I think it is well that these returns should be made, and that it is not wise to take off this restriction. But I am not going to take up the time of the Senate. I am opposing the amendment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that the question be taken on that amendment separately?

MR. HALE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on agreeing to the amendment, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

MR. HALE. I believe the same provision is made in regard to the clerks and marshals. I ask the Senator from Louisiana whether the same provision is not made in relation to the clerks and marshals.

MR. BENJAMIN. In relation to the clerks, yes; in relation to the marshals, no. The distinction was established in the Committee on the Judiciary for this reason: marshals can create business for themselves and the court, and can use up fees to any extent, and the clerks and district attorneys have no such power. They cannot create criminal business. They cannot run up fees. There is no liability to abuse in relation to those offices in running up fees.

MR. HALE. I think there must be a higher standard of morality and honesty in Federal officers in Louisiana than in New England, if the Senator thinks so.

MR. SLIDELL. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to interrupt him for a single moment?

not allowed any salary as clerk of the criminal court at all, it being considered as a rib taken out of the side of the circuit court of the United States, and he receives only such salary as he may earn in the circuit court of the United States. He gets nothing for his services in the criminal court—not a silver—and the Government now holds him responsible, not only for the excess of fees which he may receive over and above the expenses of his office, but they hold him a guarantor of all the fees and may be he is compelled to receive all those fees in cash at the time they are earned—a thing impossible, absurd, and contradicted by all the experience and practice of the courts of Maryland, from the earliest day down to this time. A former Attorney General gave the opinion that he was obliged to collect those fees in cash.

Now, sir, how is a clerk, whose fees are made up of small sums, charged for every little service in court, as entering a judgment, entering a motion, entering a continuance, to stop the progress of the business of the court, when sometimes hundreds of cases are called in a day? No court would allow it. Nor is such the system that prevails in Maryland, and prevails here, or did prevail here until this monstrous construction prevented it. Our practice in Maryland, from which the whole part of the circuit court of the United States is borrowed, except as altered by acts of Congress, is a credit system for fees. They are charged by the clerk, and sent out once a year, or at certain designated periods, and to be collected in Maryland by the sheriff; here by the marshal. It has now been declared, however, that the marshal is not bound to collect them, so that the clerk receives no fees in cash except such as parties are willing to pay him; generally such as are for services done out of court, and he is compelled to make good to the United States all sums, whether due by paupers, non-residents, insolvents, or others—a course of injustice which I hope will be removed by this bill.

The Senator has been misinformed. A great deal has been said to the prejudice of this officer, but I recollect a friend from Georgia said he never had rendered his accounts as required by law. In order to meet that, I have in my drawer an account of the receipts of the office as rendered by him in his accounts, regularly. I hope there will be no objection to this, which is really necessary for the very simplest purposes of justice.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Maryland did not understand me as making any objection as to that.

Mr. PEARCE. I did not.

Mr. HALE. I referred to a remark made by the Senator from Georgia three or four years ago; and, if I recollect, he made the statement, in the form I put it, as an interrogatory.

Mr. PEARCE. He was mistaken.

Mr. HALE. I do not know the clerk, and do not know what his name is, and have never seen him, and have no sort of knowledge upon the matter. I simply put the inquiry for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on an amendment of the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HALE. I wish to record my vote against the bill, and I ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Blyler, Bragg, Bright, Cameron, Cassiady, Chalmers, Claiborne, Clifton, Fish, Gales, Hammond, Humphreys, Iverson, Latham, Phelps, Powell, Rice, Selden, Thompson, Wigfall, and Yates.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durbin, Fitzpatrick, Fox, Grimes, Hale, Hamilton, Harlan, Bismarck, Brewster, King, Sumner, Van Eyck, Wade, and Watkins—18.

So the bill was passed.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 6) authorizing the enlargement of, and the construction of a branch to, the Louisville and Portland canal. The joint resolution, as originally introduced by Mr. POWELL, authorized the president and directors of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, with the revenues and credits of the company, to enlarge the canal, and to construct a branch canal from a suitable point on the south side of the main canal to a point on the Ohio river, opposite Sand Island, sufficient to pass the largest class of steam vessels navigating the Ohio river.

The Committee on Commerce reported the joint resolution, with an amendment to insert at the end of it, the following provisions:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize said president and directors, directly or indirectly, to use or pledge the faith or credit of the United States for the said enlargement or construction of said canal, as previously declared that the Government of the United States shall not be in any manner liable for said enlargement and construction.

Mr. POWELL. I ask that the report of the committee with reference to the resolution be read.

Mr. WADE. I have just received some resolutions of the Legislature of Ohio on the same subject, which I ask may now be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, First, That the commercial interests of the Ohio valley imperatively demand the enlargement and enlargement of the Louisville and Portland canal; and that the property already invested in said canal by the United States Government is a public benefit, until the works can be enlarged and extended.

Second, That the Senators and Representatives from Ohio to the Congress of the United States be earnestly requested to procure an appropriation by said Congress adequate to the exigency of the case, and to adopt such measures as they may deem expedient for the completion of said canal.

Third, That the Governor of Ohio is hereby requested to forward to any such resolutions to the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States.

RICHARD C. PARSONS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ROBERT C. KIRK,
President of the Senate.

Passed March 10, 1860.

Mr. WADE. The resolutions may as well lie on the table, as the subject is reported upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report called for by the Senator from Kentucky.

The Secretary read the following report, made by the committee on or on the 8th of March:

The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the "bill in relation to the Louisville and Portland canal," and also the "joint resolution authorizing the enlargement of, and the construction of a branch to, the Louisville and Portland canal," beg leave to report:

This said canal was constructed under a charter from the State of Kentucky, granted in 1825, and completed in 1830, at a cost of $1,019,777.00. That the capital stock of said company is divided into ten thousand shares, of $100 each. That the United States, by subscription, is entitled to two thousand nine hundred and two of these shares, which cost the Government the sum of $235,500.

That upon these shares the Government has received, as dividends, the sum of $257,778, a sum greater than the original cost of the shares owned by it. By an act of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, passed on February 15th, 1856, the president and directors of said company were authorized to sell out the stock held by individuals in the United States, at about half the value of the shares, and, in further, to appropriate the net income of the canal to the purchase of stock belonging to individuals, instead of making any such appropriation to the shareholders. It is to be noted by said directors that the work belonging to others in the canal system is not to be sold; and that the shares of the canal should be so purchased, that the shares transferred to the United States, upon condition that the United States should only receive the net income of the canal in repairs and pay all necessary superintendence, custody, and expense, and make all necessary improvements to any expenditure of money, or the Government's interest; and, further, to protect the interests of commerce.

The directors have, as it appears, under the authority of said act, sold and now hold in the United States, and ninety-three shares of the capital stock of said company, with the shares owned by the United States Government, to the directors, and the Government, to complete the full number of the shares in the capital stock of the said company.

That the committee that the enlargement of the canal, and the construction of a branch thereof, as contemplated in the proposed joint resolution, would be of great commercial advantage; and that the proposed improvement will not, and cannot, under the amendment to said resolution which the committee propose, subject the General Government to any expenditure of money, or the Government's liability on account thereof, the committee respectfully report back said proposed joint resolution, with an amendment, and recommend its adoption; and ask the Government to be further consideration of the bill referred to them in reference to the same subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Fessenden in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce, to add as a proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the said president and directors, directly or indirectly, to use or pledge the faith or credit of the United States for the said enlargement or construction of said canal, as previously declared that the Government of the United States shall not be in any manner liable for said enlargement and construction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have an amendment to offer that I understand will not be objected to by the gentleman having the resolution in charge. It is to insert, as a further proviso:

Provided, further, That when said canal is enlarged, and the branch canal constructed, and the cost of said improvements paid for, no more tolls shall be collected than an amount sufficient to keep the canal in repair and pay for all necessary superintendence and management.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended; and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAY. I did not observe that the resolution was on its third reading. I intended to ask for the yeas and nays on its passage. Has it passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator addressed the Chair before he passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator addressed the Chair, but the Chair did not hear me. I hope, by unanimous consent, the question will be allowed to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will treat it as not having passed. Now, upon the passage of the resolution, the Senator asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to debate the question; but I ask for the yeas and nays, because this resolution involves an important principle.

The joint resolution is not objectionable to the objections which may be preferred against most of such measures—that they propose to appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States. This does not do so. Guarded, as it is, by the amendments which have been adopted, it restricts the use of the money to the enlargement of the canal, the Senator asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to debate the question; but I ask for the yeas and nays, because this resolution involves an important principle. The joint resolution is not objectionable to the objections which may be preferred against most of such measures—that they propose to appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States. This does not do so. Guarded, as it is, by the amendments which have been adopted, it restricts the use of the money to the enlargement of the canal, the Senator asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to debate the question; but I ask for the yeas and nays, because this resolution involves an important principle. The joint resolution is not objectionable to the objections which may be preferred against most of such measures—that they propose to appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States. This does not do so. Guarded, as it is, by the amendments which have been adopted, it restricts the use of the money to the enlargement of the canal, the Senator asks for the yeas and nays.

Now I prefer to cede this entire work, or all the stock of the United States, to the State of Kentucky. Such was the proposition of the bill of the Senator from Ohio, who is not now here. [Mr. POOL.] but a majority of the committee, in accordance with the wishes, as it was understood, of the Representatives of the State of Kentucky, adopted the proposition which is now before the Senate. I am opposed to it on the score of principle. I apprehend that if the revenues derived from the tolls should be insufficient to effect this work, we shall be called hereafter to make an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. It is certainly an improvement that I do not think can inure to the advantage of the Government of the United States. I do not suppose the Government will ever derive any tolls from it. I do not see why the Government should be further connected with it. I ask for the yeas and nays, because I wish to record my vote against it and to test the principle.

Mr. HALE. I am in favor of the joint resolution, but before I vote I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he is in favor of the amendment. I desire to know whether it does not compromise the rights of private stockholders?

Mr. BRIGHT. No, sir.

Mr. CLAY. There are only five of them, owning five shares of $100 each.

Mr. BRIGHT. The object of my amendment was simply to provide that, after the work contemplated by the joint resolution shall have been finished, no more tolls shall be levied on the commerce of the Ohio river than are absolutely necessary to keep the work in repair and pay for superintendence. I am not opposed to the amendment was necessary, because the law transferring the canal made that provision; but I thought that, to make it more plain, I would offer that as an amendment to this resolution, and I was glad that my friend from Kentucky assented to its adoption. There is one other amendment I should like to have made, but I found there was objection to it and I did not offer it. It was to place the work under the control of the President or Secretary of the Treasury; but I found on inquiry that it would be likely to involve the interest of the State of Kentucky, and they will have no meeting of the Legislature there for two years to come, and I forego the privilege of offering it. I did not approve of all the provisions of the joint resolution, and would much have preferred a new canal on the Indiana shore. I have struggled for that for seven years, but have despaired of ever getting it; and now I look on this as perhaps the only means of getting an enlargement of the canal, and thereby providing for a commerce that has been taken for years far beyond what it ought to have been.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, being a member of the committee to which this measure was referred, and being opposed to it, it is, perhaps, proper that I should state to the Senate the effect of my opposition to this bill. When the Louisville and Portland canal was built, the Government was a subscriber, I think, to the extent of $233,000. It turned out to be a very profitable work. Fifteen or twenty years ago an arrangement was made, under a law of Kentucky, by which they acquired the property of the Government, and appropriated all the tolls, as well as those due to private stockholders as to the Government, for the purpose of making it wind up itself. In other words, they agreed, I think, to pay the individual stockholders from one hundred and forty to one hundred and seventy-five dollars a share, at different periods, to be paid out of the proceeds of the canal, and, in the meantime, they determined to give the Government nothing on its two hundred and thirty-three shares. The individual shares, as they were paid off from time to time by the sale, were conveyed to the directors in trust, with the intent that finally no more tolls should be levied than were necessary to keep up the canal. That has gone on until the whole of the stock of private stockholders has been paid off. The Government has, and I think these five shares have been actually paid for out of the proceeds; but they are still held by the five directors, so as to enable them to control the concern. The Government is the legal holder, without having the least power over it, but the face of the canal, as they have the control of the property, for which nearly a million of dollars has been paid. Of this the Government originally paid $233,000; but, by some action, the number of its shares, originally two thousand three hundred and thirty, has been increased, probably to twenty-nine hundred. These five persons have constituted themselves directors, by the holding of one share each, though they have no real interest, and nothing but a sham interest. While the concern is worth $1,000,000, they, having an interest of only $500, control it, by virtue of the holding of a share in conformity with the charter, to enable them to be directors.

From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to us, it seems that they deny any authority of the Government of the United States, except its right as a stockholder. The directors do not, technically own a majority of the stock, the directors being trustees for the stock that has been paid off by the proceeds of the canal—the Government interest as well as that of private stockholders. The private stockholders have been fully paid off, but these persons holding in trust have the canal, and have bid defiance to the Government for ten or fifteen years, or rather denied its authority.

Now, I am willing to say the whole thing was wrong; the Government ought never to have put its money in doing the canal, the inevitable result of appropriation of Government money to any such purpose, which I have frequently elaborated in this body; and this is only another illustration of it. If it is a good thing, it is taken away from the Government; if it is a bad thing, the expense is added on the Government.

Some of us were very anxious, in committee, to give this canal to Kentucky, or anybody that would take it; but the gentlemen will not take it. I believe those members of the committee who were opposed to this bill were unanimously in favor of giving the canal away; but they will neither let us sell it, nor give it away to anybody; but they insist that we shall stand stockholder. While this bill only enables them to borrow money on the tolls, we all know the effect of it will be, when they run in debt and put the tolls down so that they will not pay, the Government, as the holder of the stock, will be called upon to pay.

I warn you of that from the previous history of this work. Since I have been a member of the public councils, since they entered on this policy, the Representatives from Kentucky on the one branch, and of the other States of the Northwest, who had an interest in it, (even when it was going on, and was, by the operation of the act, to have wound itself up in 1833,) in 1846, 1847, and 1848, were continually insisting that we should pay for it in advance of the tolls winding up. I think they once got it into a bill; probably it was in the internal improvement bill, vetoed by Mr. Polk. At all events, I know it was once in a bill. They determined, though the tolls had not paid for it, that we should pay for it. Now they will go on and borrow money, and then they will say the Government has more power over it than I have; and both the Senators from Kentucky know it. It simply holds the legal title, for the purpose—if these men run it in debt, and do not choose to charge tolls enough—to make the Government pay. For the Government, I am opposed to it; and that is the whole operation of it. It is for the Government to hold the legal title, and to allow five gentlemen, who elect themselves directors, having each of them an interest of $100 apiece, and I do not know whether they hold that the trust or in their own right—to govern the thing, please; to borrow money on the tolls, and, doubtless, when they get in debt, they will expect the Government to pay it. I am willing to give the canal to Kentucky; we ought never to have put our money in it. I am willing it shall go, but they do not want it.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, the Louisville and Portland canal was constructed under a charter granted by the Kentucky Legislature in 1835. It was completed in December, 1836. In 1837 the stockholders of the shares, which were except $233,500, which was subscribed by the United States in pursuance of acts of Congress. From 1834 to 1842, the United States received in cash, as dividends derived from the tolls on this canal, $275,178, or $24,278 more than she had put out for the canal. There were no other improvements in that region of country because the canal was owned by a private corporation; and the people living upon the banks of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and all those who were interested in the commerce of those rivers thought, and thought properly, that state of things ought not to continue. In obedience to the wishes of the people, and in order to unfetter commerce and make this canal free, the Legislature of Kentucky, in 1842, so amended the charter as to allow the tolls arising from the canal to be applied to the purchase of the stock held by private individuals. That amendment to the charter provided that when all the private stock should be purchased up with those tolls, the canal should be transferred to the United States, upon the condition that the United States should make all the improvements, enlargements, and, indeed, perform the conditions that were incumbent on the president and directors of the company under the original charter, namely, to keep it in a condition sufficient to pass the boats navigating the Ohio river.

Under that amended charter, which was accepted, the tolls were applied to the purchase of the private stock, and about the year 1855 all the private stock was purchased, except five shares, which were necessary to be held by individuals, in order to keep the corporation in existence. In 1856 the president and directors of the company notified the Secretary of the Treasury that, in a very short time, all the private stock would be taken, and they asked the Government to take charge of the canal upon condition that it should improve it, and so enlarge it as to improve the demand for the commerce of the Ohio river. The Government refused, or at least failed to do so. The Secretaries of the Treasury, from that time to this, have occasionally mentioned the matter in their reports; but no action has been taken on the subject. Congress will not legislate and will not take the canal; I suppose, for fear that they will be asked for additional sums to enlarge it.

Congress not doing anything in the matter, in 1857 the Kentucky Legislature again amended the charter. It was found, after the canal was completed, that it was wholly inadequate for the passage of the large class of steamers now plying on the Ohio river, and that it was not wide enough. At the time of its construction it was large enough to pass the boats then on the river; but the improvements in steamboats were such, that in a very few years it was apparent that it was not sufficient for the demands of commerce. Indeed, from the statement that I have before me, it is evident that not more than one half the tonnage on the river can pass through this canal. This is a very great injury to the commerce in another way, for the boats which it is necessary to construct in order to pass through the locks on the canal, are not constructed with a due regard to hydrostatic laws, and consequently they do not run so rapidly. It is stated in a report which I have before me, made by men eminent for their ability in all commercial matters, at Cincinnati, Louisville, and New Orleans, that it takes about six hundred tons now requires ten days to pass from the city of New Orleans to the city of Louisville, and consuming five hundred cords of wood in the journey; whilst a boat properly constructed could carry a thousand tons, and make the trip in four days. If the canal was enlarged, as it was in 1857, as I have said, Congress failing to do anything in the matter, the Legislature of Kentucky amended the charter, by the passage of an act in these words:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the charter of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company be so amended as to authorize said company to construct, with the revenues and on the credit of the corporation, a branch canal sufficient to pass the largest class of steam vessels navigating the Ohio river; and said company are hereby vested with all the powers and authorities necessary to acquire the land, to construct said branch, and to construct the same, vested by the charter and amendments, for the construction of the original canal, and the branch canal, and the enlargement of the amendments shall, and are hereby, made as applicable to the branch as to the original canal."

It is to meet the provisions of this amendment of the charter, that the present proposition is made. The United States virtually owns nearly the whole of this canal, as the matter now stands; for there are only five shares of stock held by the directors. Under the provisions of the amended charter of 1842, the president and the directors purchased the shares of the private stockholders, and now five shares; the Government of the United States originally held two thousand nine hundred and two. These, with the five shares held by the directors, make up the ten thousand shares which represent the original cost of the canal.

This resolution can, I think, be obnoxious to none of the objections urged by the honorable Senator from Georgia. I think he need have no fear that we shall come back here and ask the Congress of the United States for any money. I would not quarrel with him if he were to think that the only improvement in this broad river and on any river, lake, or harbor, that has been made by a tax on commerce. The United States Government paid $233,500 originally, but she has received in tolls collected on the tonnage of the Ohio river $24,278 more than she ever paid; and she has caused to be purchased in trust for her seven thousand and ninety-three of the shares held by private individuals in this canal; purchased, not with money paid out of the Treasury of the United States, but with money derived from the tolls collected on the vessels passing through the canal.

All we ask now is, that you allow us to go on and use the revenues and credit of the canal to enlarge it so as to make it of sufficient size to pass the boats that now navigate the Ohio. I am sure that a very small sum would be sufficient to satisfy the constitutional scruples of those who are the strictest in their construction. I think it would fully meet the views contained in the very able message of the President of the United States, which was read before this body a short time ago, in relation to internal improvement. We do not ask the Government to allow us to do anything else than to use the revenues arising from the taxes on the commerce of the river for the completion of the canal.

The Senator from Georgia says that the direct-

it would have been totally abandoned. They have held this stock merely for the preservation of the work, and are going on, as well as they can do in the almost impotent condition in which they are placed, to make the necessary and proper enlargements and improvements. That is the state of the case.

This resolution proposes now that you, as the legal holder of the property, and the beneficial owner of the property, too, will allow the tolls gathered still on the canal to be applied to the improvement—it is all, and to compensate themselves forever from the burden of future taxation when the work is accomplished. Gentlemen propose to cede it to Kentucky as the best disposition that can be made of it. I should like to see that disposition made; but it ought not to be made at present, because the Legislature of Kentucky will not be assembled for two years, and can take no charge and management over the canal, and the works now in progress for its improvement and completion until that time; and, of course, those works must be suspended if that be now done. I should hope that, at expiration of two years, or when the Legislature can take an active and efficacious charge over the property by legislation, this Government will transfer it to the State of Kentucky. It has been already reimbursed; and I know of no investment it ever made that has been so profitable.

If you choose to avail yourself of it as an individual, what have you got? You have got over twenty thousand dollars more than you put in as stock, in money paid into your Treasury. You have gained twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars, and you own the canal, worth $1,000,000. You have made $1,000,000, counting as an individual would count, out of this investment. But you would not seize upon that property, and use it for the purpose of perpetuating the tax upon the Ohio river. I need not say it would be according to the policy or temper of this Government.

I hope that those gentlemen who propose to cede it to the State of Kentucky will defer that proposition until the State of Kentucky can act upon the grant. I am not in favor of it, in point of constitutionality, to this measure. If, as the gentleman from Georgia supposes, the original investment was unconstitutional, can it be unconstitutional in the most prudent manner to get rid of that investment? That is in the power of the House. Those who think it unconstitutional ought to be in the most haste, I think, to get the Government out of that condition, and to do this prudently, without sacrifice or without loss, either to its own particular interest or to the general public interest. Sir, I have no more to say.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am one of those referred to by my friend from Kentucky who consider the original act without warrant of the Constitution. I think the United States had no right to be a stockholder in an internal improvement that is made within the limits of the State; had no right to be the beneficiary of tolls levied within the limits of a State. That is my conviction. I supposed my friend knew that. Therefore I have been in favor of, and some fifteen years ago, in the other House, made a proposition, that the United States should also object to the State of Kentucky, thus reducing the capital stock, with the condition that the tolls should be reduced pro rata. I have been willing since, when the accruing dividends, to which the Senator has referred, were invested in stock, so as to make the United States really the owner of the canal, to transfer it to Kentucky wholly on the simple condition that no higher tolls or charges should be imposed upon vessels using the canal than were necessary for its enlargement and to keep it in repair. I think we are invading the soil and jurisdiction of Kentucky by holding that work as the property of the United States. I have no fear that Kentucky would not administer it, not only in accordance with her own interests, but with those who have joint rights in navigating that important tributary of the Mississippi river of our country. I prefer that she should be the owner of the canal entirely, that she should make such enlargement and improvement as she may think proper; and we all know that enlargement is needed; that the increased size of the boats navigating that river requires that the canal should not only be deepened, but that it should be lengthened. The growing commerce and the improvement of vessels has led to a class of boats not suited to the locks as when the canal was constructed.

I concur, therefore, in all that is said of the importance of the work and the necessity for its enlargement. My objection is, that the United States should be connected with it at all. It is within the limits of the State of Kentucky, under her jurisdiction, and should belong to her. If, however, the Congress do not choose thus to transfer the canal to the State of Kentucky, I consider the joint resolution, as amended and offered by my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. POWELL,) far better than the present condition. It is better that the accruing dividends should be expended for the enlargement of the canal, so as to adapt it to the commerce of that great tributary, than that they should be accumulating for no use. I think it is better than the present condition, though it does not get rid of the constitutional difficulty entirely; and I would very much prefer to have the canal transferred to the State of Kentucky, no far as the interest of the United States is concerned, without any other consideration than the obligation that tolls should not be raised beyond the amount necessary for its enlargement and repair.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I should desire to see that resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I know how difficult it is for one hastily coming to the consideration of a subject to decide on all the reasons which may have governed the action of the committee by whom a measure has been matured. I will not venture, for that and other considerations, to offer an amendment. The committee may have had views which do not occur to me. Though I have often reflected on this subject, and at various times during my congressional service I have had to consider it, there may be considerations with which I am not familiar. I will abstain, therefore, from interfering with the resolution, merely stating the preferences I have for a different course, and my objections to this.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Senator from Ohio, (Mr. PENCZ,) who is detained by indisposition, has the honor to refer the consideration of it, if I have paired off with him, and therefore cannot vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Braggman, Bigler, Bright, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Colburn, Crittenden, Dixon, Durkee, Fish, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Lane, Pearson, Phelps, Seymour, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wigfall, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bragg, Brown, Chenoit, Clay, Clissold, Davis, Evans, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Lothrop, Mayne, Rice, and Toombs—14.

So the joint resolution was passed.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. WADE. I move now to take up the homestead bill.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor.) The Chair will state to the Senators that under the rules of the Senate, it is the imperative duty of the Chair to call up that bill as the special order, and it is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill, with a view to proceed to the consideration of congressional bills.

Mr. WADE. I wish to get it up, so that it may stand as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. MASON. It is up, I understand.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is no motion required for taking it up; it is up.

Mr. WADE. To-morrow is private bill day. I move to make the homestead bill the special order for Monday.

Mr. MASON. It is not improbable—indeed, I think more probable—that we shall have an executive session will not last beyond an hour, and the Senator then can have his bill before the Senate.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire whether, if the Senate should go into an executive session will change the position of business as it is?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. MASON. I would say to the Senate, that there is a matter in executive session which must be transacted to-day, or the public interests will materially suffer.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion of Mr. MASON was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 15, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. THOMAS H. STRECKTON. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the adverse report of the Court of Claims on the petition of George W. Munday, administrator of E. W. Ripley, deceased; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

VIRGINIA LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. MILLSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A joint resolution declaring the construction of the act entitled "An act making further provisions for the satisfaction of Virginia land warrants," approved 31st August, 1852.

NAVIGATION OF PATAPSCO RIVER.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill for reference only.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. This bill will take but a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Very well. Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, then, by unanimous consent, introduced an act for continuing and completing the improvement of the navigation of the Patapsco river, and to render the port of Baltimore accessible to the war steamers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CLERGYMEN OF THE CITY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask leave to introduce some resolutions, to which, I am sure, there will be no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman will not object to the resolutions when he hears them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will not object to this; but I will object to anything further out of order.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let the resolutions be read, that their character may be known.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the House be hereby tendered to those clergymen of the District of Columbia who have attended the daily sessions, and opened the same with prayer.

Resolved, That the Clerk pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, the salary of the annual salary of a Chaplain of the House pro rata according to the time they have performed the duties of that office.

Mr. RUFFIN. I object, and I would like to have an opportunity to state my objections.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I will—

Mr. SCOTT. I would ask the gentleman from Maine—

Mr. RUFFIN. I thought I had the floor to state my objection.

THE SPEAKER. The resolutions have not been received.

Mr. RUFFIN. Well, I object to their reception.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state to the House, and to gentlemen, that if they will give way, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order, which is the consideration of the amendments of our rules, and amend those rules in the way the committee on the revision of the rules recommend, they will all have an opportunity to present their reports next Monday.

RAMUEL J. HENKLEY.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask leave of the House to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Samuel J. Hensley, for the purpose of reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Leave was granted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would state that, until the consular appropriation, upon which the main question was ordered yesterday, is disposed of, that motion is not in order. I move to take up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The bill will be taken up. The first question is upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any of the amendments except the last one, which was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] I think it is totally inoperative, and if it is insisted on, let it be put in its proper place in the bill, and not at the end of it.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

Page 3, after line twenty-four, insert:
For compensation of interpreter to mission to Japan, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was read, as follows:
Page 3, after the word "countries," in line thirty-six, strike out the words "one hundred and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "two hundred;" so that the clause shall read:

For the relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment was to add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That the sum of $150,000, appropriated for running and marking the lines between the United States and British possessions, located within the territory, shall be so expended as to put an end to the work.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERGYMEN OF THE CITY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have, upon conference with several gentlemen, agreed to withdraw one of the resolutions I before offered, and to which objection was made, and to offer the other. I ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the House be hereby tendered to those clergymen of the District of Columbia who have attended the daily sessions and opened the same with prayer.

Mr. RUFFIN. I have no objection to that. The reason why I objected to the other resolution was that when these clergymen of the District of Columbia proposed to officiate here as clergymen, in opening the House with prayer, they were allowed the benefits of the Congressional Library, and they expressly said, or their representatives were upon the floor said, they would not receive any compensation for their services. They wanted the House distinctly to understand that fact. That was the reason, in part, I have no doubt, which induced the House to adopt that system. I think it was a good system, and I think they were amply repaid by giving them the benefits of the Congressional Library. There are, I think, about forty of them, and upon an average, they would not have to open the House with prayer more than two or three times a session, and they would not have to officiate here on the Sabbath more than once in two years during the sessions of Congress. For that reason, I objected to the resolution proposing to pay these gentlemen. I have no objection to the resolution of thanks.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire simply to say, that if the resolution were before the House, I could respond very readily, as I conceive, to the gentleman from North Carolina; but as it is not, it will not take time to reply to his remarks.

The resolution was then agreed to.

MICHIGAN CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider the special order—the proposed amendment of the rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have a report to make from the Committee of Elections, which takes precedence of the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion of the gentleman from Maine, as it relates to the special order, takes precedence.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, will the gentleman from Maine give way for a moment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to allow further time to take testimony in the case of William A. Howard, contestant for the seat of John B. Cowan, to represent the first congressional district of Michigan in this House, as asked by the sitting member.

I submit the report of the majority of the committee, who, accompanying dissenters, and move that they be printed, and that the resolution be assigned for Tuesday next, at two o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It is a question of privilege, and may be called up at any time.

Mr. CAMPBELL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARTRELL. I suppose the minority report will also be received and printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly. Leave was granted to the minority of the committee to present their views, and an order was made to print the same.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am also instructed by the Committee of Elections to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That William A. Howard have leave to occupy a seat upon the floor of this House, pending the discussion of the motion of the gentleman from Maine, in the case of his contest for the seat now occupied by Giovanni B. Cowan, from the first congressional district of Michigan, and that he have leave to speak to the merits of said contest and to the report thereon.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move now that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. Before the gentleman submits that motion, I wish to move that the special assignment of one o'clock to-day—contested case of Williamson vs. SICKLES—be postponed till one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I suggest to the gentleman that, as that is a privileged question, he can call it up at any time. An assignment of an election case is wholly unnecessary. He can simply give notice to the House when he will call it up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the power to call up the report at any time.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of the rule; but I think the special assignment had better be postponed till to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. BURNETT. To-morrow is private bill day, and I object to fixing this matter for to-morrow. The gentleman can call it up at any time.

Mr. DAWES. You will have Friday and Saturday for private bills, and this will take but an hour.

Mr. GARTRELL. I desire to appeal to my colleague on the Committee of Elections, if he insists on assigning this report to a particular day, that he shall assign it to Tuesday next week—say Tuesday of next week. The report has only just been printed and sent in, and it would be almost impossible to prepare an argument or investigate the case as its merits require earlier than that day. I hope the gentleman will consent to postpone it till Tuesday next.

Mr. DAWES. There is already one special assignment from the Committee of Elections for Tuesday. Saturday is private bill day, as well as Friday; and Monday is resolution day, and you cannot interfere with that. I think that, by to-morrow, everybody can consider the report. It is not a short report. These parties ought to have this matter decided. It is a preliminary question, and not one of the merits of the case. I agree, and I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to considering it to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. FLORENCE. I must object. To-morrow will be the first objection day we shall have had this session.

Mr. GARTRELL. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Then I insist on my motion.

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor, and I make the motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor only by the permission of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has made his motion, and mine takes precedence of his.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the gentleman's motion does not give precedence to his. I think there can be no higher question of privilege than the one which I make; and I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has the floor if he insists upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Yes, I insist on my motion, as the gentleman from Massachusetts would gain nothing by his motion. He can call up the report at any time.

Mr. DAWES. Then I give notice that I shall call up this question at the time of the special assignment for to-day for the purpose of submitting the motion to postpone.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion; and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STANTON in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order—being a report of the select committee appointed for the revision of the rules.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to say, in the first place, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], that I had no desire, in pressing my motion, to prevent him from having the earliest action on the question which he has presented; but I conceived that a good deal of the time of the House might be expended in the discussion of the motion to postpone; and I am anxious that, if possible, we shall get through with this subject of the rules to-day; that such amendments as we may deem to be agreed upon, and that we may not hereafter under the amended rules. For I am satisfied that, if we carry into execution the amendments proposed, we shall save at least one day in every week—that is, we shall do more business in five months than we can do, under the rules as at present, in six months.

Mr. DAWES. I have no desire to interfere with the arrangement which the gentleman from Maine has in his mind about these rules. I only want to say, that I am not prepared to give sanction of the report of the Committee of Elections, in reference to the New York contested-election case.

Mr. BRANCH. This discussion about an election case is not in order in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees not to see how a question of that sort is in order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There is no question before the committee about postponing an election case.

Mr. DAWES. I am not going to make any motion, but I think the House that I shall call up the case on Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee.

Mr. DAWES. I am perfectly aware of that. I have the floor, by the consent of the gentleman from Maine, to make a statement to the House, that on Saturday, at one o'clock, I will call up this question of the New York contested-election case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, you know very well that there has been great complaint in the House, growing out of the obstructions to business under the rules. Undoubtedly the rules need amendment, and need it to correct the practices of the House under the rules as they exist, rather than the rules themselves. It has been supposed, and I have heard it stated by many of the older members of the House—I recollect that this was stated by Mr. Stephens, of Georgia—that, in his opinion, our rules were very near the perfection of human wisdom; that all that was required for the speedy and intelligent transaction of the public business before the House, was that the rules should be observed. It has certainly not escaped your observation, Mr. Chairman, that nearly all the business transacted by the House is done through the good nature of members, outside the rules of the House, by unanimous consent. We are in the habit of giving consent so often to the transaction of business outside the rules, that very little is done under them.

The labors of the committee having this subject in charge, have been confined principally to those amendments which may have a tendency to bring the House more to an observance of its rules in the transaction of business.

Now, sir, I will state very briefly and concisely the amendments we have reported; and I will say that all these amendments have received the unanimous consent of the committee; that nearly all of them were reported in a report of the committee on the subject at the last session, and received the unanimous consent of that committee, on which was Mr. Speaker Orr, of the last Congress.

The first proposition is to amend rule 4, by inserting after the fourth "required," in the eighth line, the words, "by at least one-fifth of a quorum of the members," and by striking out the last three lines; so that it will read:

Questions shall be distinctly put to the question, to wit: "As many as are of opinion that," (as the question may be) "yes;" and after the affirmative vote is taken. "As many as are of the contrary opinion, say, no." If the Speaker shall find a division he shall call for the yeas and nays from those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and afterwards those in the negative. If the Speaker shall doubt a correct vote, he shall call for the yeas and nays from a quorum of the members, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the members in the affirmative and negative; and the Speaker shall report, he shall rule and state the decision in the House.

This is substantially the old rule, but is brought into smaller compass, and is stated with more perspicuity.

Mr. BRANCH. I ask the gentleman from Maine whether he proposes to put these rules on their passage at this time?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do; and I will state the course which I propose to pursue, by the consent of the committee. I propose to go through with the general principles of the amendments, and then ask that they shall be read by the Clerk, and that the vote shall be taken on the aggregate upon such amendments as no objection shall have been made to. But if any member shall desire a separate vote upon any particular amendment, he will indicate by rising, and it shall be considered separately. We can then take up such a separate vote as has been desired upon, one by one, discuss them, and amend them as the committee may think fit, and so dispose of the subject. I ask the unanimous consent of the committee that that course may be taken.

Mr. REAGAN. I think we had better take a little time to look into these rules, and consider them, before we adopt the course the gentleman from Maine proposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will say to the gentleman from Texas, that many of these amendments are merely changes in form, and in which there can be no objection whatever. I had supposed that, after hearing a general explanation of the amendments proposed, and then, after hearing them read by the Clerk, each member would be able to see that to many of these amendments there can be no objection; and that it would be well enough to allow the vote to be taken upon such amendments in the aggregate, and afterwards take up separately the other amendments for discussion and amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he allow this subject to lie over for a day or two. This report has just been printed, and it is impossible to so amend this report as to perfect it without taking a little time to consider it. There are rules, I have no doubt, which ought to be amended; but I think there will not be any more amendments proposed for the question for a day or two. If we are to make amendments, we ought to do it understandingly; and it will be impossible to do so here to-day. If I could have the report before me, with an opportunity of spending an evening in looking it over, I should be prepared to act upon them, but I am not prepared to do so this morning. There left my copy of the rules at my room, and I presume many of the other members are in the same condition. If the gentleman from Maine will consent to have this subject postponed for three or four days, or for any time which the gentleman will name, he will enable us to act upon the subject in a more satisfactory manner.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama, that this report has been some two weeks ago; that it has been printed for about a week, and has been in the document-room, where any member could obtain it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood that it had just come in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No, sir; it has been printed and in the document-room for a week; and I gave notice to the House yesterday that the subject would come up for consideration to-day.

Now, sir, without asking the House to agree to a plan which I have proposed in reference to the manner of acting upon these amendments, I will go on with the explanation which I propose to make; and I imagine the gentleman from Alabama will have no difficulty in understanding the purpose of every amendment as it is read, without asking for any further explanation.

The second amendment which the committee have recommended, is to insert in rule 6, after the word "Hall," in the third line, the words, "and the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House. He shall have a right to dispose of any member in the Chair; but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment."

The Speaker shall examine and correct the Journal before it is read. He shall have a general direction of the Hall; he shall have the custody of the keys to the rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House. He shall have a right to dispose of any member in the Chair; but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

That involves no change in the rules; it simply incorporates rule 147 into rule 6.

The third proposition is to strike out all of rule 14, and insert in lieu thereof:

There shall be elected at the commencement of each Congress, to continue in office until their successors are appointed, a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster, each of whom shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and ability, and to the satisfaction of the House; and the appointees of the Doorkeeper and Postmaster shall be subject to the approval of the Speaker; and, if there elected by the House of its officers, the vote shall be taken vice versa.

Mr. Chairman, this rule embraces rules 72, 73, 74, and 21, all of which will be stricken out. All the changes in reality which are made, are the substitution of the words "and the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House" for the words "and the unappropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House." That amendment was agreed on by the committee of the last House of Representatives preceding this one. It was thought to be a proper one by the committee of this session, and it was unanimously agreed to. Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to suggest that it would be, perhaps, well enough to test the sense of the committee in relation to the consideration of this question to the extent to which it will give way for that purpose, I will move that this report be laid aside.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must decline to yield the floor for that purpose, for I am satisfied that we will take the time for the consideration of this report, we shall not be able to secure a revision of our rules. The report has been assigned for to-day, as a special order, and if it is waived we shall never be able to get it up again. I hope, therefore, the House will go on and consider this matter without delay.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Do I understand the gentleman from Maine as proposing to take action upon these amendments to the rules at this time, or is he merely giving his explanation of them?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am giving a general explanation of the report of the committee. After I have concluded my report, I shall have various amendments shall be taken up separately for discussion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to make the motion to pass this subject without delay?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman, then, allow me to move to postpone this subject until to-morrow?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It would not be in order to make that motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If gentlemen want to save time, I think they will do it.

Mr. GROW. I think you will save time by going on and finishing up this matter at this time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The report amendment proposed is to insert after the word "States" in the 17th rule, the words "and of the Court of Claims;" so that it will read:

No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretaries, Agents, Deputies, Presidents of the Private Secretaries, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The members of the Court of Claims are in some sort to be considered as a committee of this House, and the amendment only provides that they shall enjoy the privileges of the floor of the House, like the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Is the report of the committee now open to amendment, and are we passing from these amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Maine is now upon the floor explaining and justifying the amendments proposed by the committee of which he is chairman; and that, when he has concluded, the amendments will be taken up for action, beginning with the first of them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Then it is proposed that they shall be taken up and upon them one by one, and not that they shall all be considered and acted upon en masse?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; when the gentleman has concluded, the amendments will be taken up separately, and they will separately be open to amendment and discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed. The fifth amendment provides for striking out rule 21, that rule being already provided for by the proposed amendment to rule 14.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is rule 21?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will read it; it is as follows:

"The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and ability, and to the satisfaction of the House; and the appointees of the Doorkeeper and Postmaster shall be subject to the approval of the Speaker; and, if there elected by the House of its officers, the vote shall be taken vice versa."

That is provided for by the proposed amendment to rule 14, which provides for all of the elective officers.

Mr. BRANCH. Will the gentleman from Maine inform me by what authority the House can, by its rules, provide for a Clerk continuing in office in the next Congress, when the Constitution says that each House shall elect its own officers? By what authority can we, by our rules, provide a Clerk for the Thirty-Seventh Congress? Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I will explain the gentleman's objection by saying, in the first place, that I do not understand that the report of the committee is now up for amendment; and, in the second place, that the first Congress under the Constitution, on March 1, 1791, provided for the continuance of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress as if no adjournment had taken place;" so that it will read:

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports which originated in the House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as before. If the committee had not then taken place, all bills and reports from committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session, and the House or Congress at its adjournment have taken place.

Now, sir, there is already a rule which provides that all business before the House, except such business as is before committees, at the time of the adjournment, shall be renewed at the commencement of the subsequent session; and the consequence thereof it would be, that all business of time if they should provide that bills reported at this session of Congress should come up before the same committees at the second or subsequent session, without any new reference. I will call attention of members to joint rule No. 31, as following some light on this question.

"After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress, all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

The seventh amendment proposed by the committee strikes out rule 23, and, in lieu thereof, introduces the following:

As soon as the Journal is read, and the unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment has been disposed of, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of in the following manner: The Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in their regular order, and then upon select committees; and if the Speaker shall not through the call of the House, or otherwise, before the House passes any other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving precedence to the report last under consideration. That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days, it shall be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn. On the call for reports from committees on each alternate Monday, which shall commence as soon as the Journal is read, all bills reported during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be committed, without debate, to the Committee of the Whole, and, together with the reports of the select committees, shall be taken up; the hour of the committee is not called, then, on the next alternate Monday, the select committee shall be called, and the same shall be continued until the committee is called to report. Provided, That no bill reported under the call on alternate Mondays and committed, shall be again taken up before the next Monday, or a motion to reconsider.

Rule 23 is as follows:

"As soon as the Journal is read, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of—doing which, the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in the order in which they are named in the 7th and 8th rules, and all the standing committees shall have been called on, then it shall be the duty of the Speaker to call for reports from the select committees in the order in which they are named; and if the Speaker shall not through the call of the House, or otherwise, before the House passes any other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off. That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days, it shall be in order for such committee to report further, until the other committees shall have been called in their turn."

Gentlemen will perceive that all the change contemplated is this: that on alternate Mondays one hour, after the reading of the Journal, shall be devoted to the call of committees for reports, upon which there shall be no debate, and which shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed, and which shall not be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider. We know, sir, that we do not get through with the first call of the committees for sixty or ninety days. It is now forty days since the commencement of the last session of the House, and we have not proceeded further than half way through the call of committees.

The committees have many reports which they desire to report, merely for reference to the Committee of the Whole, to be put upon the Calendar and ordered to be printed. As it is, they cannot have an opportunity to make their reports for weeks to come, and the consequence is, that the members of these committees fatigue the ear of the Speaker day after day, asking for unanimous consent for permission to admit their reports. Nearly every day, hour after hour, is occupied with these requests, asking to make reports, merely for reference to the Committee of the Whole. It often happens, too, that when a committee, on a call, makes a report upon which they do not contemplate action, some member interposes and will rise and make the length of his report upon its passage; and then, hours, and it may be days, are consumed in the disposition of a question which ought not, at this time, to have been brought before the House. In this amendment we simply propose to provide a means by which committees of this House may, upon alternate Mondays, have leave to report bills and joint resolutions upon which they do not contemplate action, and which are presented for reference merely to the Committee of the Whole, and to be ordered to be printed.

The amendment is to amend rule 25, by striking out the words "of Wisconsin," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "last organized;" so that it will read:

Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for resolutions from the members of each State and Delegate from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized, successively.

The amendment does not change the present practice of the House under the rules.

The ninth amendment proposes to amend rule 26, by inserting before the word "resolutions," in the first and seventh lines, the words "bills on leave and;" and by adding at the end the words, "and the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider;" so that it will read:

All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions on each alternate Monday during the first hour after the Journal is read, and all bills on call on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall be referred to committees under the rules of the House already provided, and the whole of said bills shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the States are called through. And the Speaker shall call for bills on leave and resolutions on each alternate Monday, and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider.

Now, sir, we have seen this morning that the time of the House is occupied on a motion to reconsider, and twenty minutes, and it would have been occupied much longer if objection had not been made, by gentlemen rising and asking leave to introduce bills for reference to appropriate committees. The committee on the revision of the rules recommend that on that day, after the reading of the Journal shall be devoted to a call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions on leave, for reference to the several committees of the House, and which shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider, so that no mischief will result, but, on the contrary, the time of the House will be economized.

The tenth amendment is to rule 30, by inserting after the word "Friday," the words "and Saturday;" and by adding at the end of the rule, "but when a bill is again rejected, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members;" so that it will read:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month, the House shall consider private bills, if any (the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day), and all bills on call on said days, of which no motion to reconsider shall be made shall be first considered and disposed of; but when a bill is again rejected, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall be again objected to by at least five members.

The operation of this amendment is to make Saturday, as well as Friday, an objection day. A large portion of the business on the Private Calendar is consumed on objection days, and the members of the House, for several years past, has been to ask, very frequently, that Saturday, by unanimous consent, shall be made objection day. And I think it was the sentiment of the last House, and of several preceding Houses, that it would be better to have one day of objection, and to have the day to the public business, if alternate Saturdays, as well as alternate Fridays, should be objection days. Two Saturdays and two Fridays in each month will be objection days, and the other two Saturdays and two Fridays will be discussion days.

And the further amendment is this: objection day, when no objection is made, a bill is laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it shall pass. Now, it often happens that a bill is objected to by a single individual, and that, if the objection is not sustained, it would be laid aside. Now this amendment contemplates, that after the Calendar has been called, and a bill has been once objected to, upon a second call of the Calendar any bill before objected to shall be laid aside as though not objected to; provided that at least five members shall not rise as objectors. It often happens that when some bill comes up, and some member who is interested desires to see it pass, it may be that some other member does not understand the merits of it, and objects to it. The member favorable to it, understanding its merits fully, feels that there can be no possible objection to it, but some other member does not understand the question as well as he does, or thinks, at any rate, that it will bear discussion and ventilation, objects to it. The member who understands the question as well, if not better, than any one else, feels a little irritation, and says, "If you object to us as plain a bill as that, I will object to the entire Calendar," and thus a whole day will be lost. I have known that, and so have you, Mr. Chairman, to be done over and over again. The committee thought, if any member could indicate a valid objection to any bill, he could sustain at least five members to second that objection; but that, if five members could not be found, who, upon their attention being called to the question, would rise and second the objection, that was a very good reason why the Calendar should not be blocked up by objection, and that all bills upon the second reading of the Calendar, though before objected to, should be laid aside as not objected to, if five members shall not then be found to second the objection.

The eleventh amendment is to rule 34, by adding to the end thereof the words, "provided further, that the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after five minutes' debate have taken place upon proposed amendments to any action of a bill, close all debate upon such section;" so that it will read:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month, the House shall consider private bills, if any, upon any question, in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a select committee shall be called upon to report. Where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendments to the bill, and the committee shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the bill, unless the committee shall be allowed to be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee: Provided further, That the House may, at any time after five minutes' debate have taken place upon proposed amendments to any action of a bill, close all debate upon such section.

I wish to consider this amendment, and I desire the committee to consider it in connection with an amendment proposed to the 19th rule, upon page 6 of the printed report, in order to fully understand the object of the amendment. The amendment to the 19th rule is as follows:

Add to the end thereof the words, "whereas a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, and such recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the committee and committee without further action by the House;"

So that it will read:

A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence over all other motions, and shall be considered equivalent to its rejection.

Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, with such recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommitted to the committee and committee without further action by the House.

Now, under the 19th rule, as it has been understood and practiced upon by this House for several years past, it is competent for the majority of the Committee of the Whole upon any bill which shall be before it, no matter how important it may be, to propose a bill appropriating millions of dollars, a bill appropriating $100,000,000 for the acquisition of Canada, or $100,000,000 for the acquisition of Cuba—no matter how important the bill may be that is before the Committee of the Whole, because, by the rules, it must go to that committee, and be considered—under the 19th rule, as it now stands, it would be competent for the majority of the Committee of the Whole, the moment the committee takes up a bill, to vote to go into the House, and close the general debate; and the majority which carries that motion, and the House terminates the general debate. The House will then resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole again, and the question is resumed again; a member of the majority in favor of the appropriation bill under consideration rises and moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Upon that motion there may be a debate of five minutes in favor, and five minutes debate in opposition to it. No further debate can be had; no amendment is then in order; the question must be taken in order, and if it is agreed to, the bill, with that amendment, is reported to the House. The committee, after the discussion of five minutes in favor and five minutes against the motion, is brought to a vote at once upon striking out the enacting clause, without further discussion, and with no opportunity for further amendment.

Well, sir, this majority, that recommends that the enacting clause be struck out, the very moment the bill is reported to the House with that recommendation, vote to disagree to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole; and then, the previous question having been called, the question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and afterwards upon its passage. So that, under the rule as now interpreted, and under the practice of the House, it is competent, in the Committee of the Whole, to vote to disagree to an amendment of any bill under consideration, and bring it into the House, and then, under the operation of the previous question, put it upon its passage at once. This is a great and flagrant abuse; and we merely propose to carry out the intention of the rule that the bill and all amendments of any bill shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole. Now, sir, we provide that where a majority in the Committee of the Whole honestly desire that a bill shall be defeated, and vote to strike out the enacting clause, and the same majority vote in the House to concur in the recommendation of the committee to strike out the enacting clause, they can do so as well as they can now. But if the majority desire that the bill should pass, but that there should be no discussion and no amendment of the bill, we say that the majority shall be done away with. The committee recommends that if the House non-concurs in striking out the enacting clause, the bill immediately, by force of that vote, shall be returned to the Committee of the Whole, and be placed upon the Calendar again. In that way, the majority of the House in its purpose to deprive members of the opportunity to speak to appropriation bills, or to propose amendments to them. For, if that course is pursued, the bill will either be defeated in the House, by the House concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause; or if the House do not concur, the bill will be sent back to the committee, to take its place again upon the Calendar.

Now it may be said that, while you are depriving the majority of this power to strike out the enacting clause, you should give them some power by which they may bring the discussion in the Committee of the Whole to a termination; by which they may finally bring the House to a vote upon bills for appropriation in the Committee of the Whole. And in order to carry out that idea, we propose this amendment to the 34th rule:

Amend rule 34, by adding at the end thereof the words, "Provided further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after five minutes debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section of the bill, close all debate upon such section;" so that it will read:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question, in the House or in committee; but a member supporting the measure under consideration, in the committee, may open and close the debate. Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member desiring to be heard in committee on the same question, or amendment, may offer—after which, any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition, and the member in support of the bill on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment. No amendment or amendment not an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee. Provided, That no member of the House may, at any time after five minutes debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section of a bill, close all debate upon such section."

Now, under this rule, as amended, it will be competent for the committee, after the general debate has concluded, and they have been in the Committee of the Whole on five minutes debate, and that five minutes debate has proved burdensome and irksome to the House, it will be competent for the majority of the Committee of the Whole to vote to rise, and ask the House for a majority vote, to terminate the debate upon the five minutes amendment, so that, if that recommendation shall pass the House, the members may return to the Committee of the Whole, and offer such amendments as they choose; but debate upon such amendments shall be closed.

In this way we thought we could remedy, as far as they could possibly be remedied by the rules, the abuses upon either side—on the one side the abuse under which you may be called to pass these important bills without any opportunity to debate them, either in committee or in the House; and on the other side by the abuse of making Buncombe five-minute speeches—not in order, in fact—upon amendments which they may offer in Committee of the Whole.

The twelfth amendment amends rule 42, by inserting after the word "commenced," in line fifth, the words, "and before the main question is ordered to be put;" so that it will read:

Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse "him," and he may exercise a similar privilege at any time made before the House divides, or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced, and before the main question is ordered to be put, and the question shall then be taken without debate.

This amendment requires that all motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the main question is ordered to be put. That matter explains itself, and I presume no one will object.

The thirtieth amendment amends rule 50, by striking out all after "January 14, 1840," in the tenth line, and inserting, in lieu thereof, "but its only effect, if a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the House to a vote upon such motion."

Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed, as though no motion for the previous question had been made. A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no quorum is present;" so that it will read:

"The previous question shall be in this form: 'Shall the main question be now put?' It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and to effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and in bringing the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such debate is desired, and if the members in support of the bill prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then upon pending amendments, and then upon the debate thereon, to the order of the day. If a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the House to a vote upon such motion. Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed, as though no motion for the previous question had been made. A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no quorum is present."

This amendment has respect entirely to the previous question. In the first place, it changes the effect of the previous question when a motion to postpone is pending. Now, when a motion to postpone is pending, if the previous question is ordered, it cuts off the motion to postpone, and brings the House to a vote upon amendments, if any are pending, and then upon the order of the day of the bill, so that when there is a motion before the House to postpone, there may be an interminable debate upon it. You may not want to come to a vote upon the bill, nor to hear an endless discussion on the motion to postpone. But you cannot prevent that, unless you go to it, and incur the expense of bringing the House to a direct vote upon the bill. The amendment provides that the previous question may be applied to a motion to postpone, and shall operate no further than upon that question; so that when that motion is exhausted, you shall renew the previous question upon the third reading or the passage of a bill.

So much for the first clause of the amendment. The next clause is:

Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed, as though no motion for the previous question had been made.

That is intended to correct this evil. Now, when a question is pending before the House, and the previous question is called for, it is seconded. A majority rise and second the call. Some one calls for a division on the question, whether the main question shall be ordered. It fails. The main question is seconded, and still the main question is not ordered to be put. The result is, that the question before the House goes over to the next day, under the rules, whereas the true interpretation and true meaning of the word "second" should be simply that of a necessary formula to bring the House to a vote upon the question, whether the main question be seconded, and precisely as the rule is changed, as we propose, and the House shall, after having once seconded the call for the previous question, still refuse to order the main question to be put, the subject before the House shall be resumed as if the call for the previous question had not been made, and as if no call for the previous question had been made, instead of going over until the next day.

The last clause of the amendment is this:

A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is seconded, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no quorum is present."

That is precisely as the rule now stands, with the single exception that it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion for a call of the House after the previous question is seconded, only in case there shall appear to be upon an actual count by the House, no quorum present. A call of the House is not in order after the previous question is seconded; but it will not be, if this amendment is adopted, unless, upon an actual count by the Speaker, it shall appear that no quorum is present. In such case, it is highly proper that there should be a call of the House, that a quorum may be brought in.

The fourteenth amendment amends rule 53, by inserting, after the word "question," in the first line, the words "before or after the main question is ordered;" so that it will read:

Any member may call for the division of a question before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions, &c.

That needs no explanation, I apprehend. As the rules now stand, you cannot call for a division after the main question is ordered.

All the fifth amendment proposes to strike out all of rule 38, as follows:

"The order of the day which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment shall have the preference in the order of the day; and no motion on any other business shall be in order, without special leave of the House, until the former be resumed."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time, the question in order at the adjournment, if any, from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of, and the unfinished business of the adjournment shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

Now, Mr. Chairman, although a bill is pending at the time of adjournment, and the House is just ready to finish it, if the previous question has not been called and seconded, and no motion to recommitt is pending, the bill goes to the Speaker's table, and that is the end of it. Ordinarily, not in one case in a thousand, where a bill falls to the table, it is taken up at the next adjournment, and never be resumed in order. To prevent that result, this amendment is proposed.

The sixteenth amendment relates to the 61st rule, which is as follows:

"A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or from any of the heads of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General, or to print an extra number of any printed matter, shall be referred to a select committee, to sit at both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in the question, on the next day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be taken for consideration on the following day, together with any amendments thereto, and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be delivered to the printer."

The amendment proposes to strike out all after the word "General," in the fourth line, and to include the word "House" in the tenth line.

This amendment is rendered necessary, on account of the provisions of the printing law.

The seventeenth amendment relates to rule 67, which is:

"A frequent ass. Amos shall be appointed, to hold his office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty it shall be to attend the House during its sittings; to execute the commands of the House, and to receive and deliver the same, as such process, issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the speaker."

It proposes to strike out from the beginning to and including the word "be," in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms;" and also by inserting after the word "sittings," in the same line, the words "to aid in the enforcement of order under the direction of the Speaker;" so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to attend the House during its sittings; to aid in the enforcement of order under the direction of the Speaker; to execute the commands of the House from time to time, together with all such process issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker.

It is understood now, by custom, or some parliamentary law, that it is the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to aid the Speaker in the enforcement of order. But, that there should be no question about it, the committee thought it wise to provide for it specifically.

The eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth amendments strike out rules 72, 73, and 74, which are as follows:

"72. The Sergeant at Arms shall be sworn to keep the secrets of the House.
"73. The Doorkeeper shall be appointed for the service of the House.
"74. The Doorkeeper shall be sworn to keep the secrets of the House."

Those rules are rendered unnecessary by the proposed amendment to rule 14.

The twenty-first amendment strikes out rule 75, which is as follows:

"The Postmaster, to superintend the post office kept in the Capitol for the accommodation of its members, shall be appointed by the House."

And inserts:

The Postmaster shall superintend the post office kept in the Capitol for the accommodation of its members."

The 14th rule, if amended, will provide for the appointment or election of a Postmaster.

The twenty-second amendment amends rule 76, by striking out the word "eight," in the first line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven;" and also by striking out the word "session," in the second line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Congress," so that it will read:

Twenty-seven standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, viz:

Also, by striking out, on page 178, the words "a Committee on Engraving, to consist of three members."

In that case there will be but twenty-seven committees instead of twenty-eight. Striking out the word "session," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Congress," has the effect to provide that the committees shall be appointed for a Congress, instead of for one session, so that it will not be necessary for the Speaker, at the commencement of a second session of Congress, to name the committees anew.

The amendment further proposes to abolish the Committee on Engraving. It is proposed to transfer the duties of that committee to the Committee on Printing.

The twenty-third amendment proposes to strike out certain words from rule 78.

If gentlemen will turn to the present rules, and to the note on page 174, they will find that the words in brackets are struck out, for the reason that the Committee on Public Expenditures is now charged with the same duties with which the Committee of Ways and Means are charged by the words proposed to be stricken out.

The twenty-fifth amendment is to rule 105, and is to strike out "six," in the first line, and insert "seven" in lieu thereof. It is proposed to constitute a Committee on the Expenditures of the Interior Department, so that there will be seven committees on the expenditures in the Departments, instead of six. The Interior Department has been established since these rules were amended.

The twenty-sixth amendment is to amend rule 104, by striking out the words "there shall be appointed a standing committee of this House, to consist of three members, to be called the Committee on Engraving, to whom shall be referred, by the Clerk," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "there shall be referred, by the Clerk, to the members of the Committee on Printing, on the part of the House;" so that it will read:

There shall be referred, by the Clerk, to the members of the Committee on Printing on the part of the House all drawings, maps, charts, or other papers, which may at any time come before the House for engraving, lithographing, or publishing in any way; which committee shall report to the House whether the same ought, in their opinion, to be published; and if the House order the publication of the same, that said committee shall direct the size and manner of executing of all such engravings, drawings, or other papers, and contract by agreement, in writing, with any such engraving, lithographing, printing, drawing, and coloring, to be done by the House; and the cost of such writing, shall be furnished by said committee to the Committee of Accounts, to govern said committee in all allowances for work so done, and it shall be in order for said committee to report at all times.

The twenty-seventh amendment is to strike out rule 118, which is in these words:

"No more than three bills, originating in the House, shall be committed to the same Committee of the Whole; and any such bills shall be designated in their titles, which shall be determined by the Speaker."

The committee were none of them able to understand what that rule meant, and saw no use in retaining it. They therefore recommended that it be stricken out.

The twenty-eighth amendment is the one proposed to rule 119, which I have already explained.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to direct the attention of the gentleman from Maine to the difficulty, under this amendment, of getting a bill out of the Committee of the Whole at any time if ten determined men in Committee of the Whole insist that the bill shall be defeated, even though it may be an appropriation bill. I put it to him, if we adopt the amendment which he proposes, how a bill can ever be got out of the committee of the Whole on the part of the Union? I merely make the suggestion to him now, whilst he is pursuing his argument, that I may give him notice that when we reach that point in the amendments, I shall move an amendment so as to obviate the difficulty. I think it will be found difficult, if the amendment of the committee is adopted, to get any bill out of the Committee of the Whole on the part of the Union, even an appropriation bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. My impression is that the gentleman from Ohio has never seen the committee whatever of the House under that 118th rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I speak of the 119th rule. Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Well, in regard to that rule, the committee have done the best which they supposed it possible for them to do consistent with the right of discussion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it a little doubtful whether the 118th rule ought to be stricken out. I understood the gentleman to say the committee did not understand what the rule meant. I think the committee are very plain. It simply means that no one Committee of the Whole shall have more than three bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman will excuse me. The committee have no sort of care whatever about that rule—whether it stands or not. They can see no possible use for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a very plain rule, and I doubt very much whether it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I should like to hear some explanation of this amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The question is not now on agreeing to the amendment. The gentleman from Maine is making a general explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am simply explaining briefly the effect of the amendments recommended by the committee, and some of the reasons for those amendments.

The twenty-ninth amendment is that rule 120 be amended by adding at the end, the words "and should such recommittal take place after its engrossment, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill;" so that it will read:

After the committee and report thereon to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted, and should such recommittal take place after its engrossment, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill.

Now, sir, it is in order to recommit a bill after it has been engrossed; and in order that an engrossed bill may be amended without going through all the forms now necessary under the rules, this amendment simply provides that when an engrossed bill has been recommitted and there is an amendment reported back by the committee, the question shall be again taken on the engrossment of the bill.

The thirtieth amendment provides for the striking out of the 124th rule, which is as follows:

"It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House in resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the first Tuesday of January."

That is provided for by another rule, and is therefore unnecessary.

The thirty-first amendment is to amend rule 130, by striking out the words "all questions, whether in committee or in the House, shall be propounded in the order in which they were moved except that, so that it will read:

In filling up blanks, the largest sum and longest time shall be first put.

The rest of that is provided for by other rules.

The thirty-second amendment is to amend rule 135, by adding at the end thereof "and all debate on special orders shall be confined strictly to the measure under consideration;" so that it will read:

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made to the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide without debate whether it shall be taken up and disposed of or laid aside. Provided, That general appropriation bills, and, in time of session, bills for the relief of any individual, shall be taken up and disposed of in all bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by the committee, the question shall be in regard to them; and all debate on special orders shall be confined strictly to the measure under consideration.

Now, sir, when the House is considering appropriation bills and other important measures in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under the rules of the House, as now construed, the Union generally being said to be under consideration, it is in order to speak upon any question whatever. Members are not confined to the discussion of any measure. But it sometimes happens that it is important, when a measure is committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that there shall be action upon it speedily; and that Bancombe speeches should not occupy the time of the committee, which can be made in the Committee of the Whole upon bills that are not special orders, and when the President's message is before the committee. But whenever the House goes into the Committee of the Whole with a view to act upon some specific measure, and it is necessary that there should be action upon the measure, the Committee of the Whole amended rule, has only by a majority vote to make that particular bill a special order in the Committee of the Whole, and that, then, all debate shall be confined to the question directly before the committee. The gentleman from Ohio was perceptive, that if it should be in the power of the committee propose, so that all debate shall be upon the question directly before the committee, it will aid him very much in removing the difficulties which he suggested to me a little while ago.

The thirty-third amendment is to amend rule 136, by inserting after the word "present," in the eighth line, the words, "nor shall the Speaker, entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last ten days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read;" so that it will read, inserting after the word "present," in the ninth line, "make any of the general appropriation bills a special order; and also," so that it will read:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed on any day, by a vote of a majority of the members present, nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last ten days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read. The House, without any day, by a vote of a majority of the members present, make any of the general appropriation bills a special order; and also suspend the rules and order the order of bringing into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing, &c.

The effect of that amendment is, that on alternate Monday one hour shall be set aside, and not subject to be broken in upon by motions to suspend the rules, for reports of committees for reference to the Committee of the Whole without debate, and without a right to bring them back by motions to reconsider, and that on the other Mondays, when the House is in session, without being subject to motions to suspend the rules, to the call of the Speaker for bills and resolutions.

This amendment is necessary to secure the right which I explained to the House a little while ago.

Mr. MAYNARD. I should like to hear the gentleman from Maine upon a suggestion which I will make to him. It is this: suppose these amendments are made; will it not always be in the power of the dominant majority to restrict and limit the time of debate to such subjects as they may see proper?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. There will be opportunities enough, of course, in Committee of the Whole, upon questions which are not special orders, to indulge in general debate. No question or measure can be made a special order by a majority vote, except the general appropriation bills. With that exception, no measure can be made a special order except by a two-thirds vote, and not then except on Mondays. It leaves the matter, therefore, precisely where it is now, with the exception of appropriation bills. This amendment simply places it in the power of a majority to make the appropriation bills special orders, and provides that, upon special orders in committee, discussion shall not be in order, except upon the subject of such special orders, leaving general debate to go on upon the President's message and upon such bills in committee as have not been made special orders.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am still unable to see how it will be possible under circumstances which may arise, for the minority to protect its rights in the Committee of the Whole. It will be in the power of the majority to keep special orders before the committee, and prevent all general discussion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. You can make special orders now, under suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote. By the amendment reported by the committee, they can be made only in the same way, with the exception of the single instance of appropriation bills; and it seems to me that a majority should have the right to make the appropriation bills special orders. Let me give you an instance. One of the general appropriation bills, with the amendments of the Senate, comes into the House within twenty-four hours, or, perhaps, within twelve hours of the close of a session. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and in the last three days for the reason that the time of the House may be wasted by general discussion, until the session has expired; while the House may need discussion upon the bill under consideration, which they may have, and still save the bill. That difficulty will be avoided by the adoption of the amendment which we have reported, confining the debate to the measure under consideration upon special orders, and permitting the appropriation bills to be made special orders by a majority vote.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will suggest, then, that the rule be so amended as to provide simply that general debate shall not be allowed upon the appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The amendment provides that general debate shall not be allowed upon appropriation bills, if they are made special orders.

The thirty-fourth amendment proposes to strike out the 137th rule, which is provided for in rule 136.

The thirty-fifth amendment is to amend rule 153, by inserting, after the words "unrolled bills," the words "and the Committee on Printing;" so that it will read:

It shall be in order for the Committee on Enrolled Bills and the Committee on Printing to report at any time.

That is the same provision as is made in the rules at present.

The thirty-sixth amendment is to strike out rule 147, which is provided for by the proposed amendment to rule 6.

The thirty-seventh amendment is to strike out rule 153, which is provided for by the proposed amendment to rule 136.

The thirty-eighth amendment is to strike out all of rule 154, and insert the following:

The bills from the Court of Claims shall, on being laid before the House, be read a first and second time, committed to a Committee of the Whole, and, together with the accompanying reports, printed.

The amendment explains itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but this to say upon the amendments which have been reported; that the committee were unanimous in every recommendation which is made. A majority of the committee were in favor of several amendments which are not printed with this report, and which may perhaps be effected by individual members upon their individual responsibility. We have reported nothing which every member of the committee did not consider necessary and proper.

Now, sir, I will renew the proposition which I made in the outset of my remarks, that, in the consideration of these amendments they shall be read by the Clerk, and that when they are read, members shall indicate those which they wish a separate vote upon; then let us vote in the aggregate upon such amendments as no objection shall have been made to, after which we will go back and take up the other amendments separately, and discuss them and act upon them.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Will that preclude amendment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. No, sir. And in this I propose, after our report shall have been gone through with, that the rules may be taken up seriatim, if desired, and amended.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I do not object to that arrangement.

Mr. HORTON. I object to it, for this reason: when amendment is taken up for consideration, I may be in favor of it with a modification which may be made, but if the majority of the committee vote against the modification, I may be opposed to the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the gentleman does not understand my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of any rule which will apply to the consideration of these amendments, the Chair will consider them as he wishes. He will call the attention of the House to the vote upon each separately, whether the committee will adopt or reject it.

Mr. BOGOCCK. As one of the committee which reported these amendments to the House of Representatives, I desire to say a very few words. The first of them, I shall occupy the attention of the committee, at this time, for more than five minutes.

I wish merely to say, in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. WASHBURN), as to the manner of voting upon these amendments, that I do not believe any time will be lost. I shall occupy the property of the House. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to adopt that course; but I think, perhaps, it will be as well to adopt the usual course in Committee of the Whole, and vote upon each amendment separately, and then upon the consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, that I am perfectly willing that course should be adopted if he thinks it advisable.

Mr. BOGOCCK. I wish to remark, in relation to this whole matter, that I was in hopes the consideration of these amendments, at this time, would lead to a pretty full and thorough discussion of the rules of the House of Representatives. Nothing is more common, nothing is more fashionable, both here and in the country, than to bring up the rules of the House of Representatives, and subject them to prompt trial and condemnation. Whatever goes wrong in the House of Representatives, whatever a man has to explain before his constituents he is very apt to attribute to the rules of the House of Representatives. Well, sir, there are in these rules many things which I think may appear objectionable. But if they are to be dispensed with, the question is, how can we substitute matter in their place that will better promote the public business? The great object of rules is to enable the majority of a deliberative body to secure the greatest dispatch of business in a manner consistent with the rights of the minority. In other words, to enable the majority to dispatch business in such a manner as will not require the minority to vote upon propositions which they have had the opportunity of considering there. You have, then, in such a body as this, to impose restrictions upon a minority, but, at the same time, you should enable them, by the whole tenor of your rules, in the best possible way, to make their views distinctly known.

It is a common complaint that the complaint of the rule which allows one member of the House of Representatives to object a bill, and thus to throw it over. That is a rule in favor of the dispatch of business rather than against it. Suppose that you had no such rule, and the Private Calendar came up: a bill might be considered which would occupy days and weeks in the discussion. Gentlemen would claim the right to discuss it. Behind that bill might be various other bills to which there would probably be no objection; therefore those bills to which there would be no objection, and which might at once go through, and so forth, would be postponed till, which is of doubtful propriety, have been discussed at length. You will see, then, that, by enabling a member to throw over bills which are liable to discussion, you thus open the way for such bills as are not liable to objection, to be passed through. I only mention that as an instance of a rule which tends to the dispatch of business, but which is regarded by the members of this House and by others elsewhere who have not deliberately considered it, as doing the very reverse. Nothing is more common than to hear men say that it is hard to permit one member of the House of Representatives to defeat the passage of any bill. In reality, one member does not defeat the passage of a bill; but his objection only throws it over out of the way of bills to which there is no objection, and puts it in its turn upon what I may term the calendar.

There is another thing to which I allude. We have here a very large number of members—two hundred and thirty-two—one half of whom are necessary to constitute a quorum. With that number of members present, all anxious to speak upon every important measure, it is hard to perceive that it is impossible all can be heard. Some must be cut off. When gentlemen are cut off from making their remarks they are, as we know, in the habit of visiting all the blame upon the rules of the House, when in truth the fault is inherent to every condition. In the British House of Commons there are some five or six hundred members, and of them only forty members are necessary to constitute a quorum to do business. With these forty members, as it is with the Senate, there is no difficulty in giving every one of those who are disposed to speak, to a greater or less extent, upon every important question brought up for consideration. There, then, no member has reason for complaint.

Generally there are one hundred and fifty or two hundred members present. It is hard, every one of them, on an important question, will wish to address the House and the country. Each man has some peculiar view which he thinks is going to create a sensation in this House, and if not here, at least in the district which he represents, and throughout the country. He thinks, if he can get here long, he thinks, to establish a reputation of being an orator, a statesman, and a satirist, and that to do that he must speak upon all important questions. A friend near me adds, that he thinks he must be also an economist. Suppose, then, you have an important question before this House. There are one hundred and fifty members in this House whose brains teem with ideas which each one holds dear intimately upon the interests of the country and the destinies of mankind; whose brains teem with ideas which they think will give forth Minerva, the Goddess of Wisdom, are thusing in agonies of thought, so that they cannot resign themselves to silence. They must speak, Mr. Chairman; wisdom must find utterance, if not through a fissure of the head, at least through their mouths. There are one hundred and fifty members, one hundred and fifty speeches are to be made. Each speech requires an hour for delivery. We sit about four hours each day. The morning hour is consumed in other business, and we have then about three hours each day for speeches. Divide one hundred and fifty by three, and that would give us fifty days for each important question. Think of it! And yet such would be the result of a practice that would give the right to every member to debate each question that may arise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have upon our calendar every year some five or six hundred bills. I state the number roughly, of the bills which are upon our Private and upon our Public Calendar. You are aware, sir, that of that five or six hundred bills only some, scarcely more than half, are ever actually considered by a Congress. Then you must put in the power of a majority to determine which shall have precedence. Then, sir, every member whose bill is not acted upon at the conclusion of a Congress, and which is thrown over, visits the blank of that condition of things upon the rules of the House of Representatives. If it were ordered that each particular bill reported from a committee, and placed upon the Calendar, should be set down in its proper position, and come up in its turn for consideration, and if it were ordered that each one should be passed upon in its turn, it would take a great deal of time, it is true; but then, there would not be the wrangling and contention produced by members contending which shall get the lead and have his bill acted upon, to the exclusion of other bills. You find gentlemen here who will tell you day after day that they do not wish to consider all the bills upon the Calendar; that a great many of them are bad bills, and that the best way to get rid of them is to allow them to sleep upon the Calendar. If that be done, you know that there are friends of these bills who, when defeated in securing the consideration of their bills, visit the blame upon the rules of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COBB. Some members want to have the floor four or five times upon the same measure.

Mr. NOELL. The explanation of the gentleman from Virginia is very satisfactory to me so far as it goes. One thing I would like to hear him refer to, and that is the necessity for the previous question. I want to know whether he recognizes the propriety of the system in vogue here of passing bills reported from committees under the operation of the previous question, without debate? He is then in the case of the country and is engaged upon a measure important to all interests in the country, which is before this House for action.

Mr. BOOCOCK. I intended, before closing my remarks, to refer to that very subject.

Mr. NOELL. I want the gentleman from Virginia to tell us why such a disposition should exist here as the previous question?

Mr. BOOCOCK. I intend to come to that. I object to that as much as my friend from Missouri. I have been thinking on the subject since the report was made by the committee on the revision of the rules. It has occurred to me that there is an evil there which might, to some extent, be remedied. It is true that we cannot, to the fullest extent, remedy the evil of which the gentleman from Missouri complains, for the reason we are already stating in the committee on the bill. Each one of us has a constituency at our back, who wishes to hear our special views upon that bill. Each one of us, as I said before, has some important ideas which he believes will tell to the interest of the country and the destinies of unborn generations, and therefore we all want to speak. Suppose that each one of us makes an hour speech—

Mr. NOELL. I do not mean that every member should have the privilege of speaking; but I do insist that the whole body of the minority shall not be cut off from the expression of their views when an important question is before the House.

Mr. BOOCOCK. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri. It is an evil which cannot be entirely remedied. It has occurred to me, as you have suggested it to some friends around me, that there is an evil which may be corrected. In the event that a member of a committee reports a bill to the House, explains his views upon it, and, before taking his seat, calls for the previous question, and a majority vote is secured on the previous question, and the main question is ordered, I think the evil complained of could be remedied by making a provision that the House should not be required to vote upon it, if there was a disposition on the part of the minority, through one of its members, to suggest anything in opposition. It occurred to me before my friend from Missouri referred to the subject, that we ought to incorporate in our rules a provision that when a bill is reported and the previous question is demanded the previous question shall not be sustained until one member is heard in opposition to the bill. In that way, though all would not be gratified, some one could get the floor, and by his own views and such suggestions as he might get from others—and we all know that gentlemen now-a-days are willing to give their friends as much of their fees, every suggestion that may be deemed necessary—might bring forward the views of the minority. And it would be out of the power of the majority to force the House to vote upon a bill or joint resolution without its merits being discussed to some extent.

Mr. NOELL. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Beece], I would ask how it happened that upon the homestead bill no man was allowed to speak in opposition to it?

Mr. BOOCOCK. I think it happened in this way: that, in pursuance of the rules of this House, I recollect saying, the members of the House of Illinois, [Mr. Leazer], perhaps before he got the floor, had gone around among the friends of the proposition, and told them that, when he reported the bill, he was going to put it upon its passage, and asked them to support him in his report of the previous question; and he then called for the previous question as soon as he reported the bill, and in that way it was passed.

Mr. NOELL. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Beece] say that there is any rule of the House that can be abused in this way?

Mr. BOOCOCK. I think there is such a rule. The gentleman must not understand me as saying that such a rule is right. I only say that such a rule exists; and if, in considering these amendments, the gentleman can suggest some amendment to the demand for the previous question; and he does things, I shall be greatly obliged.

Mr. HUSTON. I desire to hear my friend from Virginia [Mr. Beece] speak to another point, which I think highly important, and which was intended originally to be embraced in the rule. I have seen a bill appropriating money sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without a two-thirds vote is had to suspend that rule. I think that rule was intended to include not only the money bills, but the bills which appropriate the property of the Government; the demand for the previous question; and he does, and everything else; or any property of the Government; requiring them all to go to the Committee of the Whole, as a bill appropriating money now goes to the Committee of the Whole. Certainly, in my estimation, the same reason that will apply to money bills will apply to bills going to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; would require that a bill appropriating the property of the United States should go there likewise. I would like to hear the views of my friend from Virginia [Mr. Beece] upon that subject.

Mr. BOOCOCK. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] in all that he has said; and I will say, in connection with the same point, what I was about to say in answer to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. Nathan], who wanted to understand the operation of the legislative practice of other countries, I have examined somewhat attentively the rules under which the business of the British Parliament is conducted, and I find that it is not in the power of a majority of the House of Commons, at any time, to force the minority to vote upon a proposition, unless that minority has had an opportunity to be heard against it. I think that is an example worthy of being followed by us. We ought at least to allow our member of the minority to be heard in answer to any proposition brought forward by the majority. I would also say, in answer to the reply of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston], that, as it is well known to you, Mr. Chairman, and doubtless to the members of this House, in the British Parliament all bills for supplies are raised by the House of Commons; and they extend that rule to all propositions imposing or leading to the imposition of taxes upon the people; and therefore the technical distinction that we observe here does not obtain there. We claim that the clause of the Constitution which requires that money bills should originate in the House of Representatives does not apply to the pension bills, and other bills which make a demand upon the people, but which does not levy a tax to pay those demands. In the British Parliament they consider that clause of the Constitution as not binding, so that no, any general bill that disposes of the property of the people might very well be considered as standing upon the same footing; as, for instance, a bill giving so large a quantity of land as the bill acted upon the other day. Therefore, I think such a rule should have been considered by the Committee of the Whole; fully, deliberately, and maturely considered; for I consider that to have been one of the most important bills that ever came before this Congress.

I did not intend to discuss the merits of this measure now. I do not intend to enter now upon anything like a full discussion of the amendments; that has been done by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Washburn]. The rules of the House of Representatives have long been a subject of discussion, both in the House of Representatives and in the country. We have now a series of amendments before this body. I would not pretend that these amendments will perfect the rules; but we think they do good as far as they go. We have the suggestions of five gentlemen of a body composed of two hundred and thirty members. Other amendments may be suggested in the progress of the discussion of this subject. I would suggest that it would be well for members, while this subject is under consideration, and while their minds are brought to bear upon it, to endeavor now to make the rules of the House of Representatives as nearly perfect as it is in our power to do. So far as these particular amendments of the committee are concerned, I concur with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Washburn] in recommending them, and shall probably unite with him in endeavoring to have them favorably acted upon. But if, in the course of this discussion, any member should show me that they are wrong or improper, and will operate to the injury of the business of the House or the rights of any portion of its members, I hold myself perfectly free to vote against them, though they may be reported by a committee with my approbation and consent. But if the chairman of the committee, [Mr. Washburn, of Maine], or anybody else, can show any good reason why these amendments should be adopted, and no other person can show stronger reasons against them, I hope that I will be able to vote for them.

The Clerk then read the first amendment, as follows:

Amend rule 4 by inserting after the word "required," in the eighth line, the words, "by at least one fifth of a quorum of the members," striking out the last three lines; so that it will read:

Questions shall be distinctly put in this form, as it is: "As many of the members of this House as will say 'aye'?" and after the affirmative vote is expressed, "Aye," many as are of the contrary opinion, say 'no'." If the Speaker doubts, or if a division is called for, he shall divide upon the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and afterwards those in the negative. If the Speaker shall think it expedient to require a vote of a quorum of the members, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the members in the affirmative and in the negative, and will be required to shut rise and state the decision to the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Amend rule 6, by inserting after the word "Hall," in the third line, the words, "and the supplementary rooms to that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House;" so that it will read:

The Speaker shall examine and correct the Journal before it is read. He shall have a general direction of the Hall; and the appropriated rooms in that part of the Capitol assigned to the House shall be subject to his order and disposal until the further order of the House. He shall have a right to name any member to perform the duties of the Chair, but such substitution shall not extend beyond an adjournment.

Mr. HUSTON. I would like to know who has carried out the words of the order of the House?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The Speaker, as provided by rule 147. We strike it out there and insert the authority here.

The amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Strike out all of rule 14, and insert in lieu thereof: There shall be a clerk of the House, and each Congress, to continue in office until their successors are appointed, a Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster, each of whom shall take an oath to perform faithfully the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities, and in keep the secrets of the House; and the Speaker shall have the power to remove and install in his place any one of the officers of the House; and in cases of election by the House of its officers, the vote shall be taken by ballot.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to propose an amendment to this amendment, and as it is a matter of some consequence, if the committee will indulge me, I will explain it in a very few words. I propose to insert after the word "Clerk," the words "Financial Clerk;" and after the word "Doorkeeper," the words "Librarian." The object of the first amendment is to remove the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House entirely from under the control of the officers now having it in charge. At present we know that the Clerk is made the disbursing agent of the House for its contingent fund, which amounts to

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1859.

NEW SERIES,.....No. 75.

Mr. KUNKEL. They have, under the resolution, I believe, of the gentleman from Tennessee, instructing them to inquire into and report to the House what alterations should be made in the law respecting the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. With that information, I will anticipate the action of the committee by pressing the subject further on the House at this time. I withdraw the first branch of my amendment, and ask a vote of the committee on the second branch of the amendment making the Librarian an elective officer of the House, instead of an appointee of the Clerk.

The question was taken, and Mr. MAYNARD's amendment was disagreed to.

The third amendment reported by the committee was then agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

Amended 17, by inserting after the word "States," in the fourth line, the words, "and of the Court of Claims;" so that it will read:

No person except a member of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, President's Private Secretary, the Governor for the time being of any State, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I desire to suggest the following amendment to that amendment:

After the words "members of the Senate," insert "members of previous Congresses."

Several members. Oh, no; do not offer that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I make this suggestion because it occurred to me, in the last Congress, when this rule was adopted, that there was an impropriety in the exclusion of ex-members from the floor.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to modify his amendment so that the clause shall read as follows:

Senators, Representatives elect, and ex-members of the House not prosecuting claims personally, nor as agents, nor Congressmen, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. No, sir; I prefer my amendment as I have suggested it.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Then I will offer my amendment as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I will yield for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Ohio to introduce his amendment, but I will remark that it does not strike me that it will accomplish the purpose for which my amendment was offered. I offer my amendment as a compliment to these persons.

Gentlemen who have for half a dozen Congresses been associated in this body in their Republicity. I think, as a matter of courtesy, ought to be permitted to come upon this floor.

When gentlemen have been here representing the people of a congressional district, as many upon this floor have been for ten or fifteen years, and even for a longer time, and when they retire from public life and visit this city, it is proper, it is nothing but fair, nothing but a deserved compliment, that we should recognize their former position by giving them the privilege, if they desire it, of coming upon the floor of the House.

It is only as a compliment to them that I suggest it. If any gentleman, having occupied a seat in this Hall, as a member of this House, returns to Washington in the position of an agent for any particular claim before the House, and desires to come upon the floor for the purpose of presenting his claim to the members of the House, then that gentleman, ex-member of Congress though he is, does not come within the scope of the suggestion that I make. I do not desire to confer any such compliment upon a gentleman who comes here on any such business.

But if the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio is adopted, I do not see that anything will be accomplished.

Suppose he comes here as a claim agent: who is to inquire, who is to ascertain, whether the ex-member, who presents himself under this rule, is it be amended as my friend from Ohio suggests, has or has not any connection with any claim before Congress.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. It is to be ascertained in precisely the same manner that the right of others who apply for admission upon the floor are ascertained. If a Governor of a State applies for admission on the floor, under this rule he must furnish such evidence as will be satisfactory to the Doorkeeper of his right of admission. Under the rule, as it now exists, if the Doorkeeper ascertains that any person not entitled to the privileges of the floor is here, he will have him removed, or the attention of the Speaker may be directed to the fact, and he will order the removal of such person.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Now, sir, I have been struck, during this session, as I was during the last session, with the fact that some gentlemen, who had been for years past connected in Congress, with the administration of affairs in this body; who had won for themselves a reputation in the councils of the country, and who, on visiting this city, because they were possessed with the idea that, as gentlemen, they had the right, under the rule that existed at the last session, to exist now, to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to others by the laxity on the part of the Doorkeeper in enforcing the rule, had studiously, and at great personal inconvenience, as they desired to have conference with the right, under the rule that existed at the last session, to exist now, to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to others by the laxity on the part of the Doorkeeper in enforcing the rule, had studiously, and at great personal inconvenience, as they desired to have conference with the right, under the rule that existed at the last session, to exist now, to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to others by the laxity on the part of the Doorkeeper in enforcing the rule, had studiously, and at great personal inconvenience, as they desired to have conference with the right, under the rule that existed at the last session, to exist now, to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to others by the laxity on the part of the Doorkeeper in enforcing the rule, had studiously, and at great personal inconvenience, as they desired to have conference with

Now, sir, there is not a very large number of ex-members of Congress who come to Washington at the same time, certainly not so many as to inconvenience us. I know that there are not very many ex-members of Congress who would care to come so frequently, or to remain very long upon the floor, and I think it is due to them that we should accord this compliment to them.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand upon what ground this rule goes. It provides that a Governor of a State being absent from the Hall, or having the right to enter upon the floor; upon what ground is that right accorded? There is certainly no special matter of business between a Governor of a State and this House, that should entitle them to it; and I should like to know from the chairman of the committee upon what principle the rule was adopted?

I can understand why judges of the Supreme Court should be included, for they are considered as one of the coordinate branches of the Government. I can understand why the judges of the Court of Claims should be included, for they constitute, in point of fact, one of the subordinate committees of this House; but I do not understand why Governors of States for the time being should be paid this compliment, which is denied to ex-members of the House itself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The committee did take into consideration the propriety of the admission of the persons named in the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland. They were, however, all of the opinion that it was proper to extend that courtesy to the judges of the Court of Claims. I believe a portion of the committee, perhaps a majority, were in favor of the amendment the gentleman has suggested; but they determined not to report anything in which every member did not concur.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I am glad to find that the amendment will meet the objection of others. I will not enter into the discussion or detain the House further at this time. I hope the committee will agree to my amendment; and I presume such will be the fact, inasmuch as it seems a majority of the committee on rules are in favor of it.

Mr. McQUEEN. I wish to submit just a few words upon this amendment. I have seen here, for years, ex-members of Congress crowding into this House, occupying the seats of the members, and interfering with the public business of the country. I never knew one to be such from any personal intercourse between the House and myself, but, sir, it was the common talk of the House and the country that ex-members were crowding this Hall, with a view of advancing or engineering through, as the common expression is, private claims against the Government. For years it was complained of, and the presence of a number of ex-members acting as claim agents, was looked upon as disagreeable to this body. That practice was the fruitful source of complaint in this body, as every member then here will remember. I know that these ex-members were here in numbers, and that it was because of the complaint that they acted as claim agents, that they were excluded from the privileges of the floor of this House. From my own observation, and from what I have heard, in the House and out of it, I should be very sorry to see the practice of the floor again conferred upon that class of men.

It was charged here, Mr. Chairman, and with some truth, that members of Congress who had passed two or four years had a hankering for the city of Washington, and that the members would return here, when not returned to Congress, and act as claim agents. It was thought to be wise and proper to exclude them from the privileges of this floor. It is no disrespect to them when they are refused entrance to this House. The galleries of this House are ample enough to provide for ex-members of Congress, as well as for all others who wish to witness our proceedings. They can hear there as well as they can upon the floor, what is passing in this branch of the National Legislature. I know that it has been the complaint, the just complaint, of the members of this House, that they were an annoyance to the House. Day after day they were here, enjoying the privileges of this floor; and when a member of the House left his seat for a moment, he would find it occupied by one of these ex-members. When he returned, and he would then have to stand up, or be put in the indecent position of requesting that his seat should be vacated, in order that he might again resume it. They were numerous here, and the charge was general, that they were engaged as claim agents. It is no disparagement to the House, in refusing them admittance to this Hall. They are not public functionaries. If they are to be admitted, I see no reason why any others of the private citizens of the United States should not be admitted upon this floor. I have a recollection, as I have no doubt other members have, that I represent a constituency, and that among them there are eminent and worthy private citizens as much entitled by merit to the privilege of the floor as any ex-members of Congress. I believe that members of Congress have been an annoyance to members of Congress who are entitled to the privileges of the floor. Therefore it is that I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I concur in the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Ataxen,] in favor of the admission of ex-members, but disagree with him in his objection to my amendment proposing to exclude from admission to the floor ex-members who are prosecuting claims before this House or the Senate. I would not counsel—for it would be a sort of compulsion—those who have claims here to employ ex-members of Congress; and the result certainly would be, if there were no restriction, that none but ex-members would be retained to prosecute claims before Congress.

Mr. WHITELEY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether the Doorkeeper is to ascertain whether he is or is not a claim agent?

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. The Doorkeeper of the Senate has a book in which every one applying for admission, and claiming the privilege of the floor, is required to write his name, together with the designation of the office or the title by virtue of which he claims admission; and a like usage ought to prevail here. It would be a pledge of honor remaining of record, which no one but those entitled to the privilege would venture to give.

Mr. RUFFIN. That was the practice of the House when we were in the old Hall.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, I differ with my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. McQUEEN], and I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS]. The number of ex-members present in this city, at any one time, is always very small and during the many years that they have been entitled to the courtesies extended to them under our former rules, I have never known any practical inconvenience to result. Besides, their presence here is not altogether a matter of course. A gentleman, connected for many years with the business of the country, is sometimes competent to give the House useful information upon past subjects of legislation, which may be raised and discussed at the time he is present. I am, therefore, in favor of the proposition; and I confess that, unlike my friend from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], I am not reluctant to hear suggestions from ex-members of Congress, whether they are the agents of claims intrusted to them or not; for I have no fear that I shall be led astray by any incorrect statements that they may make. On the other hand, I would greatly prefer. I would be glad to suffer the annoyance of being talked to by them upon the floor, if it be an annoyance, rather than to be frequently compelled, as I am now, to go out of the House to hear their representations, and in that way to absent myself when the business of the House is going on.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from South Carolina in the conclusions at which he arrives, and I believe that the courtesy of this House ought to be extended to ex-members of Congress in this city. The inconvenience to which the gentleman refers was enhanced by reason that in the old Hall, at which time the complaints were made alluded to, gentlemen here, as correspondents and reporters of the newspapers throughout the country, were allowed to occupy seats upon the floor of the House. It frequently happened that those gentlemen, as well as the ex-members of Congress here, were interested in the legislation that was going on before us. They, I know it was claimed, were the source of much trouble and annoyance to the members.

Mr. McQUEEN. They had desks assigned them outside of the bar of the House, and when they passed the bar of the House and came in amongst the members, it was considered an intrusion, and that they exceeded the privilege conferred upon them.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am aware of what. Those gentlemen informed themselves upon the subjects before the House, became interested in them, and, as was alleged, gave much trouble and annoyance to members by their importunities. In this Hall we avoid the necessity of having them upon the floor. Correspondents and reporters for the newspaper press of the country have a gallery assigned them, which I understand is acceptable to them. I objected, at the time, to putting them in that gallery, as well as to the practice of the House when they were there. I now, however, understand that they are satisfied with their accommodations. I only refer to the matter now to show that the annoyance of which members complained did not arise altogether from ex-members of Congress.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], refers to the practice of the Senate in keeping a book, wherein are entered the names of those who claim the privilege of the floor of the Senate, and the office which gives them the right to make that claim. That matter is not in question in the House when we occupied the old Hall, and I do not know why it has been done away with. Those who came upon the floor were compelled to say, before they were admitted, that they were in nowise concerned in pressing claims before Congress.

Mr. McQUEEN. I am informed by the permission of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], let me inquire if he did not hear from day to day, week to week, and month to month, that former members of this House were here as claim agents, pressing claims upon the attention of this House?

Mr. FLORENCE. It was a subject of general remark, I believe. But the difficulty would be obviated if the provision suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] is added to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS]. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] very properly remarked that there were but few ex-members of Congress at any one time during the session of Congress present in this city. That is true, except, perhaps, it be with regard to gentlemen who come here to prosecute claims before the House. But will any person tell me that those persons are not as well known as any other class of residents of Washington? Let an ex-member of Congress—I was going to say, prostitute himself to such base purposes—let an ex-member of Congress come here to perform this business of lobbying claims through Congress, and the stench of fire will be upon his garments, and no purification will cleanse his skirts of the odium that I think should attach to such a person. He can be pointed out; he is known to everybody; he is button-holed and button-holed all the time by those desirous to secure his services; and we adopt the provision suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], he would not dare to obtrude himself in the presence of honest and virtuous gentlemen. I would propose to amend by inserting—

“The CHAIRMAN. There is already an amendment in this House.”

Mr. FLORENCE. I would suggest that the words “diplomatic corps” be inserted in this amendment.

A MEMBER. “Foreign ministers.”

“diplomatic corps.” They are known as the “diplomatic corps.”

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] that he allow the vote to be taken upon this amendment, and then he can offer the one he indicates.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would say that members often have business for their constituents with the diplomatic corps resident in Washington, and they cannot leave that means of intercourse with them that they desire if they are confined to the gallery. I do not object to the amendment, but with a person occupied as I am, it is difficult to find them at their offices, when my time allows me to call upon them there.

Mr. GROW. I would inquire of the Chair if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] is substituting for the amendment for the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS].

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands. Mr. GROW. I understand that my colleague [Mr. FLORENCE] moves now to strike out and insert certain words.

Mr. FLORENCE. My colleague is mistaken. I make no such motion.

Mr. GROW. Then I will move to strike out of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] the words “ex-members of Congress,” &c., and insert the words “foreign ministers,” so that it will stand: “members elect to the Senate and House of Representatives, foreign ministers,” &c.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Let us dispose of the matter in reference to members elect of the Senate and House of Representatives, and then go on with the other.

Mr. GROW. That is what I wish to get at now. As I understand the question, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] proposes to substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HARRIS], I propose to strike out of the substitute the words “ex-members of Congress,” and to insert after the words “members elect to the Senate and House of Representatives,” the words “foreign ministers.” That will decide whether this House is willing to admit upon this floor ex-members or not. Or, I will modify my amendment, and simply propose to strike out the words “ex-members of Congress.”

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the Committee on the Rules have reported amendments to the rules, and their amendments are now before us as amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendments reported by the Committee on the Rules are the text upon which subsequent amendments are predicated.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the committee have reported back the whole body of the rules, with their amendments; and the body of the rules, I take it, constitute the text, and the amendments proposed by them constitute amendments in the first degree. The whole body of the rules are necessarily before us in Committee, of the Whole, and they constitute the foundation upon which we propose to build.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair considers the report of the committee as the subject upon which the Committee of the Whole is now acting. They did not report back the rules, but reported back certain amendments to be incorporated into the rules. The amendments reported by the committee are the text upon which subsequent amendments are to be predicated; and amendments are, in order, as the Chair holds, to the second degree. The question is now upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW], to strike out from the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] the words “ex-members of Congress.”

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to have the amendments reported to the committee, so that we could understand them.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee propose to change rule 17 of the House, by inserting after the word “Sinter,” in the fourth line, the words “and of the Court of Claims;” so that it will

No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretaries, heads of Departments, President's Private Secretary, the President's personal Secretary, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] proposes to amend, by inserting after the words “members of the Senate” the words “members of previous Congresses.” For the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] proposes to substitute “Senators and members elect, and ex-members of the House not prosecuting claims personally, or as agents, before Congress.” The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] moves to amend the substitute, by striking out the words “ex-members of the House not prosecuting claims personally, or as agents, before Congress.”

Mr. MAYNARD. In common with the rest of the House, I am somewhat interested in this question, especially if I live as long as I hope I may, be an ex-member of Congress. I came up the last Congress, I offered a proposition similar to the one now submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], to amend the rules. This rule which we now propose to amend is a rule that was adopted for the first time, as I understand the history of it, by the House when they took possession of the new Hall some two years ago. Not long after that rule had been adopted an incident occurred, that came to my notice, of such a character as led me to introduce the proposition I have referred to. That incident was this: a gentleman from the State of Virginia, of very high character and great personal dignity—a very aged man—who had been at one time in his life a conspicuous member of this body, since deceased—I refer to the late Charles Fenton Smith—when he came to the new Hall, and found that the House of Representatives had taken possession of their new Hall, he expressed a desire to a friend to see this body in its new place of session. He came with a friend up here to the front door, and with three men by a sub-doorkeeper, who closed the door in his face and sent him up to the gallery. This occurred but a short time before his death. I was also informed of another incident which occurred during the last session of Congress. One of the first men of the country—acknowledged by all to be the first time as I recollect in various ways by both Houses of Congress—I refer to General Scott—came here and sought admission into the Hall. He also was sent up into the gallery to look on. I know that, as a matter of fact, ex-members of Congress very seldom come here.

Mr. McQUEEN. If my knowledge is correct, the adoption of the rule advocated by the gentleman from Tennessee would not relieve General Scott. I do not think he ever was a member of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was stating the effect of the recent change of the rule, and the necessity which exists for revising it, so as to avoid such results. I referred to General Scott as one who would have been entitled to come in under our former rule, for the individual who has received the thanks of Congress.

I was saying this in a matter of fact, ex-members of Congress seldom return to this city. They come occasionally, and when they do so, it is very grateful to be permitted to mingle with their old associates, and this Hall is the only place where they can well do so.

I prefer that the amendment should not exclude those who might be acting for the time being as claim agents, but that is a small matter, affecting comparatively few gentlemen. It will operate almost entirely for the convenience of those who, from distant portions of the country, come to the city once, perhaps, in five or ten years. When they come here they find it very agreeable, desirable even, to come into the Hall and sit a few minutes, or perhaps an hour. Admit them; the rule would not probably apply to more than twenty-five or thirty persons during a session—not exceeding fifty, I am sure. By excluding them, in variance with ancient usage, we commit an ungracious act of inhospitality towards our predecessors, without deriving from it any compensating advantage.

MR. HANCOCK. I do not propose to give the committee the benefit of any of my advice to-day upon the amendment of the rules. I see in these proposed amendments a good deal that is good; and I have not been able to find anything at all objectionable. I hope they will be adopted.

I desire to remind the committee that we have already spent three hours, and have not yet got through the third amendment proposed by the committee. There are thirty-eight amendments in all; and if we go on discussing them in this way, it will take at least ten days of the session, missing four hours a day, to dispose of them. I would like to talk about some of them myself. The rules are an interesting subject to gentlemen upon this floor. We like to make points of order, and discuss them. But I intend to refrain entirely from discussing any of them, because I consider it desirable that they should be adopted; and unless gentlemen practice some self-denial, and allow them to be acted upon without debate, we shall waste a great deal of time. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that, unless the Committee of the Whole House shall give a disposition to pursue such a course, he shall move that the committee rise for the purpose of going into the House, and closing debate upon the amendments.

MR. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am much obliged to the gentleman from North Carolina for the suggestion he has made. I was about to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it will be necessary to refrain from these lengthy discussions, if we hope to pass upon these amendments.

I have no doubt that every gentleman here understands perfectly this question as to the admission of ex-members of Congress and foreign ministers upon the floor of this House, and is just as well prepared to vote upon it now as he ever was. I hope we shall be permitted to come to a vote immediately.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. GROW to strike out from the substitute offered by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM the words "ex-members of Congress," &c.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the substitute offered by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM for the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland.

MR. WHITELEY. Is it in order to add "defeated candidates for Congress" to think if a man comes in here upon a certificate he ought to be permitted to come in by courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. Such an amendment is in order.

MR. GARNETT. I would suggest also, "members of the Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Cleveland conventions, and all candidates for the Presidency." [Laughter.]

MR. BOCKOCK. I call for tellers upon the substitute.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Maryland, and HALE were appointed.

MR. GROW. Before the vote is taken, I desire to inquire if foreign ministers are included in the substitute as it stands?

The CHAIRMAN. They are not.

MR. GROW. I hope they will be inserted in the substitute; for if it is to be adopted, they ought to be included.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 53.

So the substitute was adopted.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, as amended.

MR. GROW. Now I ask the unanimous consent of the House to insert the words "and foreign ministers" after the words "Private Secretary." They should be allowed the privilege, if it is extended to other persons.

No objection being made, the words "foreign ministers" were inserted.

The amendment of Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, as amended, was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee, as thus amended, was adopted.

Fifth amendment:

Strike out rule 21. (Provided for by proposed amendment to rule 14.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Sixth amendment:

Amend rule 22, by adding at the end thereof the following: "And all business before committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed at the commencement of the next session of the same Congress, as if no adjournment had taken place;" so that it will read:

After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of any Congress, all bills, resolutions, and reports, which originated in the first session of the next preceding session remained undetermined, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had taken place. The same rule shall govern committees of the House at the end of one session shall be resumed the same manner as if the first session of the same Congress, as if no adjournment had taken place.

The amendment was agreed to.

Seventh amendment:

Strike out rule 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

When, as on the Journal is read, and the unfinished business to which the House was engaged at the last preceding adjournment has been disposed of, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of—in doing which, the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in their regular order, and then upon select committees; and if the report of a committee has not yet been reported during the session, but the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the report last under consideration: Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days, it shall not be in order for such committee to report, and whenever the other committee shall be called to their turn. On the call for reports from committees on each alternate Monday, which shall commence as the Journal is read, all bills reported during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be commenced, without debate, by the gentleman who introduced them, together with their accompanying reports, printed; and if, during the hour, all the committees are not called, then, on the next Monday, the gentleman shall be called to resume the call; and if the committee shall be called, and the committee shall be again brought before the House by a motion to reconsider.

MR. McKNIGHT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "their" before "regular order," in the fifth line. It is superfluous and ungrammatical.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The seventh amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

MR. OLIN. I wish to propose an amendment to the 24th rule, which I desire the Clerk to read. I suppose it will come in in order here.

MR. NOELL. I rise to a question of order. It is in order to offer an amendment to the 24th rule which is not included in the report of the committee.

MR. OLIN. We are passing over the rules, and have now reached the 24th rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes that, in fact, the rules of the House are not before the Committee of the Whole; that they are acting upon the report of the committee, which only brings before the Committee of the Whole those rules to which amendments are reported. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will probably be considered as an amendment to the Committee of the Whole; that we are acting upon the report of the committee, which only brings before the Committee of the Whole those rules to which amendments are reported. The amendment of the gentleman from New York will probably be considered as an amendment to the Committee of the Whole; that we are acting upon the report of the committee, which only brings before the Committee of the Whole those rules to which amendments are reported by the committee.

MR. OLIN. The amendment I propose only has application to the 24th rule of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair would suggest that the gentleman had better reserve his amendment until the Committee of the Whole has gone through with the amendments of the committee, and then it is believed that it will be in order to offer any other amendments in addition to the amendments reported by the committee.

Eighth amendment:

Amend rule 25 by striking out the words "of Wisconsin and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "last organized;" so that it will read:

Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for reports from members of each State and Delegates from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized alternately, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Ninth amendment:

Amend rule 36, by inserting before the word "resolutions," in the first and seventh lines, the words "bills on leave and;" and by adding at the end of the words, "and the Speaker shall first consider and dispose of the bills on leave;" and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider; so that it will read:

All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions on each alternate Monday during each session of Congress; and, if necessary to secure this object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion, under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said days shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the bills are called for and disposed of. The Speaker shall call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider.

The amendment was agreed to.

Tenth amendment:

Amend rule 37, by inserting after the word "Friday" the words "and Saturday;" and by adding at the end of the rule, "but when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members;" so that it will read:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month, the Calendar of private bills shall be called over, (the chairman of the committee shall be called to the Chair, commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be taken up and disposed of. If, after the call, a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall be objected to by at least five members.

The amendment was agreed to.

Eleventh amendment:

Amend rule 24, by adding at the end thereof the words, "Provided further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after five minutes' debate have taken place upon proposed amendments to any section of a bill, close all debate upon such section;" so that it will read:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question, in the House or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open a debate of one hour on the question, and where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer—December 18, 1857—after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the House. Provided further, That the House may, at any time after five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section of a bill, close all debate upon such section.

MR. VALLANDIGHAM. I move to amend, by providing the following proviso:

Provided further, That the limitation of debate to one hour shall apply only to speeches read by members in the House or in committee.

MR. MILLSON. As that may preclude an amendment which I have to offer, I ask the gentleman to allow me to move to amend the preceding clause. I understand the rule to be that, after a new proviso is added to the clause, it will be too late to amend the clause itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes it will be in order to amend the clause if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio shall be added to it.

MR. BOCKOCK. I rise to a question of order. I entirely wish to reserve the right to offer amendments to matters. When a member rises and moves to add to a section, and another member rises and moves to amend the body of the section, the latter motion takes precedence. In this instance, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia must be first acted upon, and that of the gentleman from Ohio afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had supposed that the rule was different, but does not know that it is a matter of any importance. He had supposed that a section was open to debate and amendment, even after words had been added to it. The Chair, however, will assign the floor to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MILLSON. The change proposed by the amendment reported by the committee has long been a very desirable one. Some years ago, when a member of the select committee on rules, I reported to the House a proposition intending to produce the very good result which I think this amendment will secure, but I suggested to the gentleman from Maine, who reported the amendment, that, perhaps from inadvertence, there are one or two words omitted which I think are necessary to make the amendment useful. I am surprised at the inadvertence on the part of the gentleman from Maine, when I call to mind that in 1834, at the time I made that report from the select committee on rules, the very omission to which I am now calling his attention he himself rose and called my attention to. Although, in point of fact, the resolution which I then submitted was not open to his criticism, yet I admitted at the time that the point he made was a good one. I propose to amend the amendment by adding after the word "section" the words "or paragraph;" so that it will be read:

At any time after five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, &c.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that it may be necessary to make other modifications to conform to the amendments he proposes.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not think there will be any inconvenience, practically, from retaining what I have suggested. I do not propose to interfere with the right of the House to close debate upon the whole section, if they shall please to do so; but the committee will observe that when the House, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with an appropriation bill under consideration, we have a number of independent paragraphs in one section; indeed it very often happens that there is but one section of an appropriation bill, and a great many independent paragraphs. Now, sir, the case may occur that the committee are desirous of closing debate upon a whole section, but in other cases, they may desire to close debate only upon a paragraph. I wish, then, to leave it optional with them to close debate either upon the section or the paragraph, as may seem right at the time.

Mr. BOCKO. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I am authorized, by at least two members of the committee, to say that they are in favor of the amendment he will propose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. You are so authorized by a majority of the committee.

Mr. BOCKO. Then, as a majority of the committee authorize it, the amendment of my colleague will be adopted as a part of the report of the committee.

Mr. MILLSON. The amendment having been accepted by the committee, it necessarily includes the following addition:

"That the House may, at any time, after five minutes' debate has taken place upon a proposed amendment, or any section or paragraph of the bill under consideration, close the section or paragraph, or, at their election, upon the pending amendment only."

Now it will be observed that the committee may sometimes desire to close debate upon a pending amendment or amendments without closing it upon the section, for the section may be a very long one, important in its provisions and needing amendment. The committee, however, may not be able to get on beyond a pending amendment so as to be able to close debate on the subsequent part of the section or paragraph.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The committee also accept that amendment, and it seems very strange to me that it did not occur to them before.

Mr. GARNETT. I should not be doing justice to myself or to the importance of the amendment under consideration, if I did not express to the House some of the reasons which will determine me in casting my vote against it. I do not, for one, consider that this is a mere legislative body. We are not a corps législatif, assembled by a French Emperor to register his arbitrary decrees. We are not only a legislative assembly, but we are a deliberative body, and it is the highest privilege of the Anglo-Saxon race to be governed by parliamentary bodies which deliberate upon all propositions brought before them for their action. I ask any attentive reader of our history, I ask any man who has observed the course of proceedings in this body, whether there has not been for years a constant tendency to dwarf this House of Representatives into a mere legislative assembly, where measures are brought before us and passed through without deliberation or decision?

In the early days of this Government, the House of Representatives, the immediate representatives of the people, was the principal branch of Congress. Why is it that now, on the contrary, each day diminishes its importance and influence in public opinion? Is it because they are more intelligent representatives, or are less immediately dependent upon the people? I take it that is a reason which gentlemen will not be prepared to avow, even if they believe it. Why is it, then, unless the rules and forms of proceeding in the Senate secure deliberation and discussion; while, on the contrary, the tendency in this House is to cut them off entirely? And let us remember, that the influence of a congressional body, in a free Government, depends not so much upon their power of passing laws—for laws, to be carried into effect, must be carried by the executive, formed beforehand—but upon their power of discussion, their habit of deliberation, and the control they exercise over the public opinion of the nation.

What is the state of things here? In the first place, Mr. Chairman, it is exceedingly difficult under the rules for any member to exercise what I take to be the first right of a Representative, and that is, to bring his proposition before the House. While he is cut off from that privilege of a Representative in great part under our practice—for notwithstanding gentlemen tell me the theory of the rules is that a member shall always have that opportunity, yet all we know, under the practice, that that opportunity seldom or ever occurs for him; while he is cut off from the highest privilege of a Representative, when his measure is introduced into the House, how seldom is it, sir, that we have intelligent, deliberate debate upon it? It is sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and there, under the construction of our rules, a member is at liberty to speak on any question before the question before the House. The consequence is, so far as our hour speeches are concerned, that there is rarely a discussion of the pending question. Then we go back to the House, where it is determined that debate shall terminate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at certain time. Then, sir, for the first time, commences valuable practical debate, under, however, the five-minutes rule. It is now proposed to do away with even that debate. Suppose there is an important section of an appropriation bill before us; some law affecting the destinies of territory; one of the future sovereignties of this Union; and that I am so fortunate as to obtain the floor, and move an amendment: I can speak for five minutes, and some other member of the House can speak for five minutes in opposition to it. Then, sir, the proposed amendment, if the amendment of the rules, all possibility of further debate is cut off, and other amendments cannot be offered or explained.

I admit freely that this five minutes' debate is frequently abused. I admit that the patience of the House is sometimes overtaxed by two or three days' discussion of one amendment, and that, too, not always germane or pertinent, though it is generally so. I admit all of that; but, Mr. Chairman, are we never to have our patience tried, and are we never to be expected here to exercise our own judicious determinations without listening to debate; without being willing to hear our peers upon this floor bring forward the reasons which move them, as the Representatives of the people, to go for or against a measure? Is it not one of the necessary duties of a parliamentarian and a deliberative body that there shall occasionally be tedious debate; that occasionally it shall be within the power of members to protract discussion unreasonably? The moment you take that power away, you may as well take away the power of discussion at all, and force it within the power of a majority to register its decrees without the minority having the privilege of appealing to public opinion by discussion and deliberation. Now, sir, you will then take away a still more valuable power from the majority itself—the power which every majority ought to desire to have placed upon it—the power of the minority to check them, and prevent them from tyrannical and precipitate action; that check, sir, which is to be found in free discussion; that check which is necessary to the safety and to the wise conduct of the majority as it is to the rights of the minority.

For my part, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the true remedy for the abuse of the present practice, the true remedy for protracted and unreasonable debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, will be found in an enforcement of the parliamentary law, which, in committee as well as in the House, (the opportunity I know has been the practice under the decisions of our Speakers and Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union), directs that debate shall be germane and pertinent to the measure immediately pending. If we could agree upon a rule that will prevent the practice of long protraction in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, of members getting up and reading electioneering essays upon every possible subject; treating upon doctrines of philosophy, and upon history and the arts; if we could, in other words, enforce the rule which I have just quoted from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then, sir, we would, I believe, have no need of such an amendment as this, and debate would rarely be prolonged beyond the patience of members of the House. I admit, I repeat, under our practice, in the House of Representatives, we occasionally have the patience of the House sorely tried; but I submit that that is a thousand times better than the adoption of an amendment to the rules which enhances the greatest evil of the present question; which destroys the rights of the minority; which gives to the majority a power dangerous to itself, and which has a tendency to dwarf and degrade the House of Representatives in the eyes of the people in comparison with the other branch of Congress, and to throw, I will tell gentlemen, all the weight which we have as a government all power, not over the mere passage of laws, but over that public opinion which shapes and molds the laws beforehand.

In some respects, Mr. Chairman, as a sectional man, I do not think that I object to this state of things. I believe that the House of Representatives upon its true theory so long as it does exist; and I tell gentlemen upon all sides, and especially gentlemen of the other side, that if they adopt this amendment, they will do that which will still more diminish the power of this House of Representatives in the future.

Mr. BOCKO. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it necessary, at this stage of our proceedings, to take up the time of the House with any protracted remarks upon the necessity which exists for the present question. I believe that the history of the Congress of the United States satisfies every man that, while the previous question does sometimes lead to abuse; while it may, by a tyrannical majority, be employed so as to infringe the rights of a minority, yet our business cannot be carried on without the aid of the majority. It is the diet of all those who have had experience of legislative matters in this House. So far as the remarks of my colleague relate to that subject, what I have said is a sufficient reply to them.

Now, sir, when my colleague said that the amendment the gentleman introduced would increase the power of the majority and diminish opportunity for the discussion and amendment of bills, he did not, perhaps, look forward to see that this amendment, taken in connection with another which will come after it, will destroy the power which the House has, by the power of a majority to force bills through by cutting off amendment and debate. It is within the knowledge of all of us, of my colleague as much as of any other, that the protracted debates under the five-minutes' rule have been going on to such an extent as to destroy the power of the majority to take up and put in force an old rule that had slumbered in oblivion for many years. Under the interpretation of the rules and the practice of the House, this is the state of things at present; and I call the attention of my friend and colleague to it. Suppose the majority have a hour session, as introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] with a number of provisions of importance; suppose that the first sections excite, because of their importance, inquiry and protracted debate, extending day after day, into weeks, and that a speech made by one gentleman compels reply— for we know that concussion of ideas always produces an increase of ideas before the House—the gentleman from Ohio will then rise in his character of chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and being worn out with debate, his mind appressed with a sense of the responsibility resting upon him, and in view of the approaching termination of the session will appeal to his faithful cohorts, telling them that the responsibility of the Government is upon them; that the debate must not be allowed further to proceed; and that the motion striking out the enacting clause, which is the effect, must be moved to. Now, sir, though there may be, in the latter part of that bill, various propositions which are important, and which ought to be discussed and ought to be amended, the majority, following the lead of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, may believe that it is better, on the whole, to force the bill through and cut off all amendments to the latter part of the bill, by moving to strike out the enacting clause, bring it into the House, non-concur in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole, call the previous question, and, by whips and spur, force the bill through the House of Representatives. Now, the committee appointed by the Speaker has provided that that power shall not be exercised by the majority of the House. It has provided, in an amendment hereafter to come up, that when a bill is introduced in the Committee of the Whole, no motion is made to strike out the enacting clause and agreed to by the Committee of the Whole, and the House refuse to concur with the recommendation of the committee, the bill, by that act alone, shall stand recommitted to the Committee of the Whole. The effect of that will be, to bill carry it before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; a majority is satisfied that any amendment of the bill, or any discussion of it in the Committee of the Whole, would be of no use; would be but time thrown away. They may strike out the enacting clause, and the purpose of defeating the bill. The bill will then come into the House with that recommendation of the Committee of the Whole; and their concurring in that recommendation will defeat the bill, and the time of the House will be saved. The abuse of the rule is thereby prevented.

You all know that a majority of the Committee of the Whole now have the power, under this rule, to strike out the enacting clause of a bill; and if the House refuse to concur in that action of the committee, with the purpose of defeating the bill, the bill will then come into the House without opportunity for discussion or amendment. Adopt these two amendments together, and then what do you have? You deny to the majority of the Committee of the Whole the power to take a bill out of the committee before you have had an opportunity to discuss it and amend it, under the rule allowing speeches of five minutes upon amendments; it goes that far in carrying out the views of my friend and colleague, [Mr. GARNETT]. In order to get that, the gentleman upon the other side, who is in the majority, will say, "the business of the House is to say: 'If you ask us to do this'—and they were willing to do it; I do not say that they were reluctant to do it—'if you ask us to do this,' you must give us the opportunity by which we can discuss it, and get the business out of the Committee of the Whole." We then agreed that when any section was under consideration, and there had been a speech for and against an amendment to that section, they can go into the House and take a vote of the debate upon the question of the bill. Instead of my colleague [Mr. GARNETT] opposing this, he ought to advocate it.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. What is the pending question?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the eleventh amendment of the committee, as amended.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, further, that the limitation of debate to one hour shall apply only to speeches read by members in the House or committee.

I will detain the committee but a few minutes upon this amendment. I do not propose to discuss the subject at length. I am not ambitious of the character of a reformer. But I am sure that wise and wholesome reforms are needed in the rules of this House. I object to the report of the committee, that it is not sufficiently radical; it does not go far enough. In my deliberate judgment, he would be one of the greatest benefactors of the legislation of this Government who would introduce and carry through a proposition to abolish the whole system of rules and of precise under the House of Representatives, and to replace it by a more casual and usages of Parliament. Our system, sir, is not half so democratic—not half so republican, if you please—as that which obtain in the House of Commons. There, every member who can "catch the eye of the Speaker" may propose a measure, and the Speaker, if the House in support of it as long as the patience of the House will tolerate his speech, or his own good sense allow him to proceed. He may move for leave to introduce a bill, and if the House look so far favorably upon the proposition as to grant it, leave is then, by parliamentary usage, given the chairman of the select committee appointed to bring it in, and in, by virtue of that chairmanship, invested with the same privileges which are extended to chairmen of standing committees here. Thus, sir, is equality there accorded to every member, and he has the chance to participate in the business of legislation.

But how is it here? Your Speaker, whatever his natural disposition may be, is, by the necessities of his office, a despot. Your rules make him so. And the chairman of the select committee is but twenty-eight sub-despots, acting under him. They are entitled by the custom of the House to be recognized by the Speaker in preference to any other member, whenever the measures which they have severally reported are pending. No proposition can be introduced here, unless by unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules, except from a committee. The result is, that to the hands alone of the privileged few who are chairmen of the committees is consigned the whole trade and mystery of legislation. The business, sir, of a lightning rod train, and we, the other members, are but passengers, with checks in our hats. I repeat, then, that it would be a wise and most wholesome reform to abolish all these rules, worse now than the early English rules of action or English special pleading, and return to the ancient and well-tried parliamentary law and usage, allowing every member to introduce whatever proposition he may please to introduce—as Mr. Burke did his celebrated measure for economical reform—and, at last, lay before the House and the country his exposition of the principles upon which the measure is based, whether the House give its consent that he may bring in a bill or not.

But I rose, Mr. Chairman, mainly to urge the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed. I do not prefer—if written speeches should be prohibited altogether—that the hour rule should be entirely abrogated. But apprehensive that the committee may not consent to go that far directly, I propose now only to mitigate the evil. No one, sir, who has observed and reflected upon the business of legislation here for some years past, will deny that very many of the evils of which the country has so much and so justly complained, and which have contributed so much to bring this House into disrepute, have arisen from the operation of the hour rule. I say the hour rule, I permit, go back to the history of the past, and demonstrate the uniform and inevitable mischief resulting from that rule wherever it has obtained. At Athens, in her legislative assembly, there was no limit to public debate, and hence those splendid orations of the Grecian eloquence which excited the admiration of the world to this day. But in the judicial courts of Athens the rule did prevail; the "clepsydra" cut down the orator in the midst of his address, and, by consequence, forensic eloquence attained but small importance in Greece, and but little which is known or read remains to this day. The "hour rule" precluded advocates, and the want of advocates dwarfed the forum and the jurisprudence of Athens into comparative insignificance. Demosthenes, who "ful-mined" in the public assemblies of that renowned city, shrank at the bar into a mere writer of speeches for litigants to read. Limitation upon debate was not known in the Roman Senate or at the Roman bar in the earlier days of the Republic; but as she began to fall into decay, and wicked emperors succeeded to the seats of virtuous consuls, the "hour rule" was applied in judicial trials, and it is the testimony of Tacitus and Pliny, that from that moment the eloquence perished. Despotism thirsted for treasure or for blood, and free speech was no longer tolerated at her bar. Dispatch is the great weapon of tyranny.

But I come down to our own times, and ask of the older members of the House whether the effect of this rule here has not been unmitigated evil? I am well aware that the usual argument urged in support of the limitation is, that it diminishes the quantum of debate. Is that a consideration, I ask, it to be urged in a deliberative assembly? Why protect members from question for words spoken in debate, if no debate is to be allowed, or even if it be an object to suppress or to limit it? But I deny the fact. I affirm, on the contrary, that the aggregate amount of speaking has been vastly increased by it. I should say nothing myself of the quality of the speaking, but I should say that the authority of a predecessor of mine, (Mr. Schenck), who served some eight years in this House, and who has been eight years now a citizen in private life, observing the course of debate and legislation here, from the date of his resignation to his thirteen years' observation, that the speaking in this House has very much increased in quantity, and very greatly deteriorated in quality, since the adoption of the hour rule. Sir, the rule was assailed vehemently by Mr. Benton, in his Thirtieth Year View, and I refer gentlemen to his observations upon it. Mr. Calhoun also denounced it as "destroying the liberties of the people by gagging their Representatives," and Mr. William R. King declared that he would resist it in the Senate "even unto the death." In the House it was opposed persistently by the ablest and most able members, and among them by John Quincy Adams.

I propose, Mr. Chairman, that the hour rule shall be limited in its application only to speeches which are read. According to the new view of this House, as I have said, the Manual, no member has a right now to read a speech if it be objected to; but courtesy will not tolerate an objection. So long has the custom prevailed, and to such an extent has it been carried, that it would be regarded, doubtless, as highly presumptuous to demand an enforcement of the rule. Now, I believe that this proposed amendment will prove a wise provision; and that, by removing the restriction, or confining it rather to essays read in this House, a premium will be held out to legitimate debate, which I trust to see restored in this Chamber, to take the place of these carefully-prepared, elaborately-constructed, and, for the most part, elegantly-written lectures which so often weary the patience of the House, admirable as they may be— for, sir, I am not one of those who think that in this House, as in the Senate, the speeches which are read, or spoken upon that floor, are mere "trash." This, sir, is an accusation unjust and unfounded. But these essays or lectures are not fit for this presentation; they are not delivered in the proper place. They belong to the lyceum, and not to legislation.

Allow me, sir, to refer, by way of illustration of the evil of which I complain, to what occurred when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CECIL] had concluded his very earnest and elaborate speech upon the question of the hour rule. I was eager for the debate to proceed. You, yourself, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. STANTON] rose to reply upon the spur of the moment; and had the floor been given you, we should have had, I doubt not, one of those interesting and exciting debates, so highly dramatic in their character, which are now heard only in the Senate of the United States, or in the Parliament of Great Britain; but which, sir, in an evil hour for the legislation of the country, have almost wholly disappeared from this Chamber, and linger only in the memory or the records of the past. Yet, under the custom more honored in name than the observance, which has grown up under the hour rule, and which is one of its most odious excrecences, the Chairman had his roll of members prepared long time in advance. You, sir, were not upon that roll; or, if upon it, not next in order. You rose first and were restricted. But the Chairman's promise was, and the gentleman set down in the programme claimed "specific performance." You yielded, and he proceeded amid great disorder, and very soon to empty benches, to make a speech, which, if spoken, would have commanded, as it deserved, the closest attention. They who had listened with interest so intense to the oral speech of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COWLEY] crowding these seats in silence even beyond the allotted hour—for you relax the rule by unanimous consent in his favor—immediately, at the very sight of the manuscript, fled from the Hall, and retired to their boarding-houses. And when the committee rose last night there were but five members present in all this vast Chamber.

I appeal for a moment here, Mr. Chairman, upon the point of the alleged abuse of unlimited debate, to the experience of this House, not only previous to the adoption of the hour rule, but during the interregnum of eight weeks which occurred at the commencement of this session. Was the patience of the House ever abused more than once, at most? Sir, we had but two speeches of really inordinate length—very able ones, indeed—within that period; and one of them, at least, I am sure, commanded the attention of the whole House, as to style and intensity of argument, and the force of which has been delivered within this Capitol for more than twenty years. The average length of the speeches during those eight weeks of unrestricted debate—and I have made an estimate fairly—did not exceed from half an hour to forty minutes. Very many of them did not equal that limit. And yet we had no hour rule then; but had it been in force, every member who obtained the floor would have felt himself under an imperious necessity of speaking full an hour, lest his speech be deemed to have "broken down." And that, sir, is precisely the evil which afflicts us now under its operation.

Yet another grievance growing out of this rule, is the persistent and offensive interruption to which every member upon the floor is subjected. No one is at ease and address the House, without the some gentleman interposes, not upon a point of order, not for personal explanation, but that member who interrupts may propound an interrogatory to the member interrupted, and thus thrust him into the witness-box to extract from him, by process of cross-examination, the matter more than all relevant to the subject; or perhaps to interpolate a speech of his own. Sir, this happens here, and it happens every day; because the rules of politeness, which prevail in conversation and in social intercourse, are forgotten in this House. Nothing was more and perhaps is still, deemed more rude than to interrupt a gentleman in conversation, at least in the midst of a sentence; yet it is continually done here. And it is done because members are anxious to speak whether prepared to speak or not; and the best opportunity to "catch the Chairman's eye," is when there is but one member upon the floor, and no one struggling for it. Then it can be secured. Thus it is that speeches by one member are thrust into the speeches of another member, to go out with them. I doubt sometimes, perhaps, whether the reputation of a gentleman from the subject he is discussing, or to extract from him some troublesome answer relating to a personal matter or opinion, it may be, wholly foreign to the business of legislation. This is an evil grievous to be borne, and I think it is the result of very much of the hour rule—certainly that is a part of the system of evils which has grown up since the adoption of that rule.

It may be that the solution proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McKAY] is correct; that there are no more members upon the floor who think themselves so much better "posted" than the particular member speaking, that they are anxious to communicate some portion of the valuable surplus of their information to that member, or rather, perhaps, through him to the country.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to apply these remarks personally to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK], who sought two or three times to interrupt me some time ago. No, they are the result of a long and arduous reflection upon what I have seen and heard from the time I first had the honor of a seat upon this floor.

Mr. BOGOCCK. It is so long since I asked the permission to interrupt the gentleman that I have almost forgotten what I intended to say. The gentleman seems very much fascinated with the British system of unlimited debate in this House. I have been somewhat surprised at the course this debate has taken to-day. It is sometimes charged that, though we profess to be Democrats, we are not always democratic in our practice. I considered this as only the taunt of our enemies. Now, I have been surprised to find my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], who has always great care for the widows and orphans; who votes always on the side of the working men; who is always the poor man's friend, advocating to-day a proposition to confine that class of men to the galleries; to exclude them from places upon this floor; to make them sit up there in the cold, and, at the same time, advocating the bringing in of foreign ministers, with all their insignia of position, upon this floor. And I had scarcely recovered from that surprise, before I heard the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM],—par excellence, a Democrat—one of the shining stars of the Democracy; one whom we all look to; a man of expectation, come forward in the House of Representatives and ask that the system of the British should be adopted, and that the Treasury benches spread out here, and the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to come down to control the proceedings of the House. I suppose the gentleman wants lords and dukes—and they are ministers of the crown, and sit upon the floor, and have the chief control of our business.

The gentleman wants the British system pursued. Ay, sir, the gentleman, I think, has been misled by his desire to accomplish a particular purpose into acting upon a too brief examination of the subject. Under conference rules, the gentleman took to state this morning why the British system should not do here. There, there are generally only from forty to a hundred members present. There, members are allowed to go forward and state upon that subject, and work the whole of a motion for a particular day. Well, some three or four notices are entered upon the floor on a day. Now, suppose we could go forward here and enter notices of motions for a particular day, there would be one, or perhaps two hundred notices entered upon the floor, and crowded into each other, and the gentleman would find that at last you would have to designate some order in which the business should be conducted. We have committees to prepare our business; they do not. Our whole system is different from theirs, and we require different regulations. The Constitution provides that we shall establish our rules; and we could not get along a day without rules; and what I ask of the gentleman from Ohio and others is, that if these rules are not satisfactory, they shall make better ones and propose them.

Now word in regard to the hour rule. The gentleman will allow me. I will say that I interrupt gentlemen when they are speaking as seldom as any man on this floor; but I had been on the floor once or twice to-day, and did not want to sit up too soon, and, therefore, I asked the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio to interpose a few remarks.

The gentleman says that our debates are not relevant to the subjects under consideration, and I agree with him that they are often irrelevant; but how will the abolition of the hour rule bring about relevant debate? Let the gentleman recall that debate in Committee of the Whole, as well as elsewhere, shall be confined to the particular question before the committee, and then we shall have relevant debate.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. The speech of the gentleman from Virginia would no doubt have been very captivating in the region of Appomattox and upon "the stump" anywhere, [laughter]; but surely it was quite inappropriate here; indeed, I ask no better practical illustration to enforce my view, I and a few members ago that this interruption from a gentleman who has served in the House now these ten years, and, I fear, has fallen into all its bad habits.

In reply to his last observation, I will tell him how I come to sit four hours upon the floor, and how totally different from legitimate debate, and why members prepare speeches in writing because of the hour rule. It is important, of course, for every member to compress as much as is possible within that limit. Every man knows in his own experience that he can condense an amount of matter within an hour when he writes, which it would require an hour and a half to deliver orally. Yet, for one, I must say, in passing, I would rather listen to the duldest speech from any member here for two hours, orally delivered, than to sit for one hour under the infliction of the finest and best composed essay ever read in the House.

The gentleman from Virginia has just made a lecture on democracy, monarchy, republicanism, and the other forms of government. Sir, he himself stands here to-day the advocate of despotism. He is upon this floor defending a rule, the whole purpose and tendency of which is to prevent the free and legitimate deliberation and debate, so essential a part of legislation. But, in speaking of the previous question, he himself forgot the very wide difference between that question as it obtains here and in Great Britain. In Parliament it is used in the highest sense to propose a subject for debate before the House; so that there shall be neither vote nor debate upon it. Here it is employed solely for the purpose of bringing the House to vote directly upon the proposition, and without debate at all. Now, if we should return to parliamentary usage, and if we should restore also to the ancient and legitimate use of the previous question, and abandon the dangerous and tyrannical perversion and abuse of it which have grown up under our own system. And yet, limited and comparatively innocuous as it is there, the previous question has not been raised in this House of Commons for many years; and a motion, in 1849, to limit speeches in Parliament to one hour, was rejected. And just here allow me to add, that no legislative body, anywhere, or at any time, in a free country, except the House of Representatives, has ever submitted to this most mischievous restriction upon the freedom of debate.

The gentleman finds an apology, sir, for all these most vexatious restrictions and intricacies of the rules which preclude a member from bringing forward business, or discussing it, as he sees fit, brought forward, in the number of Representatives of which this House consists. Sir, does he forget that the British House of Commons is composed of six hundred and fifty-eight members, and yet the business of the House is transacted in three days then by this House in six weeks; and that, too, usually there is a full House. It is very true that forty members constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and that private business, in which the whole empire is not interested, is usually passed upon in this House; but whenever any great question is pending before Parliament, the House is full, and the members are nearly all present. Even the very important commercial treaty recently concluded between France and Great Britain was discussed and disposed of in this House, and the business of Parliament in two nights, only some few weeks since. How long would it have occupied this House? How much time do we usually consume in discussing great public questions? The debate on the Kansas-Nebraska bill, including the resolutions of the House, was continued for six or eight weeks. The discussion upon the Lecompton constitution, in which from one hundred and seventy to two hundred speeches were delivered or read, occupied the time, if not the attention, of the House from the 16th of December until the 30th of April. And why is this? Because we have no legitimate debate. The speech of one member does not follow that of another. One set of ideas or arguments are not provoked by another urged by the speaker so preceded. We hear none, and have none of the kind of debate, in the House of Representatives, written words, and concealed in the desks of members, are continually produced here, and read to empty benches, and yet go forth to the country as speeches which thrill the hearts of members of those who have no opportunity to hear. Sir, remember, that an illustration of the same thing occurring to me, that a member from Illinois read an essay upon this floor, in the month of February one year ago, late at night, to three members and five pages, [laughter.] Yet the next day it was a significant and losing paper in the New York Herald, as one of the most thrilling speeches ever delivered in the House; remarkable, especially, for its fairness, and the boldness of its denunciation, [renewed laughter], and perfectly extirpating every one present. Now, is it not time that this evil was remedied? I repeat again, that the quantum of speaking will not be increased by the abrogation of the hour rule; the number of pages which make up your Congressional Globe will not be multiplied; and what difference is it to us or to the country, whether one man shall speak for two hours, or two men shall speak for one hour each? It may be of some moment to our particular constituents; but it is none to the whole country. Let gentlemen who would discuss more particular local topics, go back to the ancient usage which prevailed some forty years ago, of publishing addresses upon such questions to their constituents. Let us agree henceforth that what is said upon the floor shall relate to the great measures of public policy and legislation which may come before us, and not to mere fleeting and temporary subjects of controversy between parties. No reform which we can devise will tend so far to bring the House back to its ancient dignity and decorum, and to the great measures which belonged to it in the earlier days of the Republic.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that for thirty years after the organization of this Government the Senate was not the subject of attention. It was the House which had the eyes of the country were turned. It was here, sir, that in those days there were gathered an Ames, a Madison, an Ellsworth, a Randolph, a Sherman, and others of a like fame, who have made the history of our country illustrious. But, for thirty years now, and especially within the twenty years past, since the adoption of the hour rule, along with other evils, the importance and even the equality of the House has been lost; and it is the Senate whose galleries the people throng now; it is the Senate that has drawn upon itself the chief attention of the country, and which is in the Senate for which the public look; it is the speeches delivered in the Senate which circulate throughout the land; and, finally, it is the Senate, as the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT], suggested, which is not only absorbing all the legislative energy of the country, but is governing the public opinion which controls the Government. Is it not apparent then, I ask, that there should be found, and right speedily, a remedy for the dire straits into which this House has fallen? What remedy may be devised, I do not know; but I think, gentlemen, to devise; but, I repeat, that the abrogation of the hour rule is, in my opinion, the first and a most important step in that direction.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask my colleague a single question. He seems to have taken the British House of Commons as his model of a parliamentary body.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Not altogether, although this House was certainly modeled after it.

Mr. COX. My colleague has, no doubt, read in the Athenian Year of our history, the famous orator who broke down a ministry by crowing at an inopportune time. [Laughter.] I suppose that, to carry out the system in this House, it should be the duty of the Speaker to appoint persons who are to perform that duty. But, as my colleague refers to classical authorities, let him tell whether it was not true that the hour rule always prevailed in the Roman Senate?

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Certainly not. Mr. COX. I ask if it was not extraordinary that those great declamations of Demosthenes and Eschines always came out in exactly sixty minutes?

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. My colleague is, as Timotheus would say, a most "respectable gent"; and no doubt the incident to which he has referred in that gentleman's parliamentary career, illustrating his power of oratory, is remarkable in mind by the similarity between my colleague's name [Mr. Cox] and the barn-yard fowl called

"Chantecler who wakes the morn."

He is the very bird for the new office he proposes. [Laughter.] But I regret that he has exhibited unsentimental and disrespectful regard to the Roman and Grecian eloquence, to which I had made allusion by way of illustration. If he had recited the speeches of Demosthenes and Eschines, to which he refers, he would not have asked whether they were not spoken in sixty minutes. Certainly they cannot now be read in two hours, and that without including the documents quoted by the orator.

Mr. COX. That depends upon whether they are read in the original. [Laughter.]

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I do not profess to be as familiar with Grecian as my colleague. He has been the "vision of Greece" who visited the classic shores of Attica, walked the streets of Athens, and stood upon the Acropolis. I have not. He visited Rome, too; though I may not speak of what he saw or heard in the Eternal City. He has written it in a book. [Laughter.] But I will not occupy the time of the committee longer. By reason of the very evil of interruptions of which I complained, I have been forced to speak at far greater length than I intended. I beg pardon, gentlemen.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I propose to follow the example of some who have preceded me, in making public some private opinions I have, with the hope that they may prove beneficial to those who hear them.

Now, sir, I shall not undertake to say anything about Demosthenes, or any of those old fellows, who have been so unconsciously introduced into this debate; I have no acquaintance with them. [Laughter.] I know nothing about them. But I desire to make some observations to those who are now present, about the decorum of the House. I have been very much annoyed by any member here, because that would provoke a discussion into which I did not care to be drawn: I concede all that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] has said in regard to the marked deterioration in the character of the debates of this

* NOTE BY MR. VALLANDIGHAM.—Not aware that the report on the rules of the House was made a special order for this day, and obliged to speak, therefore, without recent examination of the subject, I appear now certain extracts to which I have previously referred in my remarks.

1. Many of the extant orations written by Demosthenes for prosecutors or the accused, were in State trials or impeachments; and some of them in support of the repeal of certain laws, as for example, the Lepinean order, which was before "commenced" as we would say at this day, a longer time, (if indeed there were any limit,) it would seem, was allowed in such cases.

2. The first example of limitation of time for argument at the bar in Rome, was by Pompey, upon a trial of Milo, and was intended for securing his conviction; but the limit then was fixed at three hours. Under the Emperors it became a settled usage; and sometimes two hours, sometimes one hour, or even half an hour, were allowed, at the discretion of the judge. Pliny assigns as the reason, that "the advocates grew tired before the business was explained, and the judges were ready to decide before they understood the question." And he adds, and the inquiry is just as pertinent now, "are we wiser than our ancestors? We have less more just present? Our ancestors allowed many hours, many days, many adjournments in every cause; and, for my part, as often as I sit in judgment, I allow as much time as the advocate requires: for would it not be rashness to guess what space of time is necessary in a cause which has not been opened? And some unnecessary things may be said, and it is not better that what is unnecessary should be spoken, than that what is necessary should be omitted? And who can tell what is necessary till he has heard? Patience in a judge ought to be considered as one of the chief branches of his duty, as it certainly is of justice." (Book 6, Epistle 2.) These considerations apply still more strongly to debate in a deliberative assembly.

3. Cicero says in his "Brutus," that he never heard of a Lacedaemonian orator, and adds, "brevity, brevity, brevity, is a repeated cry, and it is very far from being compatible with the general character of eloquence."

4. Referring to the adoption of the hour rule by the House, July 7, 1841, Mr. Benton says: "This measure is remarkable for the institution of the hour rule in the House of Representatives—the largest limitation upon the freedom of debate which any deliberative assembly ever imposed upon itself, and presents an eminent instance of permanent injury done to free institutions in order to get rid of a temporary annoyance."—2 Benton's View, 347.

body within the last few years to be true; but I will suggest that it may be that the rules of this House are not the sole cause of it. I will also say to the gentleman from Ohio, that if he will inquire into the characters of the men who were in this House twenty years ago, and compare them with those who are here now, it is possible that he may find quite as much difference in the men as in the tone and temper of the debates.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I think not.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Well, sir, I will not further discuss that point. I will remark, however, that the regulation and government of a body so large as this, especially when those who compose it are controlled by bad passions, was almost an impossible task, when for weeks we were without a regular presiding officer—a Speaker; but it turns out that now, when we have at last secured a presiding officer, we have not secured the observance of good order or decorum. I have seen, during the present session, the Speaker over and over again peremptorily call members to order; and I submit to this House whether such an instance has ever occurred as a member taking his seat when so called to order, or not. I have seen the existence of a positive standing rule of the House, requiring that when a member is called to order he shall take his seat. From its simplicity, I have supposed it is the only rule of the House that is well understood; yet it is one which I have never known to be completely obeyed.

Now, sir, I do not envy the position of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WATSON] as the chairman of the select committee to revise the rules; for I venture the assertion, and think it will prove true, as a general proposition, that it is fit to be a member of Congress who knows very much about the rules, unless he be the Speaker of the House. [Laughter.] Sir, if you will look at the history of the most distinguished men who have been connected with this body, and in the way of service, or otherwise, I do not think in conducting its business, you will find that they seldom or never raised questions of order. I think their example worthy of imitation, and without claiming for myself any of their great qualities, I will say that I have been a member of the Congress some years, and I do not think I have ever raised a question of order during that period of time; and, in fact, I never knew, or cared, whether a member was in order or out of order, if he behaved himself.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have a great many vigilant guardians of our rules—more than we have of the public interest, and so far as my observation extends, these peculiar watchers of the rules have wasted more time in discussing mere questions of order than has been consumed in legitimate debate. I say that without the slightest disrespect to any one.

Now, sir, I remarked that the rules of the House require that when a member is called to order, he shall take his seat, and retain it until the member calling him to order has finished his question of order. I have never seen this rule obeyed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order.

[Mr. ETHERIDGE immediately took his seat amidst shouts of laughter.]

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, of the gentleman from Maryland will state the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. My point of order is, that the gentleman has been indulging in a lecture to the House, rather than in debate upon the pending proposition; but, sir, as he has done it gracefully, and as he has quoted the Scriptures, I am compelled to practice upon his own teachings. I will draw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Mr. Chairman, this is an incident which I think is very suggestive. Strangers, who may be observing the attitude of the Society, and who may have been by his action recently a complicity to practice upon his own teachings, I will draw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ETHERIDGE. It is just as it is. However, I do not propose to pursue the matter, but merely to give expression to my own idea. [Laughter.]

My friend from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] suggests that we ought to abolish the hour rule. So far as I am concerned, I feel no particular solicitude on the subject. I think, however, that the abolition of that rule would have the good effect of bringing to the discussion of important subjects many of the ablest men on both sides of the House, who, in consequence of it, are but seldom heard.

This rule compresses a man of brains into so small a compass as to dwarf all his enlarged and liberal ideas; while it enables these of stupid natures and contracted opinions, so to dilute their notions as to spin out and exhaust at least sixty minutes. [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we were to attempt to elaborate the subject of the day—the standing question of “nigger”—and to submit a reply to all that I have heard pro and con. upon it during this session; if I were to attempt to controvert erroneous legal propositions, debate unsound constitutional theories, I tell you candidly, it would be impossible for me to get through within the space of an hour. There are gentlemen here who, had they been allowed to proceed without the perplexing constraint of this rule, would, no doubt, long since have elaborated the subject so fully and satisfactorily as to have deterred others from attempting to speak upon a subject upon which they could offer nothing new. There was a memorable instance of this kind during the struggle here to elect a Speaker. We have just been reminded by my friend from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] that our galleries are not often crowded. He certainly could not have been alluding to the period anterior to the election of a Speaker; for then, when nobody respected rules, law, or order, the galleries of this House were densely crowded.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. We had no hour rule then.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. But to the incident to which I was about to refer. A distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONWIS] carelessly rose from his seat, and proceeded to address the House at great length upon the various questions which arrested all our efforts to organize the House, and especially upon the slavery question; and at the conclusion of his calm, temperate, but elaborate speech, he had thereby slaughtered every diminutive Republican in this House. His representatives so effectually, that until recently no speech was made on that side of the House on the subject he so thoroughly discussed. True, within the last few days, a few have been hurried in under the hour rule. He discussed the whole subject for two or three days, and showed his grasp upon the Republican side felt that the honorable gentleman from Ohio, when he closed, had expressed his views much better, more forcibly, and more felicitously, than it could have been done by the great body of the members of that party; so much so that when he had finished there was not one of them who then desired to be heard. [Laughter.]

Now I say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] that I am willing to abrogate the hour rule. I think the abolition would do great good in more respects than one. In its operation it is unlike the law reforms, the revised codes of many of the States. Many years ago, when the science of special pleading was in favor, a practitioner had to learn something of it before he could be a successful lawyer. The Chief Justice considered the bridge or the pane to be forced before it was considered safe to intrust to any one the name of lawyer. The science of special pleading was a terror to lazy students and fools. A remedy must be provided. Being unemployed in the courts, a great many of these had, besides lawyers got into the Legislatures of the several States, and remembering their former sufferings and trials, they concluded they would reform the practice, codify the laws, and simplify matters they never understood. In plain English, they concluded to adopt a series of legislative enactments, which when fairly translated, meant simply this: a system of laws by which a very bad lawyer could be made as good as a much better one. [Laughter.] The result has been in all the States where revised codes and simplified practice have been adopted, that lawyers are, on the whole, nothing better than a revised edition of a mean constable. [Renewed laughter.] So is it with this hour rule, in its effect upon legitimate debate.

Mr. Chairman, memory is not an attribute of reason. Some men, who have no such character, have the faculty of committing to memory very many nice things, which other people have first said. A member who is a little classical in his attainments—who does not go filthily through about town, but keeps closely locked up in some quiet room, surrounded by the writings of great men, may, with the aid of a good memory, finally gather together very many pretty things—a sort of medley—

“Oriens grana at random strong.”

He can, I say, store them away until an opportunity is presented, when, for an hour, like one of those traveling showmen we all remember to have seen, he amuses us by pulling out of his literary mouth a long string of oratorical ribbons of every hue, color, and description. [Boisterous and protracted laughter.]

Perhaps I had better stop. [Cries of “No!”] “Go on!” Very well, then, I took the floor for the purpose, among other things, of making an appeal to all sides of the House upon a matter that deeply concerns us. I fear, however, that my warning and my entreaties will not have much effect—that is, with those who do not know me. [Laughter.] I submit to gentlemen, and in all sincerity, that whatever rules we do adopt, we agree heretofore to enforce them. Were I disposed to imitate examples, perhaps I could get up a laugh at the expense of an inexperienced chairman—perhaps at your expense, Mr. Chairman—by making myself two or three weeks’ rest for some obsolete rule that everybody had forgotten, and then, by making a point of order upon the chairman, seek to embarrass him by a citation of some long-forgotten rule. I do not know that I should be delighted to do so, for I do not find special legislation in such trials and tribulations the readiest and best way for us to get along is to have our rules, whatever they may be, enforced by the Speaker, and to have obedience on the part of the House. Every lawyer who has had a fifty years’ experience, and who has no days of grace, and commercial usage had never allowed, would not now desire any; but if they were two or four instead of three he would not now want the rule changed.

The question is not so much what is the particular of the law, but enforcement of it on the part of the Speaker, and especially obedience on the part of the House. The report of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN], if adopted, will have no influence in expediting the business of the House, or making this body a dignified body, but it will, in the first instance, attempt to reform their own conduct. A great deal of party prejudice finds its way into this Hall. A stranger who visits the Capitol would sometimes imagine that we were divided into armed bands, each ready to give battle to the other. It is nothing uncommon to hear a member allude to another substantially as “the honorable the damned rascal on the other side.” [Great laughter.]

Mr. HILL. He precedes it with the designation, “my friend.”

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Oh, yes! I made reference to a particular gentleman. But I will not pursue the matter further. Every one will feel that I could not have intended any personal application of my remarks. [Laughter.] I am willing, if it would conduce to the dignity and good of the House, to let someone else, on the worst offender in this presence. I will suffer occasionally if I can reform the manners of the House. [Laughter.] This is a grievous evil. It is bringing this House into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace. We ought to stop it. I suggest that, whatever course we adopt, we ought to agree to be true and loyal to it; that we ought to agree to respect each other’s prejudices of birth and education. Then, perhaps, we may hope to control these prejudices. Let us, if we need be, take a “step backwards,” for there is not one of us, I think, who will not agree to do so. None of us will agree to be great to be authorized to say, “I tread no step backwards.” Let us go back to our rules, and without regard to party or prejudice, let us maintain them. Let us cause gentlemen to know, that when they refuse to yield obedience to them, they not only destroy their own dignity, but bring reproach upon the body itself.

Mr. Chairman, I have said this much because, for the last four or five weeks, I have felt inclined to express myself privately to members, and to address them to forget, for a while, party prejudice, and resolve to extricate the House from its deserved censure it has suffered, for weeks past, from a watchful people. I trust the House will not regard what I have said in the light of a lecture, but rather as an earnest but kind appeal, pertinent and proper, I trust, to the occasion. I desired to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] to the matter he has made, as he always does, wise and practical remarks in regard to the evils of which he complains. If he will go back behind the rules he will perceive that the true remedy is for every member to apply the reform, the remedy, to himself. The will is in the conduct of members, not in the rules.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. What is the question now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM] to the seventh amendment of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Let it be read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the question upon this amendment has been sufficiently discussed, and I do not rise to add anything to what has been said. I do not suppose the House is prepared to return to the old system out of which it emerged some fifteen or twenty years ago; and I hope the committee will consent to have the question taken now.

Mr. FLORENCE, of Massachusetts. I propose an amendment to this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is manifest that we cannot get through this business to-night, I would move that this subject be laid aside, and that we now take up the Indian appropriation bill, as we can accomplish it this evening.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Let the vote be taken upon the amendment first.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Let the question be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM].

Mr. FLORENCE, of Massachusetts. I propose an amendment to this proposition. I desire to occupy the floor upon this subject, and I do not wish to lose my privilege of offering an amendment to the proposition reported by the committee. I am aware that the question should be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], if I retain my right to offer my amendment.

The question was stated to be upon the amendment of Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, rescinding the hour rule, and with regard to written speeches.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, and Mr. VALLANDIGHAM were appointed to act as tellers.

The vote being taken, the tellers reported 54 in the affirmative, and 70 in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to lay aside the subject under consideration, for the purpose of taking up the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], I desire to state that this subject of the revision of the Indian department, will be made the special order, and from day to day until the subject was completed, and consequently to-morrow it will take precedence of all other business, and it will be the first business for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. SHERMAN was then agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON moved that the committee do now rise. The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes thirty-four, noes not counted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 215, being a bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1861.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the motion of Mr. SHERMAN, to strike out all from and including line eight hundred and sixty-one to and including line eleven hundred and sixty-seven, being the portion of the bill relating to appropriations included in another Indian appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN moved that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a recommendation to pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KUNKEL moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. MILLSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. STANTON reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order bringing the report of the committee on the revision of the rules of the House of Representatives; that they had made progress, but had come to no conclusion thereon; also, that the committee had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 215) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1861, and had directed him to report the same with an amendment to the House, and a recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. SHERMAN moved the previous question upon the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was stated to be upon concurring in the amendment of the committee of the Whole, being to strike out all from line eight hundred and eleven to line eleven hundred and sixty-seven, inclusively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTROVERSED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to present to the House the minority report of the Committee of Elections, in regard to the contested-election case in the first congressional district of Michigan. The majority report in the same case having already been received and laid over till Monday next, I move that this minority report be printed with the majority report, and that its consideration be set for the next day.

The motion was agreed to.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. MILLS offered a resolution with reference to the printing of the Coast Survey report, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask leave to withdraw from the Committee on Commerce sundry memorials, asking for the establishment of a naval board of inspectors for steamboat boilers and hulls in the State of Kentucky, for the purpose of reference to the committee of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and leave granted accordingly.

BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

By unanimous consent, the following bills, of which previous notice had been given, were introduced and referred:

By Mr. PENDLETON: A bill to establish a port of entry at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio—referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill to fix the salaries of the judges of the district court within and for the district of the State of Ohio—referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STOKES: A bill for the relief of John Randolph, of Warren county, Tennessee—referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill for the relief of Elizabeth Smith, of Coffee county, Tennessee—referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GROW, from the Committee on Territories, asked that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 306, being a bill providing for the appointment of two additional Indian agents in the Territory of New Mexico; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to take from the table Senate bill No. 5, making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point, for the purpose of referring the same to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will state the reason why I make that motion, and I trust no gentleman will oppose it. That bill contains an important amendment, which is intended for the benefit of the State which I in part represent. It is an amendment providing the means for putting on foot a regiment of volunteers provided for by law during the last Congress. The Military Committee of this House have had all the facts in relation to this subject before them for some time, and have been giving their anxious consideration to the subject. I think the bill will be taken up and referred to the Military Committee, so that action may be taken upon it as speedily as possible.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the bill being taken up; but it ought to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee of Ways and Means, but for this reason: The Committee on Military Affairs have had before them all the information in relation to this matter, and are better prepared to act speedily upon it than any other committee, without the same source of information, could possibly be.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

The question was upon the reference of the bill. Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and I refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs would be a departure from the established precedent of the House. I suppose this thing has never been done, but those bills have always been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. If you refer these bills, in this stage of discussion, to the various committees, they will be loaded down with propositions of this sort. Here is a most important amendment, as to a new regiment in Texas, supported upon a bill providing appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point. If this practice is indulged in, these bills will be loaded down so that some of them will hardly get through the House at all.

Now, I have no objection to the regiment being ordered to service in Texas, if that is all that seems to me that to refer this bill—a bill introduced into this House by the Committee of Ways and Means; a bill intended to carry out existing laws; a bill which has been loaded down by the Senate with an appropriation larger than the original bill, to the Committee on Military Affairs, to be loaded down with new subjects, would be virtually overthrowing the rules of this House, and would lead to a practice which would involve this House in irremediable difficulty.

Mr. STANTON. It will be remembered that some few days, since the House referred to the Committee on Military Affairs a joint resolution making an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the purpose of defending the frontiers of Texas. This Military Academy bill comes back to the House as a Senate amendment providing for the same object. The Military Committee have had under consideration the joint resolution referred to them heretofore, and have obtained information which has been in possession of the Executive Department. They have considered the question of the Military Academy bill, and referred it to the Military Academy bill. Now, sir, if there ever was any propriety in referring any question connected with military affairs to the Military Committee, it does seem to me proper in a case where a part of the same subject, or the same subject in a different form, has already been referred to that same committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask the gentleman if he has ever known, during his experience in this House, of an instance where an appropriation bill, which was sent here by the Senate, had been referred to any other committee than the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. STANTON. I am not prepared to answer that question. I am not familiar with the history of this House. Nor am I prepared to say what the Military Committee have done with the amendment to the Military Academy bill, if referred to them, as a question of propriety—whether they would or would not recommend the passage of the bill with such an amendment. Whether the committee would consider it upon its merits, or whether they would not, I do not know.

But there is another question, and it may as well be settled now as at any other time. This question was disposed of, not entirely to my satisfaction, the other day, upon the motion to refer the Army bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I believe, and have believed for years, that the practice which has prevailed of sending all these bills to the Committee of Ways and Means is wrong, and I think this case is a proof of the correctness of my position. The House, when the same question involved in this amendment came before it in a different form from an appropriation bill, or of an amendment to an appropriation bill, sent it to the Committee on Military Affairs without controversy, and without claiming that it was not a proper reference. And now the Military Academy bill came back from the Senate with an amendment relating to the same subject; and why should it not be sent to the same committee?

I take it that this is one of the best arguments in support of the position I advocate, that such a question should be referred to the Military Committee. It ought to go to the Military Committee, because it is a subject which has been investigated by them. They have made inquiry into the condition of that frontier, and the necessities of the public service, and they are prepared to act upon it.

Now, I desire to say, that the Senate at this session for the first time, so far as I know, has adopted the policy which I now propose the House shall adopt, and sent this identical Military Academy bill to the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, and not to the Committee on Finance. This is an indication that it is the purpose of the Senate to adopt the policy I propose should be adopted in the House—to distribute the business of the various committees to what I cannot but regard the appropriate committees.

Now, sir, permit me to say, in this connection, that this question of expenditures and appropriations is one that can be better settled by the appropriate committees, because the appropriate committees are channels through which information comes in reference to their particular branches of public service, and to which every citizen has a right to know, and which they come for information. Since the discussion which occurred the other day, I have received, as the organ of the Committee on Military Affairs, information that, in the opinion of a very intelligent officer of the Army, there is one branch of the military service which requires no other charge upon the public Treasury in time of peace—that is, the flying artillery.

It is said that that branch of the service has not fired a single gun, except for a salute, since the capture of the city of Mexico; and that it will never fire another until we have an invasion, or make an invasion; and then you can train a corps of flying artillery in sixty days. And yet you are spending $1,000,000 a year, in time of peace, for a branch of service which is of no more practical use than the flying artillery of the Romans. If the House had seen proper to send the Army bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, they would have investigated the condition of the flying artillery, and would probably have reported in favor of a diminution of the expenses of the Army, and would have understood, nobody would have thought of sending that matter to the Committee of Ways and Means, because it has no charge of the military arm of the public service.

I propose, now that this subject is taken up by the House, to make it test question as to whether the House intends to adhere to the policy which seemed to be recognized by the vote the other day. I should have acquiesced in that decision of the House with great cheerfulness, if it had been the spontaneous decision of the House, and I should have, open, public argument submitted to it. But I know, and you know, that when the roll-call was completed, and members had expressed their opinions upon the merits of that controversy, there were half a dozen votes changed through private influences brought to bear upon members, to the effect that the Committee of Ways and Means would be disgraced by a reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to acquiesce in a decision of the House which is based upon such influences and instrumentalities. I shall ask for a reconsideration of that question. I hope the House will give it to me when they take a vote upon the commitment of the bill which is now pending before it. There is also a motion pending to reconsider the commitment of the fortification bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That motion I am prepared to call up whenever the House is disposed to act. I do not suppose, in the present thin attendance in the House, that it is desirable to decide this question in reference to the commitment and disposition of appropriation bills; but that it shall be decided to-morrow, in a fuller House.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I will leave that the House adjourns. I understand that the motion to commit will be the first question in the morning, and that the gentleman now occupying the floor will then be entitled to it.

Mr. STANTON. I will yield to the motion to adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word, while the attention of the members present is directed to this matter, in addition to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] has said. Upon the general question, I do not suppose I can add anything to the views already expressed.

In addition to the resolution to which he refers, referring this subject to the Military Committee, on the day after the House elected a Speaker, or as soon as the House was ready to proceed to business, a bill was referred to the Military Committee, giving them charge of the subject, and a resolution has since been referred to them. Since that time, and before it, and continually since our arrival here, no mail has come to this Capitol, to my colleagues or myself, but what brings up papers and letters announcing the continuation of hostilities upon the frontier, the murdering of men, women, and children, and the carrying of people into captivity; and it is but a continuation of the state of war which has existed upon our frontier for five years. It is a matter which requires urgent action; and we should be diligent, in the highest and most censurable regard, in our duty to our constituents, if we did not urge and insist that the House shall act upon the question. The whole subject is before the Military Committee. Common sense and the dictates of reason would seem to require that that committee should have control of the subject.

In asking that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, I have no assurance whatever that the action of that committee will be one way or the other. I have heard no expression of opinion by its members, but I am sure that committee on the subject. We have to rely upon the sense of justice and right of that committee as to what they will do. I only ask its reference to that committee in conformity with the motion of my colleague, because they have had the whole subject before them. It is their duty to examine and report upon it; and the report of the Military Committee will have authority with the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Texas that the only motion now before the House is a motion to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir. My colleague made the motion first to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. I certainly made the motion distinctly to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. Whether the motion was heard and entertained by the Speaker or not, I do not know.

Mr. REAGAN. In conformity with the views of my colleague and the action of the Committee on Military Affairs, that it would be better to have a fuller vote on this question, I will now yield for a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it would be better to have this matter put in a proper shape before it is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs is not considered by the Chair as now pending.

Mr. REAGAN. It was the first motion submitted.

Mr. HAMILTON. It has precedence, I think, of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. Gentlemen near me, on both sides, bear me out in the fact that I made the motion, although the Speaker may not have heard or entertained it.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no doubt the gentleman made the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair distinctly heard the gentleman from Texas move to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, but at that time the gentleman from Texas had not been recognized as entitled to the floor, and the bill was not then before the House. Afterwards, when the bill had been taken up, the gentleman from Ohio obtained the floor, and moved to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HAMILTON. Then I submit the motion now that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REAGAN. I will now yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

PROTECTION OF FEMALE PASSENGERS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Before the House adjourns, I ask that Senate bill No. 3 may be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It refers to the subject-matter of a bill which has already passed the House.

Mr. RUFFIN. I withdraw my motion temporarily.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The bill to which I refer is one in relation to the protection of female passengers.

There being no objection, the Senate bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carrying of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

And then, on motion of Mr. RUFFIN, (at five minutes to five o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 16, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GURLEY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:
Referring to my communication of the 5th instant to the Senate, in answer to its resolution of the 23d February, 1860, in relation to the communication which I have received from the Governor of TEXAS, and the documents accompanying it, concerning alleged hostilities now existing on the Texas frontier, I now have the honor to submit for the consideration of that body the following papers: Dispatch from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Texas, dated February 28, 1860.
Dispatch from the Governor of TEXAS to the Secretary of War, dated March 8, 1860.
Dispatch from the Acting Secretary of War to the Governor of TEXAS, dated March 14, 1860.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1860.
On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the message was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement of the trade and commerce of the United States with the British North American Provinces annually, since 1850; which was, on motion of Mr. WILSON, referred to the Committee on Commerce; and a motion by him to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the city council of the city of Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, praying that beacon lights may be established and kept up in the harbor of that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a paper in relation to the claim of Barrow, Porter & Crenshaw, contractors for carrying the mail from Kansas City, Missouri, to Stockton, California, for mules stolen and wagons destroyed by the Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAMMOND presented papers in relation to the claim of Captain William L. Hudson, of the United States Navy, for the reimbursement of certain expenditures made by him while in command of the United States steamship Niagara, engaged in laying the Atlantic cable; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GREEN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, requesting a reimbursement of money paid by that State in repelling an incursion of the Osage Indians in 1837; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

Mr. GREEN also presented eight memorials of citizens of Dakota Territory, praying Congress to grant to them, at the earliest possible moment, a territorial organization; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Eli Green, a soldier in the Arrowstock expedition, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That Samuel Beck leave leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

PETITIONS RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Lemuel Wooster, praying a reimbursement of money incurred while employed as a waiter to a militia officer in the United States service, during the late war with Great Britain, with the address as clerk to the Post Office at Peoria, Illinois, be recommended to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) providing for the manner of expending the balance of appropriation "for repairing the works and piers, in order to preserve and secure the light-house at Chicago, Illinois," reported, without amendment, and submitted an adverse report.

Mr. WILKINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of George G. Durham, asking compensation for services as a clerk in the Indian bureau, reported adversely thereon.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, I am instructed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to offer the following resolution; and I ask the action of the Senate upon it now:

Resolved, That any vacancy now existing, or which shall hereafter exist, in the places of messengers of the Senate, by death, resignation, removal, or otherwise, such vacancy existing or occurring shall not be filled by the appointment of new messengers, until it is so ordered by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have some explanation of that resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Mississippi, that there are more messengers than are needed by the Senate, while we have not quite so many laborers as we need. My object is to discontinue with the further appointment of messengers, and to leave the employment of laborers, if needed, under the control and subject to the order of the committee. These officers are not needed, and I am so informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms. This resolution is offered at his request, and the committee, after considering it, have thought it best to discontinue with the appointment of additional messengers, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. If the committee having charge of the subject think we have too many officers, of course I have no objection to lessening the number. The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BIGLER. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 10) which is a general supplement to the Patent Office laws, for the purpose of having it recommitted. There is a section of the bill in relation to which the Department has some views to submit to the committee.

The motion to take up the bill (S. No. 10) in addition to an "Act to promote the progress of the useful arts" was agreed to.

Mr. BIGLER. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LATHAM asked, and by unanimous con-

ment obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 298) to create a separate district upon the Pacific coast, for the inspection of hulls and boilers and machinery of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PREPAYMENT OF PENNY POSTAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the prepayment of the penny post.

SALE OF ARMS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senate now to take up a bill which has been several times discussed, and remains as unfinished business. It is the bill (S. No. 45) to authorize the sale of public arms to the several States and Territories, and to regulate the appointments of superintendents of the national armories.

Mr. IVERSON. I shall not object to the motion of Mr. Fessenden from Massachusetts, with the distinct understanding at the expiration of the session, during which this bill will give way to the Private Calendar, if it shall be under discussion at that time.

The motion of Mr. DAVIS was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 23, nays 11; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 45) to authorize the sale of public arms to the several States and Territories, and to regulate the appointments of superintendents of the national armories, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Fessenden, to insert at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That the whole number of arms which may be sold as aforesaid shall be ascertained and determined in accordance with the census of the year 1850. The Territory shall be allowed to purchase a number of arms bearing a greater proportion to the whole number so ascertained and determined, than the Federal population of all the States and Territories to the aggregate Federal population of all the States and Territories of the Union, according to the census of the United States next preceding such purchase.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise not to debate this bill, but to perform an act of justice to the superintendent at Harper's Ferry, upon whose character as a public officer it seems to have been supposed, in the debate which has taken place heretofore, that some blame was attached. I desire to say that those who may suppose so are greatly mistaken. He is not only a gentleman of high character, but, as I believe, has given entire satisfaction to the Department as to the manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office. He is no military man, it is true; but if he had been, he could not have prevented the recent occurrences at Harper's Ferry. He was placed there as a civil officer to superintend the manufacture of arms. These duties, I believe, he has discharged very faithfully; and certain I am that no one enjoys a higher standing within the range of his acquaintance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that it may be requisite that I should give a very slight explanation of the amendment which I have proposed. Its design is simply to give to each State its proportion. If the Government is going into this business of manufacturing arms largely, and very largely, as is proposed by this bill, for the purpose of having them sold to the different States at a low price, to which I am opposed, it is but fair and proper that each State should have its proportion of the amount so to be sold. The amendment is simply this: that in each year the Secretary of War shall determine the amount to be sold, the surplus, whatever it may be, over and above those that it is desirable to keep for the use of the Government; and having determined that, he shall apportion that amount among the States and Territories; and that each State and Territory shall have a right to purchase the proportion of the whole number sold which would belong to it according to its Federal population. I think it is manifestly proper. Otherwise, the whole amount might be purchased at once, or a very large portion of it, by a State, which thought it had a particular need for the arms on hand, and the rest would have no opportunity to purchase during that year. It might be so, because, if no State should choose to purchase its proportion in any given year, that number would be carried to the surplus to be sold the next year, and so would be distributed. I cannot conceive of any objection to it, and it seems to me manifestly fair and right, and best calculated to advance the purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the amendment does more than is designed by the Senator from Maine. As I understand his remarks, it would restrain the demand, and would not increase at all the supply on hand. That, I suppose, is not his object. I do not treat arms as surplus. I do not think we have too many; I do not think we have enough. I think, however, we have the machinery and power to enable us to increase the manufacture, if we had the means whereby to increase it. As the bill is now drawn, the issue is put upon the discretion of the Secretary of War. To make Government practice, we must have some discretionary power in men; they are the agents. If he thinks we cannot spare any, none will be sold. This amendment seems to provide as though some were to be sold anyhow. That is not my view. If Congress should appropriate money enough to work the armories up to the full "plant," there would be none for sale, because then we should want all the increase of arms which the armories would supply. I think if the Senator will notice the manner in which I state his proposition in an amendment which I shall offer, it will be found that it covers so much as I understand him to present in his remarks. I propose, as a substitute for his amendment, this proviso:

Provided, That the sales of each year shall not exceed the increased manufacture which may result from the sale, and that the whole number to be sold, if less than the requisitions made, shall be divided between the States applying in proportion to the census, as arms furnished by the United States are now distributed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator and myself probably entertain very different ideas on the whole subject. In the first place, I presume that he is not in favor of the sale of the manufacture of arms at the armories up to the whole capacity of the armories, provided the States purchase the amount over and above what it may be advisable to retain at the armories. As I stated, I am opposed to the proposition to use the arms in such a manner that the Government becoming a manufacturer for the benefit of the States. As the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Symonds] suggested the other day, I do not think the Government should go any further than it may deem wise to order to manufacture for the States, if arms it is expedient to keep on hand. I doubt very much whether the proposition of this bill is not carrying the business of manufacture by the Government beyond its legitimate bounds, and I am not, therefore, disposed to vote for it.

My proposition, however, is, that if this measure passes so that the Government shall go into the manufacture of arms to the extent to which purchases may be carried by the States, the whole supply shall not be monopolized by one State. The number that can be sold will be ascertained, undoubtedly, after a year or two of experiment, and what I propose is, that we begin with the simple system of dividing the amount which it may be expedient to sell among the States and Territories, according to their Federal population.

My proposition varies from the amendment proposed to divide the amount to be sold among the States applying. There may be a very different degree of readiness among the States to apply; and, as I said before, the State first applying might get the number of arms required, and leave a very unfeeling number to another State. My idea is, for the first year, for instance, to leave it just as it is, that each State and each Territory shall be at liberty to purchase its share; and if it is found that there is an amount of money on hand, then to increase the manufacture the next year, and let other States which have not been formerly benefited to purchase their share. My amendment provides precisely for the division among the several States, according to their Federal population, if they see fit to apply; you cannot obligate any State, but if they do so, they shall have, whatever it may be, on hand, that is not taken for those States for the first year, will be carried, of course, to the number of arms that will be on hand for sale the next year; and the money received will be appropriated in the same way to the manufacture of arms, which will be used until it is to be divided. I see no difficulty about it. The proposition of the Senator does not answer my purpose. It answers his very well; but it is not my idea. Perhaps my idea is not sufficiently defined in my own mind; but I think I understand what I mean.

Mr. DAVIS. The difference, I think, is very plain. I suppose that if the sales furnish means to run up to the full "plant" of the armories, they will increase the manufacture twenty-two thousand stand of arms per annum. If only ten thousand are required, they will replace the ten thousand by the money received for the ten thousand they issue. It is more than I should have required, they make no more over and above what we make now annually. Then the Senator must perceive that, according to his proposition, he would be providing at some future date to take from the Government arms which had never been replaced to the Government. If, on the other hand, for requisitions are for twenty-two thousand, and money is paid in which replaces the twenty-two thousand, the Government loses nothing.

But the Senator commits this great mistake: he treats it as a new proposition. He says, "if we are to go into this." We are in it; we have been in it—since the foundation of the armories we have been in it; and there is now a standing appropriation of $200,000 per annum to make arms for the militia. Now, the question is, whether all the States are to be supplied with arms, or whether the militia may require, or whether each State will tax itself for such additional number as it may desire to possess. I think the advantage is in the latter method; that the States taxing themselves will take better care of the arms than if all the States were taxed to furnish them, instead of laying a tax to increase the manufacture for an increased issue, we shall be replacing all the arms in the hands of the Government which are taken out by this method, and there is no charge falling on any, except those who are willing to be taxed. If we are to go into it, for instance, chooses to buy as many arms as it requires, it hands the money to the Governor, who makes the requisition and pays for the arms it needs. That volunteer company, then, you may see, will not be taking the money out of the State in such a manner that they will be ready for use whenever required. Our policy is to arm the militia. It is a mere question of method; it is as to the form in which it shall be done—nothing more; and all that is necessary to restrain it I thought was in the amendment. If the Senator is so wanting, it is contained in the amendment which I now propose to substitute in lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. [Mr. FOSTER in the chair.] The question is on the following amendment, offered by the Senator from Mississippi as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine: to strike out all after the word "provided," and insert:

That the sales of each year shall not exceed the increased manufacture which may result from the sale, and that the whole number to be sold, if less than the requisitions made, shall be divided between the States applying in proportion to the census, as arms furnished by the United States are now distributed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 19; as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Briggs, Butler, Burt, Chenoweth, Crittenden, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gray, Griswold, Hammond, Harts, Iveson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of California, Johnson of Louisiana, Mallory, Nicholson, Pearce, Powell, Sebastian, Thompson, Toombs, and Wigfall—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Colman, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fox, Foster, Grimes, Hamlin, Harlan, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Winthorp, and Wilson—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. President, I have listened attentively to the elaborate discussion which has heretofore taken place on this bill. I answered it in the affirmative, but I am not sure of it now. I think it is salutary in all its provisions. I do not sympathize with those Senators who seem to apprehend that this will be bringing the Government establishments in antagonism to the private arms manufacturers in the country. The question is not whether they are to be used or not of Congress. We usually appropriate, I think, $200,000 a year for the manufacture of arms. If it should become necessary to enlarge or diminish the amount, it will always be under the control of Congress. We all know that the whole militia system has been pretty much reduced to the volunteer system, and the volunteer corps throughout the various States is the only rally to the support of the country; and to enable them to do that, I think it becomes the duty of Congress to arm them with the best arms the country can afford. Experience has shown that the best can be got from the armories of the United States.

I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question, but to ask my friend from Mississippi to accept an amendment which I think ought to be made to this bill. We are all aware that, under the modern improvements, the percussion lock has taken the place of the old style of cap lock, and the Government has adopted a primer which is essential to the use of its arms. That invention is owned exclusively by the United States, and those primers are manufactured at public expense, and under the control of the Government of the United States. I therefore propose, as an amendment, to insert in the sixth line of the first section, after the words "ammunition," the words "and primers prepared by the United States."

Mr. DAVIS. There can be no objection to that. If any of the States wish to apply for primers for the percussion lock, and to purchase primers manufactured in the arms and ammunitions factory, I have no objection to allowing it, under the discretion proposed to be lodged in the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) There was a motion before the Senate to strike out the first section of the bill, but the amendment of the Senator from Alabama was adopted before taking the question on striking out. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that. I do not know anything about these primers; but this seems to be going into another speculation on the part of the Government.

The yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether the United States is the owner of any primer. I have heard that there is considerable competition about the Government business. They are all under patent; and to have a general provision to furnish primers, without knowing how much is to be paid for them, or anything about it, seems to me to be leaping in the dark.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I will inform the Senator, as I stated the fact, that I made before that I understand the Government purchased what is called Maynard's primer, and has the exclusive right to prepare those primers now. I learn, on inquiry, that there is not an establishment in the United States that can prepare them all to compare with the primers prepared by the United States under this patent; and if the arms which that primer is necessary to accompany be disposed of without it, the arms will be a nuisance. Experience has shown that these primers can be best manufactured by the Government; and I believe it has the exclusive right to manufacture them. The amendment simply authorizes the Government to dispose of the primers, which are a necessary accompaniment to the arms, based on the principles of modern improvement with the arms themselves. It is not a monopoly in the bill, and the amendment will make it complete.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that the Government became interested in Maynard's primer—

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I think I can state the whole proposition in a moment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am always glad to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish simply to state the facts; not to argue the matter. The Government purchased a right to use an improvement of Dr. Maynard—being a primer. The Government has manufactured some of these primers; they are also manufactured on private account. The Government did not purchase and did not desire to have the exclusive right to the Government; only purchased the right to make them to any extent which it pleased. It has so happened, however, that the principal difficulty in the primer was to get a cement which would hold the two strips together, and prevent the capsule from being exposed to the weather, and prevent any capsule from conveying its fire to the adjoining one. This, which seemed to be very small in the beginning, has thus far proved an obstacle not overcome anywhere, except at one arsenal, and in the hands of one ordnance officer. The only good primers which have been made, have been made at the Frankford arsenal, and because of the skill of the ordnance officer. This proposition, as I understand it, from the Senator from Alabama, is to authorize those who purchase the improved arms which may have the primer, or can be used without it, to purchase also the primers prepared by the Government, under his impression, which is in the present state of the manufacture, that they cannot get good ones anywhere else. That is all there is in it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had an impression, derived from conversations among gentlemen, that there had been a recent invention, which made that primer much more valuable, but that it was not yet perfected exactly. There was an original defect in it, that it would not stand exposure to water; but I understood that recently there had been an invention which had fair to be successful, and to be a public protection, to keep this dry, although immersed in water for several days, and that has not yet been brought to perfection. Now, until it is brought to perfection, it seems to be useless to make these provisions; and more especially if the Department, on the authority of this proposition, is to purchase any invention, and make a job of it; and I confess I am very suspicious of jobs by the Government. I think, from what I have heard in relation to the matter, that it is hardly time yet to say for a certainty that this thing is completed, finished, and perfected. I believe it has recently been improved, and calculations, since I have been in the Senate, with reference to altering arms, &c., that have turned out to be pretty bad ones. We have been led away by this talk of great improvements, and acted hastily, and wasted money. I think had we waited, we would have been wiser. Dr. Maynard's genius with reference to arms, but I want to act carefully.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Senator from Mississippi is more accurately informed than I am in relation to the Government's interest in this patent. I perhaps could have acquired the information if I had examined more particularly into it; but my impression was that the Government owned the exclusive right to make these primers. I stand corrected now by him. The view is certainly an objectionable one, and to use the invention to any extent is unpleasant. Now, if this is a valuable invention, and those who purchase these arms desire it, my amendment authorizes them to have the primer. The President is not absolutely required to have these primers accompany the arms; nor are the companies bound absolutely to purchase them. If the improvement alluded to by the Senator from Maine has been made, and there is another primer superior to the one the Government has now got the right to use, the volunteer companies seek it. All I ask is for the President allow the volunteer companies or the States who desire to purchase these arms to purchase the primer, and give him authority to sell it. It is not to interfere with any inventions that may take place hereafter. If it is, it is superseded by subsequent inventions which desire the arms will not purchase these primers, but will look elsewhere for a better article.

Mr. HAMLIN. We would like the attention of the Senator from Mississippi for a single moment. I want to invite his attention to this amendment for a single point. The bill, if I understand it, provides for the distribution of such arms as shall be applied for and paid for by the Executives of certain States. Well, suppose a certain number are applied for, purchased and paid for. Under this bill, if this amendment shall be adopted, certain States also to be supplied by the Government, if the amendment shall be adopted in the words in which it is presented, how many primers are to be allowed? I ask what is to be paid for them? I ask, in addition to that, if this provision is to stop by the Government, or if it is to be an order made on the Government for these primers, or a demand whenever the persons receiving the arms may want them? It is certainly very indefinite. There is nothing about it to tell when they are to be furnished, how they are to be furnished, whether they are to be furnished once or continuously. The thing ought to be put in a different shape from what it now is, it seems to me, so that it shall be at least intelligible.

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the inquiry. I suppose, of course, from the language, it means the cost price. I will also say that I attached no little importance to it as not to think beyond an instant about it when it was proposed. My own opinion is, that the militia do not want them; that they will not buy them; that there will not be a hundred dollars' worth of them ever sold to the militia, though when they go into active service they may require them, and then they will be furnished by the United States; but for any purpose of instruction, or any use at home, I do not believe they will ever require the primers or desire them. The arms are made for cap and primer both. The habit is to use the cap. The primer may be as defective as some think; it may be as good as others deem it. It has not been sufficiently perfected as yet to give any confidence in the manufacture. But one manufacture has been made in which I have confidence. I do not believe the militia will buy any considerable number of them. I do not believe my friend from Alabama has much interest in it. I am sure he has no interest in any plan of improving the primer, but has moved the amendment under the belief that a good primer had already been made.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The Senator is correct; it is a matter in which I have very little interest, but it has been brought to my notice by some persons who feel an interest in the matter, and who have a knowledge of it. In looking into the bill, it was suggested to me that the amendment had better be made, to enable the States, if they see proper, to purchase primers to accompany the arms.

Mr. DAVIS. If my friend from Alabama will allow me, as there is some confusion about the effect of this proposition, and as private establishments, as private manufacturers of these primers is perfected by the Government, will very soon thereafter make them on the same plan—for the Government has no secret, (any manufacturer can go and learn exactly what element is needed in the making of them, and the Government perfects it, private establishments will make it on their own account—I do not think it of consequence to insist on the amendment.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I do not think it of any great consequence myself, and have offered it to the wisdom of others. I should like to see the amendment incorporated in the bill. I am clear in the conviction that it is to affect no private interest; that if a better article is invented hereafter, or if, upon experiment, the volunteers do not like this primer, but prefer the cap, they will have the option, and that is all I seek to effect by this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bragg, Brown, Bryant, Clingman, Clifton, Fick, Fitzpatrick, Green, Hale, Hendon, Iveson, Johnson, Knapp, Knowlton, Leake, Tresser, Kennedy, Mallory, Nicholson, Powell, Sebastian, and Tilden.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Collier, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Fox, Foster, Hamilton, Hildreth, Johnson, Keith, Thompson, Wade, Wigfall, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to announce the special order, the hour having arrived for the consideration of the Private Calendar, which is the special order for the day.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I suppose it will take but a few moments to finish the bill, and I move to postpone the special order for that purpose.

Mr. IVERSON. If it is understood that the question is to be taken at once, I shall interpose no objection to the motion, if it is to be given up to discussion, I shall not consent to let the Private Calendar be passed over. It will be remembered that we lost the whole of last Friday out of respect and consideration to a distinguished individual who was laid to rest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to postpone the Private Calendar.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Bragg, Bright, Brown,

Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gorin, Hammond, Hunter, Iremson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Lane, Latham, Mallon, Mason, Nicholson, Powell, Sebastian, Tompkins, and Wigfall—47.

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Colburn, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Kildee, Ransom, Say Eeck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—44.

So the special order was postponed.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. Simmons) to strike out the first section of the bill, after the enacting clause.

Mr. HALE. Let the section be read as it has been amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue to any State or Territory of the United States, on application of the Governor thereof, arms made at the United States Arsenal, and primers prepared by the United States, to such extent as may be required from the public supplies without injury or inconvenience to the service of the General Government, upon payment therefor in cash at the time of delivery, in each case, of an amount sufficient to replace, by fabrication at the national arsenal, the arms so furnished. That if the Secretary of War should have exceeded the increased manufacture which may result from said sales; and that the whole number to be sold, if less than the requisitions made, shall be the difference between the States applying to purchase pro rata, as arms furnished by the United States are now distributed.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on striking out the first section of the bill after the enacting clause, which has been read by the Secretary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall vote against striking out the first section of the bill. I see no objection to that section, and am prepared to vote for it; but I am utterly opposed to the second section of the bill, and will take this occasion to remark, that I was unavoidably absent the other day. I understand a vote was cast against striking out that section. I shall vote against striking this out; but when the bill comes into the Senate, I shall move to strike out the second section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out the first section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not propose to detain the Senate by speaking on the bill or the first section, but simply to state, as an officer would, as I can, the reasons why I shall be constrained to vote against it. In the first place, it lodged in the Secretary of War a discretion over the arms of this Government that Congress ought not to lodge in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, that that has been amended. The discretion has been controlled by an amendment which was offered, limiting the sales to the increase—the increase resulting from the sales.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The increase after this year?

Mr. DAVIS. Say that requisitions are made for the equivalent of twenty thousand stand of arms. If they can increase the manufacture twenty thousand stand of arms by selling twenty thousand, they are permitted to do it; not otherwise, under the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the effect of the bill as it stands would be to authorize the Secretary of War to sell the arms we now have on hand.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course he will sell the equivalent. That is to say, if requisitions are made for twenty thousand, and the money is deposited for twenty thousand, he can sell twenty thousand and make twenty thousand more. It is true that he can increase the manufacture twenty-two thousand; but if that should be varied so that he could not increase the manufacture, then he would violate the spirit of the law, and I think its letter, if he sold anything more than the equivalent of the money he received.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am unable to state the precise number of arms now on hand at the arsenal of the United States; perhaps there are half a million. I understand the effect of the bill to be that if any one or more States of the Union should apply to the Secretary of War to purchase all there are on hand, it would be within his power to sell them under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will read the amendment, I think he will change his opinion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let the section be read as it has been amended.

The Secretary read it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on striking out the first section, resulted—yeas 20, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Colburn, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Ransom, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Briggs, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Douglas, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Fowler, Grimes, Hunter, Iremson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Lane, Latham, Mallon, Powell, Rice, Sebastian, Tompkins, and Wigfall—20.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now move to strike out the second section. I will not detain the Senate by an argument on the question. We have had it argued frequently in the Senate. I have always been for the civil against the military superintendence, and I am unwilling to restore the military system. I desire a vote on that question. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Read the second section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether the amendment has not been put and failed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That was in committee, not in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to know whether it was in committee or in the Senate that the motion was made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The record will show.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time the question was taken; but he is informed that by the record it appears that this motion has already been passed upon by the Senate. It is not, therefore, in order now.

Mr. HALE. Let the second section be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 2. And he is further enacted, That so much of the act approved August 5, 1854, as authorizes the appointment of a superintendent of each of the national arsenals, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the superintendents of those arsenals shall hereafter be selected from the Ordnance corps.

Mr. HALE. Is it not in order to move to amend that section now in the Senate? A motion has been made to strike it all out, and that has been voted down. I understand.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order to move to amend that section in the Senate. It can be moved to be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole, and there amended.

Mr. HALE. My impression is, that the only vote taken on it has been a motion to strike it all out, which has been negatived.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That is so.

Mr. HALE. That does not imply that we cannot move to strike out a portion of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to suggest to the Chair, that if I understand it is competent in the Senate to offer any amendment that could have been made in committee; and, although a motion to strike out the whole section has been rejected, we can still amend it by striking out a part; otherwise, by offering a motion to strike out and rejecting it, you cut off all amendments. It strikes me that it is perfectly in order to amend the section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain a motion to amend the section.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend it by striking out the enacting clause of the section.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That does not reach the question.

Mr. HALE. Perhaps it does not.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is apparent that this is going to lead to a long debate, and we shall lose the time that belongs to private legislation. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed, and that we proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely say, that if it is not the courtesy of the Senate to allow votes to be taken on the bill, and they propose to make a discussion which has no legitimate end, I will not ask the Senate longer to waste time about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not propose to debate it, but I thought it was evidently going to lead to a discussion of the whole day.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to get up any discussion at all; but I want a vote on this proposition, and I move to strike out all after the word "repealed" in the fifth line of the second section.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion before the Senate is to postpone the further consideration of this bill, and take up the order of the day, which is the Private Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. If there is to be no debate, I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island does not desire to put his motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not if there is to be no debate. My object is to save the special order, the Private Calendar.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not rise to discuss the question; but I wish to suggest to the honorable Senator from Mississippi, that from a careful reading of the first section with the proviso he has put in, I do not see that the section and proviso taken together are very clear, to say the least, in the construction to be given to them. I confess that, for one, I cannot understand the precise meaning of the first section and the proviso, and I do not see how they can be practically construed and acted upon. I suggest that they be postponed, and that the two sections considered together by the honorable Senator himself. At all events I cannot see what is to be their practical effect. The section itself goes on to say that the Secretary of War may dispose of all the arms which are not necessary in the service of the Government. The proviso says that the sales in no one year shall exceed the proceeds which are received. I do not see how it can be operated at all. We have got to sell before we receive any proceeds, and we must manufacture before we can understand whether the proceeds equal the manufacture of a given year, or the manufacture equals the proceeds.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill, and to take up the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of those bills on the Private Calendar which shall not be objected to or give rise to debate. ["No! no!"] There are a number of cases that have precedence which will consume time. ["No! no!"] Well, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. A division was asked for on the motion to postpone before the Chair announced the result; but I suppose it was not heard.

Mr. LANE. I asked for a division. I think we had better go through with the bill of the Senator from Mississippi.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the call for a division, and he waited to ascertain whether a division was asked. The Chair, however, certainly will not assume the prerogative of deciding, and will put the question again.

Mr. LANE. My opinion is that we shall gain time by finishing this bill while we have it up.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. DAVIS. I must interpose. I have yielded now for more than half an hour on the promise of the chairman of the Military Committee, who reported this bill, as well as the Senator from Alabama, that if it occupied over twenty minutes, the floor would yield, and let the bill go over. It has occupied thirty minutes. I trust they will not press the consideration of it any further.

Mr. DAVIS. If the chairman of the Committee on Claims wishes to proceed with the Private Calendar, I shall not insist on the motion.

Mr. LANE. Very well. I withdraw the call for a division on the motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Foster, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 315) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1861.

The message further announced that the House had ordered, this day, at twelve o'clock and thirteen minutes, the printing of a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, communicating a report in reference to the nature of the relations in Bayou Manchac, in the Mississippi river.

In June Captain Blaney received five thousand brick, and paid for them.

In July, 1836, the contract was forwarded by Captain Blaney to the engineer department, and on the 30th of the same month it was returned, with the objection, from the engineer, that there was no readily ascertainable value of a good accompanying it.

There was no agreement between the petitioner and Blaney that the contract should be altered, rescinded, or reconfirmed by either party, or that its approval by any superior officer was necessary.

On receiving the communication from the engineer department, Blaney refused to fulfill the contract. He alleged that the petitioner had not the means to fulfill it, and that it was defective. But he owed Potter nearly six hundred dollars, and if Blaney had paid him for his bricks, he would, in the contract, he would have been relieved from his indebtedness.

Blaney utterly refused to comply with the stipulations of the contract on the part of the petitioner. He refused to sign upon the petitioner's transferring his property to Potter, which, by the arbitrary and unjustifiable conduct of the officer, the petitioner, he was compelled to do.

Blaney having thus rescinded the contract, then accepted from Potter the bricks made by the petitioner, for which he paid him from eight dollars to eight dollars and fifty cents per thousand.

The petitioner in this case sought relief in the Court of Claims, and a full hearing was had in that tribunal, and the facts above recited were established. The court gave an opinion in the case, contained in the following language:

"The question is, whether the petitioner is entitled to be paid for the bricks which he delivered to the Government. We think also that the evidence shows no good reason for rescinding it; that Blaney refused absolutely to receive any more of the bricks, that Crown, who was the contractor, delivered to the Government five hundred thousand bricks, for which he should have been paid $3,500 under his contract; for which sum we report a bill."

The bill thus reported passed both Houses of Congress, and Crown received the money.

There was a bill actually due to Crown at the time he was ready to deliver the bricks to the United States, in 1836, and which was detained in the Treasury of the United States by the arbitrary rescinding of Crown's contract. Your committee consider that the Government is not justly due and payable to the petitioner from the time that Blaney improperly refused to fulfill the contract, and that the Government is liable for the bricks delivered to it, as mentioned, on the 3d of March, 1837, although the petitioner has repeatedly sought it for the long period of thirty years, and yet no action by Government has been taken to fulfill the contract, and determined the amount which was justly due, should not be paid interest thereon.

On the basis of opinion that interest, at six per cent. per annum, should be paid to Mr. Crown on the said sum of $3,500, from October 1, 1840, to the 3d day of March, 1860, amounting to $2,360.

Your committee now proceed to consider the question as to the allowance to the petitioner of damages, in consequence of the breach of his contract by the Government.

Where a contract is made between two individuals, and the conditions of it are such as to bind one of the parties, there is no doubt that it is liable for the breach. The question is, whether there should be any distinction between a contract made by an individual with the Government, and one effected where an individual contracting with the Government, and not fulfilling his contract, has been subjected to damages, and who should not the Government be equally liable? Your committee are of opinion that they are.

It is in evidence that the petitioner entered into a contract with the Government, in good faith, through its authorized agent, to deliver, for the use of the Government, three million bricks, and was at considerable expense in arranging the preliminaries for the fulfillment of his contract. Mr. Crown made eight hundred thousand bricks; five hundred thousand of them were received by the officer, and have been paid for; three hundred thousand were found unsatisfactory, and rejected, leaving two million two hundred thousand still to be made by Crown when his contract was abandoned.

For reasons not apparent to your committee, the petitioner was thus compelled to retire from his enterprise, and the Government was left with the unfinished contract on his contract.

Laying aside the years of delay in the receipt of the price for the bricks, for five hundred thousand bricks, it is by no means clear that such a price is adequate to reimburse the petitioner for his preparation for the performance of an extensive and arduous undertaking. Be this as it may, the contract was rescinded by the Government without legal right, and the petitioner may be said to have been injured. It is not made in that portion of the contract which he was prevented from fulfilling.

In evidence that the bricks of the character of those furnished at Oak Island were worth, in Alexandria, in the fall of 1837, five dollars per one thousand. Allowing for the increase of the price of the bricks, and the increase of the value of the money, the price in Alexandria, and making the allowance of seventy-five cents per one thousand for the delivery of the bricks, leaving a net profit of one dollar on every thousand contracted for.

Mr. Crown is, therefore, in the opinion of your committee, entitled to the one dollar damage on every thousand of the two million two hundred thousand bricks which he was entitled to furnish under his contract at the time of its abandonment, amounting to $2,200,000. He is also entitled, for the use of Mr. Crown, as interest, $6,389.53, and as damages, $1,300, amounting to $6,589.53; for which sum they report a bill.

Mr. CLAY. This bill appears to me to be in violation of the authority of the Senate, and in violation of the practice of almost all Governments—certainly of this. In the first place, as to the damages; according to my understanding of this contract as presented in the report, it is not compensating him for any actual damage that he incurred—

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CLAY. I would rather get through; but as the Senator reported the bill, I yield to him.

Mr. IVERSON. There are no damages in this bill. I will explain to the Senator from Alabama that the report which was read was the report made by the committee, and the bill as reported allowed damages and interest both; but the Committee on Claims at the present session refused to allow damages, and only allowed interest. The present bill does not allow damages.

Mr. CLARK. I think the bill was reported as having that provision as not to confound the question of interest with the question of damages. This session the committee have left out the damages, and presented the question of interest on the sum which was not paid for over thirty years, and to which the claimant was justly entitled in 1836.

Mr. IVERSON. The question is in a nutshell. Under this contract, Congress has adjudicated that this party was entitled to a certain amount of money—and it ought to have been paid at the time that the contract was taken from him by the Government. If he had actually performed it, and which the Government subsequently used; but he did not get his pay until 1857. The Government then admitted that the amount was due to him, and therefore ought to have been paid long ago; and the question now is, whether he ought to have any more than that amount. If he had received the money at the time it was due to him, he could have made interest on it undoubtedly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask a question of the Senator from Georgia. Is there any reason given by the Court of Claims why the principal was allowed by that court? A bill was reported by the court and passed, and the principal paid. Now, what I should like to get at, is this: was interest allowed in the Court of Claims? If not, why not? If it was claimed, and was not allowed, what happened to it? Does it happen that the interest has been segregated?

Mr. IVERSON. I do not remember distinctly the facts in relation to that question; but my impression is, that the Court of Claims refused to allow interest on the general practice of the Government. They admitted the principal was due, but said that inasmuch as the Government was not in the habit of allowing interest, they would not allow it in this instance.

Mr. CLARK. The explanation cuts off most of what I intended to say in opposition to the bill; but still I think it will be a very vicious precedent, and will return to plague us here at each session of Congress. If this Government undertakes to pay interest in all such cases, the Treasury of the United States will soon be empty. There is one class of cases which have come frequently under my observation, in which the amount of interest accumulated against the Government would be a frightful sum, and that is in respect to money paid for lands where the title was not secured.

I have a case of that kind where a man, thirty or forty years ago, paid the Government for a tract of land which it was supposed they had a right to take at the time. Afterwards it was ascertained that they had no title, and he was dispossessed of land which is now worth fifty dollars an acre. The Government refused to pay him anything for the money he advanced without interest, and after examining carefully for precedents to sustain his claim to interest, which would not even indemnify him, I could not find a single case. On corresponding with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, he has been told that he has the power to pay the Government to pay interest in such a case. The case of my constituent, to which I have referred, is a much harder one than that of Mr. Crown. In that case he actually advanced his money to the Government; the Government had the benefit and the use of his money for a long period of time, and they refused to pay him anything beyond the principal. Interest is, I believe, conceded on all hands to be a matter of bargain where it is not specially provided for by law; it is merely conventional, and the Government is not bound to adhere to legal principles, for interest, and does not undertake to do so without hazarding her own credit. I am opposed to the principle, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I think it is only necessary that the Senate should understand this bill, to prevent its passage. There is a very grave principle involved in it, and I trust it will not be entered to pass the Senate as a private claim of no importance. The amount involved here is only some six thousand dollars, but the principle will reach to millions and millions of dollars if it is to be established.

The case is simply this: a contract was violated; the party to it has suffered by the violation of the contract has brought a suit, recovered his damages, and they have been paid to him. The contract was made nearly forty years ago. He sued for damages against the party violating the contract, and recovered, and has been paid his damages; and now, what? Now he comes and asks to have interest on those damages which he has recovered. The original damages being $3,500, he now asks to have $6,389 paid to him as interest upon the damages he has recovered and received for a violation of his contract. I think if the case were between private individuals interest could not be recovered in such a case. Was it ever heard of, that when one individual sues another for a violation of contract, and recovers damages for a violation of the contract, he can also get interest on the damages? They may take into consideration, and perhaps they may, the loss he might have suffered from the length of time he had lost in prosecuting his claim, but the idea that a separate claim is to come in for damages on the amount he recovered, is a new principle in the law.

I trust that such a bill as this will not pass the Senate, and I shall unite with the Senator from Alabama in asking for the yeas and nays. I am not disposed to argue the question. A statement of the case is enough. The bill shows on its face what it is. It is a violation of the principle covered for a violation of a contract made nearly forty years ago.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have been looking at the decision of the Court of Claims—it is somewhat long—to endeavor to get at the basis of this claim. I do not think there is any merit in it at all. If I understand the decision of the Court of Claims, from a very hasty perusal, there was a judgment given in favor of this claimant for $3,500, for the value of five hundred thousand bricks which he was to have delivered under his contract, and which the officer refused to receive. The court held that the delivery of the bricks entitled him to payment therefor, and that the refusal of the officer to receive them could not defeat that right. The court therefore gave him a judgment for the value of the bricks. It does not appear that the Government ever received them; but these $3,500 were paid for the bricks without their being received by the Government. Nobody knows what he did with the bricks afterwards. He may have sold them afterwards. I think it looks, from the decision, as if the Government had received the second time to another contractor. At all events, I see nothing in the decision to show that any pretense was made at the time to interest, and I cannot see on what ground interest is to be allowed on the damages which the Government has paid for the non-compliance with the contract. I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I think both the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Louisiana, have mistaken the nature of the claim. I examined this claim with great care, and last session of Congress, and I came to the conclusion that not only was it a just claim, but that the Government was in great fault for not having paid it before. There was allowed to Mr. Crown $3,500 for bricks actually made and delivered, which they refused to pay for. For some reason, the delivery of the contract was broken by the officer in charge. A portion of the bricks had been delivered, and he refused to pay, and Mr. Crown was not paid for the bricks which he had delivered—the sum of $3,500—until thirty-one years after it was due. Mr. BENJAMIN. If the bill passes, it will mean that I shall pass a message from the decision of the Court of Claims, upon which I base my observations. It is the very last sentence of the opinion of the court:

"Our opinion is, that the contract was a valid one. We think, also, that the Government was in fault in not rescinding it; that Blaney refused absolutely to receive any bricks of Crown, and that Crown then had to carry away

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....No. 76.

showing of this discrepancy. The Secretary, Governor Ford, behaved with his characteristic courtesy and candor. Upon looking into the case again, he saw, at a glance, that several items had been omitted, which the Second Auditor allowed; but, as the case was then closed, and the law, or joint resolution, had performed its office, he doubted his authority to reopen it. But, as he had no disposition to deprive the estate of the deceased of a single dollar justly due it, if Congress would confer the power to reexamine the case, it would give him pleasure to correct what was clearly an omission, and that the case should be brought to be restored.

A resolution, similar to that now before the Senate, was passed at the last session, unanimously, but failed, with very other Senate bills, in the House of Representatives, for want of time. I make no appropriation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know the amount involved in this joint resolution. There are some things in it to which I should have no objection, such as allowing the authentication of evidence that was improperly authenticated before; but as to allowing or directing officers to allow certain claims, without knowing their extent or what they are, it seems to me to be hazardous.

Mr. BROWN. This case is an old acquaintance of mine. The only point in the case, I think, is this—I had occasion once, as a member of the Finance Committee, to investigate a case by the heirs, or representatives of George Fisher, brought a claim before Congress arising out of Indian spoliation in Florida, which Congress allowed. When the Second Auditor of the Treasury undertook to settle the account, he found some items amounting perhaps to fifteen or eighteen hundred dollars, well proved; but the testimony was not certified under the seal of any court, or of the Governor of Alabama; and, therefore, and therefore alone, the items were rejected. The representatives of the claimant then went to Alabama and got this testimony certified under the seal; that is, they got the Governor of Alabama to certify that the justice before whom it was taken, was in fact a justice of the peace, thus covering the hiatus in the case, and returned it to Washington; but the accounting officers said, "they had not closed the case; it is res adjudicata," I think, in the mean time, there had been probably a change of Administration. At all events, they refused to open the case. The claimant comes, and now simply asks that, having perfected the testimony in this way, they let it pass. The accounting officers, for judgment rendered in the case non pro tunc, that the accounting officers shall treat the testimony now as they would have treated it in the beginning, if it had been well authenticated. That is the whole case. They are not required to take the testimony as true, not required to allow any money; but just to take up this testimony, now well authenticated by the certificate under the seal of Alabama, and treat it as they would have done originally if it had been thus certified. That is the whole case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This looks to me very much like opening a case which has been once passed upon by Congress, and which the officer to whom it was referred has passed upon; and opening it in this blind way without any report, without any evidence, and without any basis from the Senator from Mississippi as to the amount involved. If the amount is only eighteen hundred or two thousand dollars, it is no great matter to content about; but I think it is a very bad practice after a claim has passed Congress, and has been referred to the proper officers for adjustment, if the parties are not satisfied with the adjustment, to get other testimony which they think would entitle them to more, and then come back and ask to have it partially reopened. I look upon this as a very loose and dangerous practice; but I shall not take up time.

Mr. BROWN. I will now remind the Senator in a single word that this is not reopening the case. The case was settled as far as it went; but items in the account were rejected on a technical ground; that the testimony was not properly authenticated, and all you propose to do now is, to give him the benefit of that testimony, he having supplied the deficiency in the attestation of it. Whether he will get anything at all, is altogether a different question. I do not know that he will;

but certainly if he has a fair case, which has been rejected simply because he had not the seal of the State, or of a court to his affidavit, when he last put the seal to it he has a right, I think, to have that testimony examined, and be allowed whatever it shows him to be entitled to.

Mr. BAYARD. Is there any report from the committee of the Senate in reference to this joint resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no report at the present session; but the Chair is informed that there is a report which was made at a former session.

Mr. BAYARD. I observed that reference was made to a report of a committee of the House of Representatives, in 1857; and I have looked at that report cursorily. Congress authorized an officer of the executive department to hear and settle a claim against the Government; and after he has so settled the claim, he is authorized by the resolution to revise his action—I do not care on what ground—and become themselves an administrative or judicial body. I cannot vote for any resolution of that kind. Congress intrusted the authority to the proper officer to settle it, and he was to act just judicially. He did exercise it; and I think the party ought to abide by the decision made by him, and Congress ought not to undertake to enter into the details, for the purpose of revising the action of the officer.

Mr. BROWN. If I regarded this, or could be brought to regard it, as an attempt on the part of this claimant to revise the action of the accounting officers by courts, I would oppose it; but that is not the state of the case. I never read the report to which the Senator refers, but I am perfectly familiar with all the facts in the case; and they are, I tell you again, as I stated them: that certain items in the account were rejected for no other reason than that the testimony upon which they were based was not authenticated according to the legal requirements of the law. That defect has now been supplied, and all the party asks is, that he be allowed the benefit of his perfect testimony. Whether it will establish his claim or not, nobody pretends to say.

Mr. IVERSON. The case, as I understand it, is this: The claimant has a claim for the salary of an individual, which Government troops used during the Creek war of 1836 and 1837. He came to Congress, and Congress passed a joint resolution authorizing the officers of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts. The Second Auditor and Comptroller audited a portion of the accounts, but rejected a large portion of the vouchers, because they were not authenticated; that is to say, they did not have a certificate of authenticity from the Governor of Alabama. The claimant then withdrew these vouchers, for the purpose of obtaining the necessary certificate. The auditor was not then complete. The claimant had the depositions authenticated properly, and then came to the Secretary of War to have them finally acted upon. When the Secretary now comes to act on the case finally, he leaves out some items that have been previously allowed by the Second Auditor and the Comptroller. He takes in these authenticated certificates and allows a portion, but leaves out, by mistake or accident, some of the original vouchers. The claimant had been adjudged in favor of the claim by the Auditor and the Comptroller; and when this mistake is brought to the attention of the Secretary of War by Mr. SIMMONS, who went to see him personally on the subject, he admitted that it was an error, that he omitted them by mistake, and he gave a mere accident, and now he suggests that Congress pass a resolution to authorize him to go back and allow those items that were thus accidentally omitted. That is the whole case. The amount, as I understand, is very small; it is not a matter of great consequence, but still it is a matter which the party should have its rights.

Now, has not Congress the right to reopen this case? The Senator from Delaware says that, as the question has been settled, and the case has been adjudicated by the officers of the Government, he is not for reopening it on any account.

Why, sir, it is the peculiar province of a court of chancery always to correct mistakes; and if this mistake were open to a court of chancery into which the party could go, on the very answer of the defendant, the Secretary of War, a court of chancery would not hesitate to open the case and correct these items. That is a clear principle; and I am astonished that the Senator from Delaware, so good a lawyer, and so good a man, as he is, should say that a party should be bound by a mere error, mistake, or accident on the part of your accounting officer; and when that officer himself, the Secretary of War, admits the fact, as he has admitted to one of the committee in person, that it was an error, an accident.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think my objection is answered at all, when I come to look at this joint resolution. I am not at all familiar with the facts of the case, and know nothing about it, except what I have gathered from the report of the Secretary of War in the papers. We have no report from the committee; we have no communication from the Department; we have only one side of the case; but we have a report of a committee of the House of Representatives, made in 1857, which on the face of it, I am free to say, is in my mind a very loose report. I have great respect myself for the judgment and integrity of the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie. He did not make these allowances; and the object of this joint resolution is now to do so. As I said, to revise the action of the accounting officers where you have intrusted them to the authority judicially to decide upon this claim, and on more grounds than one. The want of authentication of certain depositions is referred to as one ground, and he is directed to admit these depositions and statements of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, under date of 30th January, 1858.

"Allow such terms and valuations in said accounts as are proved to be due and are anywise affected by said testimony."

That is a very dangerous doctrine to hold—without disturbing those who do not object; and to furnish the adjustment of the Secretary of War, to give the said joint resolution as to require that the claimant shall be credited with the items and valuations contained or specified in the official certificate and statement of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, under date of 30th January, 1858.

What is this but an attempt at a part adjudication on our part, after we have intrusted to the accounting officer the settlement of the account, and he has made the statement? Now you want to control him so that he must make the settlement exactly in a particular mode. If the parties want to have this account settled on principles of equity and justice, and they think it has not been, why not pass another general law? If there has been a mere mistake, a mere error, a mere defect of testimony, why not simply pass a general law authorizing the accounting officers to correct the claim on principles of equity and justice, as you often do? Why put in all these restrictions and direct him to allow this and to allow that, and to credit this and to credit that? I do not consider that is part of the duty of Congress. I have always believed that it is to grant money, and I do not think that many members of the body would ever take the trouble to inquire into the character of the testimony by which a claim was authenticated; but where you send it to an accounting officer, he always does, as far as he can, require that the evidence shall be sufficient to sustain the claim.

Therefore, I am not disposed to vote for a resolution which combines such limitations; which are partly an authority to audit the account, but which, at the same time, really undertakes to audit and determine the account itself; when we have no testimony before us, not even a report from the committee. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on its passage.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move as an amendment to the joint resolution to add these words: "and that not exceeding $2,000 shall be allowed by the Secretary of War, under the provisions of this joint resolution;" so that it shall have some limit. I understand from the Senator from Mississippi that the amount is less than $2,000.

Mr. BROWN. I think that would be quite sufficient for any emergency; but I will suggest to the Senator that these limitations are generally construed by the accounting officers to mean that they shall pay up to your limit. If you put on the provision, they might pay the whole $2,000. It might not be so much. I am sure it would not be more than a little over it. The accounting officers will warrant the Senator, who will be almost certain to pay the $2,000, if you put that in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend that the Secretary of War certainly would not allow $2,000, unless the proof justified it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me a moment, I will suggest that as we have no report upon this bill, and really we all seem somewhat befogged about the facts, it be passed over informally; it can go back to the committee, and the facts be ascertained and reported to us. None of us seem to know exactly what the bill is and what the amount is.

Mr. IVERSON. I read the facts here in a printed statement.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand the Senator read the facts as reported to him by Mr. IVERSON, on a conversation with the Secretary of War; but can the Senator tell us now what amount is involved in the bill?

Mr. IVERSON. So I do not know, and neither does anybody know, I apprehend, because it depends on items.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to know what the amount is, what these allowances are, that are to be made? In fact, I want information, and I suppose other Senators want it, and for the purpose of enabling them to vote understandingly on the bill. Let us put it over informally, and take it up next Friday, and the friends of it may then be able to give us information. I move that we pass it over informally.

Mr. CLARK. Why not recommend it for a report?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am perfectly willing that it be recommended.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope not, because that will throw it behind.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Well, let it be passed over informally.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to put it behind other bills; but I should like some information on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. It can be passed over, by common consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not desire to press that amendment, if it can be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, this joint resolution will be passed by informally.

Mr. BROWN. That does not lose its place on the Calendar? ("No!")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It retains its place. The joint resolution will be passed over.

THOMAS MADDIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, next proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 49) to confirm the title in a certain tract of land, in the State of Missouri, to the heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Maddin, deceased. The Committee on Private Land Claims reported the bill, with an amendment, to strike out after the enacting clause of the original bill, and insert in lieu thereof:

"That the heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Maddin, deceased, late of the State of Missouri, and they are hereby authorized to enter and purchase, at the price of $25 per acre, a tract of land, containing eight hundred and eighty acres, or six hundred and eighty acres, situate six hundred and eighty acres, surveyed for the said Thomas Maddin, in his own right, as per patent certificate of survey No. 1831, reported to the General Land Office, by Surveyor General Leavenworth, as having been surveyed on the 16th day of March, 1816, and situated on the waters of Joachim creek, to township forty-one north, of range the east, of the fifth principal meridian, in the county of Jefferson, and State of Missouri. Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioners of the General Land Office be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, upon the entry and payment aforesaid, to cause a patent, in the form of and to the effect of the said bill, to be issued to the heirs and legal representatives of the said Thomas Maddin, deceased, in conformity with the description given in patent certificate No. 1831, and to be recorded in the books, then recorder in the office of recorder of land titles in St. Louis, in the said State of Missouri, bearing date, in said office, on the 1st day of November, 1846, and to be valid, from and after the date of the said tract of land as having been confirmed to the said Thomas Maddin, pursuant to the acts of Congress reporting claims to lands in the Territories of (Oregon and Louisiana, and the Territory of Missouri, and as having been regularly surveyed on the 16th day of March, 1816, and designated on the connected plat of United States surveys, in the United States surveyor general's office at St. Louis, Missouri, as No. 1831; and in which said patent certificate No. 92 is certified that the said Thomas Maddin is entitled to receive a patent for the said tract of land, according to the said patent certificate of survey, as aforesaid. No. 1831: Provided, however, That the right of preemption in the said tract of land shall cease at the end of two years from the date of the passage of this act, and that the right and title of the United States in and to said tract of land shall be preserved and maintained in and to the provisions of this act in the event of the failure of the said heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Maddin to secure the said tract of land by preemption and purchase within the said period of two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I see in the original bill there was a proviso, that the patent when issued should only operate as a relinquishment of title to the said tract of land to the United States, and that the legal rights of third persons. That is left out in the amendment. It is a very proper provision to insert in a bill like this, that directs a patent to issue.

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is no objection to that provision; but it is not usual in cases where land is sold. That is the usual proviso in cases where land is confirmed. The original bill proposed to confirm this title. The Committee on Private Land Claims, on examining the title, did not think it was one that ought to be confirmed gratuitously. They did not think it a good title, but they thought there was an equity in favor of the parties from long cultivation and possession, and that they should have a preemption right—the right to purchase it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would inquire if there are any conflicting rights of third parties claiming the land?

Mr. BENJAMIN. We understand that this is a case in which these parties have been living on the land twenty-five or thirty years; but their title we do not think a good one. It is a title under an old grant; and we therefore reported a bill that they might buy it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As between the Government and individual, I certainly have no objection to it, if it gives no third party are interfered with. I saw that provision in the original bill, which I think very proper in such bills. I will not propose any amendment, however.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the title of the bill be amended so as to read: A bill to grant the right of preemption to a certain tract of land, in the State of Missouri, to the heirs and legal representatives of Thomas Maddin, deceased.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MASON. I move to postpone the further consideration of the Private Land bill for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of executive business. I do this in order that we may complete the business which was left unfinished yesterday.

Mr. IVERSON. The question of postponement is debatable. I object to it, and hope the Senate will not postpone the Private Calendar. We have only been an hour and a half on it.

The question being put, on a division there were—yeas 28, nays 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. IVERSON. There is no question certainly. I must ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Briggs, Bright, Chas. Clay, Clifton, Colburn, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Fox, Green, Gwin, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Lane, Latham, Mason, Nicholson, Pearce, Schaffner, Sibley, Sumner, Thomas, Towner, Wright, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burleigh, Chandler, Clark, Crittenden, Daniel, Foster, Hays, Hildreth, Harlan, Humphreys, Ingersoll, King, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, March 16, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, Mr. Prayor by the Chaplain, Rev. Thomas H. Brockton. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from W. R. Drinkard, the acting Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the chief topographical engineer, with its inclosure, communicating the only information in the Department on the subject of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th ultimo, by which the Secretary of War is requested to furnish to the House of Representatives with copies of any orders which may be on file in his Department of General Andrew Jackson, or any officer acting under his directions, or under the authority of the United States, during the war with Great Britain of 1812, closing the communication between the Gulf of Mexico and Mississippi river, by placing obstructions in the Pass Manchac, to prevent the passage of British troops and munitions of war through the channel, from the Gulf to the Mississippi river; also, any other information referred to in the resolutions, by authority of the Government, which may be on file in the War Office.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing stated to the House, in debate, on Friday, the 8th instant, that the prices for composition now allowed by law are too large, and that with half pay for type-setting, the printer is more than satisfied; and whereas, by the terms of the resolution under which the Printer to this House was elected, the right was reserved to renege the contract in the event of work to be executed by him; Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing be instructed to report by which the prices of composition shall be fixed at one half the amount now allowed by law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to that resolution. I know that it will lead to discussion if it is adopted. I think it is a very good resolution, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the special order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Maine will hardly object to the resolution if it is made one of inquiry. Let it go as a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If it will not lead to debate, I will not object.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let the committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of doing this thing.

Mr. PENDLETON. I prefer that the resolution should stand as it is.

Mr. HOUSTON. So do I.

Mr. PENDLETON. We have an expression of opinion of the Chairman of the Committee on Printing, and I take it for granted that it is the expression of the opinion of the whole committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would prefer that the resolution should stand as it is; but if we cannot get it in that way, I prefer to get it in the best way we can.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to the resolution, and it cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution is not before the House, having been objected to.

PRINTING OF EXTRA COPIES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask now that my motion may be put.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire merely to submit a motion to print extra copies of a communication made to the House of Representatives, in order that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing. I was not here when the document was communicated to the House, having been detained by sickness. It is the report of Beale upon his wagon road. I move that five thousand extra copies be printed.

The motion was referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FENTON. I move to postpone the special order for one hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is not in order. That cannot be done.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order. Mr. REAGAN. There was a question before the House when it adjourned last evening. I hope it will be acted on now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Maine to permit me to report a bill from the Committee for the District of Columbia this morning, merely for reference. I was not here when that committee was called.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky, that several applications of a similar character have been made to me, and I have felt myself obliged to decline. I think if we go into the Committee of the Whole now, we may get through with the rules in an hour or two, and then gentlemen will have an opportunity to make their reports.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order. It will be recollected, that yesterday evening the question before the House was on its adjournment, was on the motion of my colleague to refer the Military Academy bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SUMNER] to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask if that is not the first question on this morning?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Maine takes precedence, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I appeal, then, to the gentleman from Maine to allow that question to be disposed of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must decline. Mr. TAPPAN. I am opposed to going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, at this time, and appeal to the gentleman from Maine to allow the morning hour to be devoted to private business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Gentlemen will have the morning hour to-morrow, which is private bill day, and we shall expedite business if we go into the Committee of the Whole now and finish the amendment of the rules.

Mr. TAPPAN. To-day is the day set apart for private business. Last Friday was taken up by a privileged report from the Committee on Printing; and I now think that it would be no more than right to devote at least one hour to private business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. We can do that to-morrow, which is also private bill day. Besides, if we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and adopt the amendments of the rules, it will be the first thing in order to-morrow, under the amended rules, to devote one hour to that purpose.

Mr. TAPPAN. I would ask whether, if the motion of the gentleman from Maine is voted down, the regular order of business will not be called in question by the report of the Committee?

The SPEAKER. No, sir; the question will be on the reference of the Military Academy bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The special order to which the gentleman from Maine refers, is the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The question to which I refer is the regular order of business in the House; and it is to the consideration of that that I ask the House to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the motion of the gentleman from Maine to be in order, and it must be decided by the House.

Mr. TAPPAN. I hope it will be voted down.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion; and it was agreed to by the House.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STAYTON in the chair), and resumed the consideration—as a special order—of the report of the Committee on Rules; the pending question being upon the adoption of the following amendment, reported by the committee, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] was entitled to the floor:

Eleventh amendment:

Amended rule 34, by adding at the end thereof the words, "Provided further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any bill, close all debate upon such sections;" so that it will read:

No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any bill in the House or in committee, but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That the debate shall be closed by order of the House; no amendment may be offered in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment be may offer—December 18, 1847—after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be a further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and the same limitation not so amendable to the amendment as shall be withdrawn by the member offering it, by the unanimous consent of the committee—August 14, 1850: Provided further, That the House may, at any time after five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section of a bill, close all debate upon such sections.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Chairman, I was very much struck yesterday by the reasoning of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARNETT); not the gentleman from Virginia who referred to my position—I will notice him before I take my seat—but the gentleman who referred to the position of the gentleman from Kentucky practiced upon this floor, which prevents the consideration of important questions upon which we are called to act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentlemen who have jurisdiction of the question of rules, so far as the consideration of the amendment now before the House is concerned, have lost sight of that feature of reform which I think would be most valuable in this connection, in making to provision to prevent this wide latitude of debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If this special committee had reported an amendment requiring that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall confine gentlemen strictly to the discussion of the question under consideration, when appropriation bills, if you will, were before the House, the difficulty would have been avoided; and this wide, rapid, silly, nonsensical debate—I speak with all due respect to every gentleman—would be avoided, and the matter under consideration would receive full discussion. I think an amendment should be introduced here, by which that debate, which has been accomplished, and this disposition of the majority, which was so eloquently deprecated by the gentleman from Virginia, would be avoided, and we should have that legitimate discussion upon the matter under consideration, which is so much desired; and the result so much desired by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM], in reference to the character of discussion, would be, to a very great extent, accomplished.

I had no idea that this subject would come up so soon this morning, and I have not examined the amendment reported by the committee sufficiently to be able to frame an amendment which shall accomplish the object which I desire; but I will look it over, and perhaps move an amendment before the committee passes from the consideration of the subject.

Now, sir, one word in reference to the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGGS]. The gentleman was very much surprised at my abandonment of the principles of the House as a government in its position which I occupy upon this floor, as the friend of the widow and orphan, and as the poor man's advocate.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to get off that platform at all. I stand squarely upon it. It is true, I do not offer a proposition to admit foreign ministers upon the floor of this House; but I did it in order to enable me to sustain my position more completely upon that platform. The reason why I proposed that these representatives of foreign countries should be admitted upon this floor was, that they might facilitate our business in our course with them. The people whom I represent are an inventive, hard-working, industrious people. They frequently suggest propositions, mechanical and otherwise, which may be of benefit to the people of foreign countries. They write to me, and they suggest subjects, and we communicate with foreign ministers upon the subject, that they may have the benefit of introducing their inventions into foreign countries, and extending the advantage of them to the whole world. Now, sir, I stated yesterday that I frequently have occasion to call on these representatives of foreign nations, and do not find them at their offices; and when they come to this House to call upon me here, they have to stand knocking at these doors until I come out to see them. It was, therefore, to enable us to meet business engagements with these gentlemen, and thus to meet the wants of my constituents, that I made the suggestion which I made yesterday; and the gentleman will see that it was in strict accordance with the position which he says I occupy as the friend of the workman. It was not that I have any love for foreign ministers particularly; I have no special love for foreign ministers, or foreign anything; but I am for maintaining the same relations, and am for providing interest in our domestic and social relations. I want to cultivate peace and good will with all men, and therefore I am for encouraging social intercourse with foreign ministers. The gentleman from Virginia, therefore, will see that there has been no abandonment, on my part, of my platform. I stand fairly upon it, and I will not abandon it.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question. He says his people are an industrious people. I have heard it charged, that during the recent election the gentleman charged men to work a plank. I ask the gentleman if that is a specimen of their hard work? [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir; it took a hundred men to carry a plank, and it is the work of the many slanders that are being circulated. But, sir, I will say that so far as my efforts are concerned, I intend to secure, if I can by honest and fair means, an appropriation, so that there may be more planks carried, for we have suffered late for the means of carrying on the Government business there. I am, therefore, in favor of providing the means of employing several hundred men to carry a plank—physically, I want the committee to understand, and not politically. Mr. REAGAN. I have no amendment of the committee by adding to the end as follows:

And that no debate shall be allowed, either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, except on the measure under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in relation to that amendment. I am persuaded that its adoption would work a greater benefit to this nation than the adoption of any measure which has been presented to this Congress. It has become a great grievance in this House, that the large part of our time is consumed in a general debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. We are compelled day after day to listen to discussion in committees which is not limited to the subject under consideration. These discussions are in the main confined to a question over which the House has no jurisdiction, the question which it has no rightful concern, and which does not amount to debate. Several days or weeks are spent in the discussion of a general appropriation bill, and during that whole time, not one word will be said upon the subject of the bill under consideration and action. At last, to get the bill where it can be considered in fact, and not in name, where it can be brought to a vote, a motion is made in the House that further general debate shall be terminated in perhaps one or two hours. During that time of course the discussion is strictly confined to the bill itself. Days and weeks are consumed without any consideration of the bill, and then we are left only an hour or two, before the question is taken from the Committee of the Whole, for general remarks upon the merits of the pending proposition to be allowed, it is true, by the five minutes' debate which, in reality, is the only practical discussion of the subject. We thus waste the time of the House in not merely unnecessary, but absolutely injurious debates, injurious not only to the reputation of this House, but to the interests of the country. Instead of pertinent remarks upon the pending question, we are, as you know, Mr. Chairman, wearied during many days with agitating hour speeches upon questions with which, as legislators, we have little or nothing to do. It is a disgrace to do away with this recognized evil that I ask the House to adopt the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. Chairman, I am apprised it is considered that general debate in the Committee of the Whole contributes, in some degree, to the public welfare. I am not prepared to deny that, under proper restrictions, good may result from general debate. But, sir, I do think, and I believe the concurrent judgment of the members of this House is with me—certain I am that the popular sentiment of the country is with me—that that general debate has been the prolific source of unnumbered abuses, far overwhelming any good that may be effected by it. I do not deny this, with others, on occasions, I have participated in those abuses. I do not, in moving for their correction, pretend that I am free from the sin I ask may be prevented in others.

In addition to the waste of time I have referred to, in addition to the expense of including written essays in the columns of the Congressional Globe, what is said and printed is not really in the nature of debate. It does not develop the policy of the country; it does not develop the views of Congress upon administrative subjects, with which we have to deal; it does none of these, to do which would be proper and profitable; but the member who takes the floor in the Committee of the Whole consumes an hour with his general remarks upon some question, and the House is left to treat—generally not the pending question before the House for consideration, but something, it may be, not before Congress, and which will not come before it; and he will not permit interruptions, because of the fact that he is confined to the limit of an hour.

Now, it is within the knowledge of all of us that it frequently happens members in hour speeches make mistakes of fact, or proceed upon false hypotheses which deserve instantaneous correction; yet when gentlemen rise to make that correction they are treated the private. Besides that, members feel a delicacy in trespassing upon the courtesy of the House when a member is upon the floor occupying an hour in making a speech. In this manner loose and inaccurate statements go out to the country, and the wrong and injurious impressions are made upon the public mind where these statements circulate. If, with every such statement, the proper correction could go out, then there would not exist the objection which I now urge. Because incorrect statements go out, and the wrong impressions are promulgated, leading to false impressions, I insist that general debate in the Committee of the Whole is a real grievance to the country.

It is not only a useless consumption of time, but questions are discussed not before us for legislation, which agitate the public mind, and, sir, I am sorry to say, which are too often designed to agitate the public mind. In that committee it would seem that we put ourselves up for political schoolmasters of the people, and their teachers as well, in matters of morality. I think that is all wrong. I believe that we are here, in the contemplation of the Constitution, to legislate upon practical governmental measures which come before us for our action; and that, when we undertake to make speeches outside of our legislative duties, we act outside of our constitutional duty. I think we should communicate with their constituents—and it may often happen that such a proceeding is necessary—there is a convenient channel to do that, which is alike open to all, and that is to be found in the columns of the public press. When members make speeches here, they have to publish them at their own expense, and to circulate them at their own expense, except so far as the postage is concerned. I imagine that it would be just as cheap, when a member desires to address his constituents, to write a letter to them and have it published, instead of making a public speech to that end. Upon that ground, therefore, general debate cannot be considered as necessary for a proper communication between members and their constituents. When members communicate with their constituents in many different ways, they will be considered to communicate their own particular views, isolated from any debate where the views of others would be reported. Speeches are made here in the Committee of the Whole when, in reality, but very few members are present, which go out to the country as if made in the presence of a full House—speeches stating propositions of importance, citing facts of importance, and assuming important premises. They go out uncontested, and the impression is made upon the public mind that they could not be controverted, however wrong they may be, when, in truth, there was no opportunity presented for any correction to go out with them.

Mr. Chairman, in this general debate in the Committee of the Whole consumes, I will venture to say, one fourth of the time of the House. Perhaps I am too low in my estimate, and I had better state that it consumes one third of our time. It is a most beneficial objects of legislation; it lowers us in the scale of public estimation; it induces that disregard of our proceedings, so pertinently referred to yesterday by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT]; it entails heavy expense upon the country, by unnecessarily incumbering the columns of the Congressional Globe with extraneous matter; and, more than all, it diverts the minds of members from the proper and legitimate business of the session. However inconvenient it may be felt to be in this House, and however strongly it may be condemned by us, it is still more favorable to the country, and still more strongly condemned by the people of the country. There is nothing to which my attention has been often directed by the people of the country than the crying evil of this useless consumption of time. In the House we call general debate in the Committee of the Whole, of questions not before us for consideration. I am assured that the country will feel grateful to us, that it will be benefited by the beneficial results to our legislation, if we adopt my amendment or something like it, in relation to the subject.

I know, sir, that in the thirty-second amendment there is, to some extent, a limitation imposed upon abuse of general debate; but it does not go far enough. It only relates to the discussion of questions which are made special orders. It will not reach the question of trust, sir, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do not desire, as I do not intend, to occupy the time of the committee beyond a few minutes; for I am anxious that we may get through the amendments as soon as possible. And I will say, just here, that I trust there will be no more debate than is necessary to the elucidation of the questions which are really before the committee. Mr. Chairman, I cannot concur with the gentleman from Texas in the suggestion which he has just offered. I think that it is unnecessary and unwise. I believe that the committee on the revision of the rules have gone as far as they deemed prudent, and as far as they thought the House would sustain them in going, where they confined debate to the questions directly before the committee. It is known, sir, that now debate in the House is confined strictly to the question immediately pending, and that it is only in Committee of the Whole, that great safety-valve, that there can be general debate. Yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] proposes that debate shall be limited there, or prevented altogether; because, under his amendment, it will be within the power of a majority of the Committee of the Whole to take the President's message into the House, or within the power of the majority of the House to refer it to that committee; so that there will be no question there whatever upon which general, political, and, I believe, salutary, wholesome, and necessary debate will be in order.

Mr. MILLSON, of Mr. Chairman, as I think a great deal of misapprehension exists upon this subject, I desire to say a word, or two upon it. Upon inquiry of my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN], I learn that the object of his amendment is to require the discussion in Committee of the Whole of all questions which are referred to that committee. My friend from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] seems to oppose this suggestion, and thinks that in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union debate need not be confined to the subject under discussion. Now, sir, I differ with both gentlemen. I think, however, that the strongest assertion may seem, that, under the existing rules of the House, applied to discussion, either in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or in the House, no debate is in order at any time except upon the subject under consideration. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is not advertent to the fact that, when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is charged with the consideration of any question, it is the state of the Union which is the subject under consideration; and I have been surprised, and sometimes annoyed, at the effort of gentlemen to amend our rules by providing that all discussion shall be confined to the subject under consideration. It needs no amendment of the rules to require discussion to be confined to the subject under consideration; and the House, in referring any bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, declares that the state of the Union shall be the subject under discussion. It would be absurd, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] has suggested, with very mischievous results, if this House should confine debate, at any time, to the very bill referred to the consideration of the committee.

A brief historical reference to the origin of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union may not be uninteresting. It is connected with the struggle of liberty against despotism. It was a contrivance of the British Parliament to escape from the supervision of the Speaker, who was formerly the creature of the Crown, appointed by the Crown, and whose election, even at this day, is subject to the approbation of the Crown. It was to enable them to carry on discussions freed from the supervision of this officer, and to be controlled only by a chairman of the committee appointed by themselves. Thus, when the House became important to consider the state of the nation; whenever it became important to escape from the strict rules applied by the Speaker, the House of Commons would resolve itself into a committee of the whole, and the Speaker would then go into the committee of the whole on the state of the nation for the very purpose of discussing those questions which it might not be permitted them to discuss by the proposition actually before the House. And, in voting the supplies, over the objection of the Crown, they would first to determine upon administration, and to refuse all supplies until there should be a redress of grievances. And so it is now, Mr. Chairman, in England and in this country.

If we wish to escape the confinement debate in Committee of the Whole to the bill referred to that committee, they have nothing to do but to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House; and when a bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole House, there can be no discussion except upon the subject referred to the Committee of the Whole; but the subject can be considered in connection with a bill so referred. We have fallen into the mistake here, from the practice of the House to refer nothing to the Committee of the Whole House but private bills. If the House please, they may refer a bill to the Committee of the Whole House, and not to the Committee of the Whole House upon the state of the Union. If we wish to escape this irrelevant discussion upon any bill, refer it to the Committee of the Whole House, usually called the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, but not necessarily so; but it is only because we are not in the habit, of late years, of referring any question to the Committee of the Whole House except private bills. But it is within the power of the House to refer any question to the Committee of the Whole House; but whenever they refer a bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, then you put the state of the Union in question; you invite debate upon all questions that relate to the condition and state of the Union. And it is a very great mistake to suppose that any discussion which relates, however remotely, to the condition of the Union, is out of order or irrelevant to the subject referred to that committee. I think, then, sir, that it would be attended with very great mischievous results, if we were to amend the rules so as to require that all discussion proposed by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN], it would be striking down the most valuable privilege of the Representatives of the people; it would be taking from them the privilege of discussing the condition of the Union in connection with appropriation bills, or with all other bills, the success of which may be in some degree dependent upon the opinion of members as to the state of the Union. I hope, therefore, this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. Let me here say one word. What I mean is this: I mean that in the discussion in relation to the state of the Union is concerned, no man who has witnessed the discussions on the state of the Union in this House will deny that these discussions have done more to disrupt the bonds of the Union and to destroy the Union itself, that anything that has ever been done in the Congress of this country. That is the very evil I desire to avoid, and to confine our debates to questions that are connected with practical administrative questions, and to prevent the publication of pabulum for the destruction of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is a proposition to amend here which I did not see when I made the remarks I did; I had intended to offer an amendment; to come in here, that as a member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question, either in the House or in committee, and which debate must be confined to the subject immediately under consideration in the appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is already provided for.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understand that this whole purpose can be attained by an amendment to the 34th rule, by making the appropriation bills the special order, and the majority of the House can always control it.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. FLORENCE, and was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all that part of the eleventh amendment which limits debate to one hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I rise to a point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. That is not the same question which was acted on yesterday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The same question was voted down yesterday.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. My proposition yesterday in reference to one hour rule, was accompanied by a limitation.

Mr. JONES. I do not desire to discuss this hour rule. It was fully and ably discussed yesterday. I merely desire to test the sense of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The question was tested yesterday, and therefore I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is very well taken. The Chair does not very well see how the amendment can be made intelligible in connection with, or by incorporation into, the section. It does not propose to strike out any line or clause. The Chair supposes it is not in order, inasmuch as it does not propose any specific modification or amendment.

Mr. JONES. I will modify that amendment and move to strike out the words "no member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House or in committee."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "committee," the words "all debate must be confined to the subject-matter under consideration in the appropriation bills."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. There is no necessity for that amendment, for if we adopt the third and fourth amendments, the question is in order on appropriation bills whenever they are made a special order, and it is competent for a majority of the House to make appropriation bills the special order at any time.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Twelfth amendment:

Amend rule 41, by inserting after the word "commenced," in the fifth line, the words "and before the main question is offered to be put;" so that it will read:

"Whenever a member shall be in the House on the question to put shall give his vote, unless the House shall otherwise order. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House adjourns, or before the call of the year and yeas is commenced, and before the main question is ordered to be put; and the question shall then be taken without debate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Thirteenth amendment:

Amend rule 50, by striking out all after "January 14, 1860," in the tenth line, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "But its only effect, if a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the House to a vote upon such motion. Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed on the next day, unless the House shall otherwise order. A call of the House shall be in order after the previous question is seconded, unless it shall appear, upon a verbal count by the Speaker, that no question is present;" so that it will read:

"Whenever a motion shall be in this form: 'I shall the main question be put.' It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present; and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and to bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by the committee; if any; then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question; but its only effect, if a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the House to a vote upon such motion. Whenever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed as though no motion for the previous question had been made. A call of the House shall be in order after the previous question is seconded, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no question is present."

Mr. NOELL. I have an amendment to offer here. I propose to amend by adding to the end of the rule, as it will stand if the amendment of the committee is adopted, the following:

Provided, That when a bill or resolution is introduced by a member, or reported from a select or standing committee, and it is proposed to put the same on its passage without referring it to the Committee of the Whole, and the previous question shall be demanded, then, before there shall be a second to the previous question, at least one member shall be allowed to speak in opposition to such bill or resolution; and the Speaker shall not put the question until such opportunity shall be allowed.

I will say a word or two in reference to this proposed amendment. I do not profess to understand the rules of this House; and if there is any reputation on earth I least desire, it is that of understanding the little technicalities and details of parliamentary proceedings. But I should have less than common sense if I failed to appreciate the importance of the previous question, on it has been disclosed since I have been a member of this body. I have, on different occasions, seen its effects in cases of propositions coming from committees, or introduced by members upon the floor, on which the thumb-screw of the previous question has been applied; and gentlemen who were opposed to the proposition or the resolution were precluded from all opportunity of making objection. It is fresh in our recollection, that when one of the most important bills ever presented for the consideration of the House was recently reported from a standing committee of the House by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY]—I refer to the national homestead bill—this previous question was demanded upon it, and no gentleman who was opposed to that measure was allowed the privilege of giving the reasons which actuated his vote. I desired, upon that particular occasion, to say to the House and to the country that I regarded the fourth section of that bill as a violation of the Constitution, and as an attempt to intrude the purposes of the Federal Government between the individual and the foreign State and the State authorities themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly supposes that the homestead bill is under consideration.

Mr. NOELL. I am only referring to the action on that bill to illustrate the effect of our rules. I was opposed to the character of that bill, and was desirous to state to the House the effect of the provisions of the fourth section of that bill; but I was precluded from doing so by the operation of the previous question.

A few days previous to that time, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GRAVEL], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, introduced from that committee an important resolution upon the subject of printing. He did generously and magnanimously concede to say to the minority in this House, that they should be permitted to ask his questions, and to receive from his lips the law and gospel upon the subject under consideration; but no gentleman upon this side of the House was permitted to interpose any objection to the resolution, or to show why it should not be adopted. So it has been in reference to other important propositions. Resolutions were introduced here for the purpose of raising investigating committees, and gentlemen were not permitted to ask those who introduced these resolutions to make their charges against the Administration more specific.

The previous question, in the hands and under the control of this despotic majority, seems to me to be designed, in its present form, to crush all opportunity to interpose objections or to offer amendments. Unless this rule is modified by the adoption of some such amendment as I have proposed, I desire to announce to this committee that I will oppose any proposition, good or bad, which is introduced from a committee, when the previous question is demanded, unless it shall be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; where opportunity is afforded for discussion and amendment. I regard it as a despotic rule, the operation of which is to cut off all discussion and all amendment on the part of the minority. As such, I take my stand against it from this time, and unless some such modification as I have proposed is made to the rule, I shall vote, during the session which I have the honor to occupy a seat upon this floor, against all bills and all resolutions upon which the demand for the previous question is sustained, before reference or discussion.

Mr. GROW. I have only a word or two to say; and I should not trespass upon the time of the committee at all, but for the fact that this very point has been made a number of times. Gentlemen seem to think it a very great hardship to have the previous question called, and all the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri apply to the calling of the previous question at all. If you are to have a previous question at all, of course it must cut off debate, and bring the House to a vote. That is the object of it.

The gentleman complains that the previous question was demanded on the homestead bill. But that bill has been discussed for eight years, more or less, at every session of Congress; and yet gentlemen think they can enlighten the judgment of this House by talking an hour, so as to change their votes upon the question which has been long before the House. That bill had been discussed and amended in committee three times, and had been before the House eight years; and yet the gentleman complains because the previous question was called and we would not waste a week or two again on the same subject.

Now, the previous question, if it does exist in our rules at all, must exist as we have left it here. When called, it must close debate; otherwise it is of no use; and the majority must take the responsibility of passing the bill. They do not ask the minority to be responsible for the calling of the question; but they put themselves on record as opposed to it.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question just at this point. I believe the question of a protective tariff has been discussed in this country for many years. Is it not the intention of a majority of the House to spring the previous question when the tariff bill is reported?

Mr. GROW. I do not know.

Mr. NOELL. I ask him if he believes it would be the intention of the minority of the House with justice to introduce such a measure as that, and spring the previous question upon it, for the simple reason that it has been the subject of discussion for fifty years?

Mr. GROW. I do not know whether the previous question will be called or not, because I have not the measure in charge; but I say that whenever the majority of the House put the previous question upon me, if I do not like the measure, I call the yeas and nays, and place myself on the record as opposed to it, and am not responsible for the action of the majority.

Mr. NOELL. I desire the gentleman from Pennsylvania to understand that I was not sent here for the purpose of evading responsibility; but to endeavor to do justice to the House with justice to introduce such a measure as that, and spring the previous question upon it, for the simple reason that it has been the subject of discussion for fifty years?

Mr. GROW. I do discharge my duty, in my estimation, when I vote against what I believe to be wrong, and vote for what I believe to be right, whether I have a chance to speak on it or not. I never believed that I was to influence votes in the House by speaking, and therefore it is not a question with me whether I shall have a chance to be heard or not, so far as discharging my duty to my country, to myself, and to my God, is concerned. If the House chooses to pass iniquitous measures, the vote will show who is responsible for it; and those who vote against it are not responsible.

Mr. NOELL. Then I say, let us adopt a rule suppressing the freedom of speech in this Hall eternally.

Mr. GROW. Unless you have some rule to stop debate on any vote, you can never pass any measure. I am, therefore, in favor of the previous question sometimes, and will trust to the majority of the House that the previous question will not be abused; but the majority must take the responsibility of any abuse that results from it. I do not put the responsibility of the measure which has been thrown out a number of times during this session that the previous question, as it exists in our rules, invades the rights of the Representative, and prevents him from properly discharging his duties. I do not so regard it; and I think we have thrown around the right of debate greater safeguards than before. If the majority at any time desire action of the House, and that one person shall not consume time that every other member in the House does not want consumed, then they call the previous question; and it is right that they should have that power; otherwise, nine tenths of the House may be placed in the power of three men who want to talk. Now, I am opposed to any such freedom of debate as that. Whenever a majority want discussion, let them stop it; and when they want to stop it, let them stop it.

Mr. NOELL. I do not propose that every member on the floor shall have the privilege of debates but only to allow one member to speak in opposition to a measure before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. GROW. And if no one in the House wants to hear him, they will be obliged to do so. That is the very point I am making. You place the House in the power of one man who wants to be heard, because he thinks he can change the votes of other members; and all the other members must sit still and hear him.

Mr. NOELL. Let me ask the gentleman what is the reason of the rule which allows the member reporting a measure to speak in favor of it; and if the same reasoning would not apply to that?

Mr. GROW. The object of that rule is, that the gentleman who reports a measure may give to the House what information the committee has collected upon the subject. The committee have spent time and labor in investigating the question which they report, and have gathered facts in an official shape, and they communicate these facts to the House, and leave the House to act on the proposition.

Now, all I wanted to say was, that, if you have the previous question at all, it will cut off debate. You can have no previous question, and you can allow every gentleman to go who wants to talk.

Mr. STOUT. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. It is in these words:

Added at the end of the amendment of the committee as follows:

And in all cases where a bill is put upon its passage without first having been referred to and considered in the Committee of the Whole, it shall remain in that committee until it sustain the demand for the previous question as said bill.

The object of that amendment is to avoid, in the first place, unnecessary discussion, and at the same time, unless a bill meets with such favor as that it is able to receive the support of two-thirds of the members present, it is still open for discussion, so that a majority of the members present cannot cut off discussion upon a bill which has not been referred and considered in Committee of the Whole. It only applies to such bills as are put upon their passage without first having been referred, and it seems to me that no member would desire to put a bill through the House without reference to the Committee of the Whole, the merits of which would not address themselves to the favorable consideration of at least two thirds of the members of the House. It seems to me that no injustice could be done by the adoption of the amendment, and at the same time it will properly guard against passing bills which we ought not to pass hastily and without due consideration.

Mr. NOELL. I will accept that in lieu of my own amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That amendment would almost destroy the entire value of the previous question. If it is to be the rule of the House that it shall require a two-thirds vote to sustain the previous question upon any matter that has not been referred to the Committee of the Whole, we might as well abolish the previous question altogether; for it will practically place it in the power of one third of the members of the House to prevent any business from being done.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope this amendment will be adopted. I have very little knowledge of the rules of this House. I certainly do not know all the evil that is connected with them; for I hear more of it every day; nor do I know the good that is connected with them, for, as they are applied in the practice of the House, it seems to me almost impossible to discover it. I am in favor of this amendment, because it will to some extent cut off the arbitrary power of the majority over the whole business of the House in violation of every right of the minority. As I understand it, the committee have already adopted an amendment providing that the five minutes' debate may be terminated by a majority after there has been one five minutes' speech upon a measure. Now, I appeal to every member of the House, whether the five minutes' debate is a good thing or not, whether it is or is not the most profitable debate which we have; whether it does not do more for the elucidation of the matter under consideration, by drawing out the information which may be in possession of members in reference to them, than any other species of debate. The tendency of the rules now is to curtail all legitimate debate upon pending measures, and I think the committee has only intensified the evil.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the rules of this House are so constructed as to render it almost impossible for a new member to learn them, and when he has learned them, it is almost impossible to accomplish anything under them. There is but one day in the week, as I understand it, when a resolution or bill can be introduced into the House, and that is upon the Monday of the members' present. That day is Monday. And it has so happened during the present session that, upon every Monday except one, it has been impossible to offer a resolution or introduce a bill, except upon the suffrage of two thirds of the members present. The States and Territories have been called for bills and resolutions once during the present session, but that was so near the commencement of the session that few members were prepared with their bills and resolutions. I suggest the floor time and again on Monday, for the purpose of introducing two bills affecting the interests of my constituents, and not in any great degree affecting the interests of any one else; yet I have found it impossible to obtain the floor on Mondays, and when I obtained the floor on an amendment to the resolution from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grew] called for the regular order of business, and would not give way to allow them to be introduced. What was his reason? That so many others would want to do the same thing? And the fact that there were many other members desirous of the privilege of introducing bills and of their constituents, by introducing bills and resolutions of importance to them, was the reason why he would not give way.

Mr. GROW. I did not object to the introduction of the gentleman's bills yesterday.

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman did not. I was about to say that I did yesterday introduce them by the unanimous consent of the House. But, Mr. Chairman, I ought not to be obliged to ask unanimous consent; I ought not to be constrained to appeal to the courtesy of all or any of the members of the House. I think it is the right of every member of a legislative body to introduce whatever propositions he may deem important to have considered, and have them referred to the organs of the House, which are its committees. Sir, I say this debating society is a mistake; one is now considering, have presented an amendment which will, in some measure, obviate this difficulty. They have provided, as I understand it, that upon each alternate Monday the States and Territories shall be called for the introduction of bills and resolutions, and that it shall not be in order to go into Committee of the Whole until one hour shall have been devoted to that call. Yes, sir; one hour in two weeks is allowed to the two hundred and thirty-seven members of the House to introduce bills and resolutions, when it is within the knowledge of every member of this body that three, four, or five hours of every day of every week will be devoted to the debating society in Committee of the Whole, when, by general agreement, no business is to be transacted. Sir, I say this debating society is a disreputable in every respect, and ought to be discontinued.

Mr. BRANCH. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to make a single suggestion?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANCH. The evil of which the gentleman speaks is certainly a mistake; one, and yet, I think, it is an evil growing out of our practice under rules, rather than of the rules themselves. The rules provide that the call of committees for reports shall be first in order, and then the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions; and the reason why the call of the States and Territories is never gone through with is, that there is another motion which is always in order; the motion is to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the anxiety of gentlemen to go into committee to make Buncombe speeches is so great that they do not allow the call to be gone through with. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio and all others, would watch the business of the House, and whenever a motion is made to go into committee before the expiration of the morning hour, vote it down, there will be no difficulty in getting in all the bills and resolutions that any gentleman may desire to propose, or in making any report that any committee may desire.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman will also observe that, under the amendment which we have reported, it will not be in order to move to go into committee or to suspend the rules for any purpose on each alternate Monday; and one hour shall have been spent in the call of the States and Territories for bills and resolutions, which will be sufficient to enable every member to present every bill and resolution which he may wish to introduce.

Mr. PENDLETON. The statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRANCH] has a great deal of truth in it, but it does not meet exactly the objection which I am now making. The gentleman states that the business in order during the morning hour is the introduction of reports. That is true; and if the House does not go into committee, and there is no unfinished business holding over from a former day, the committees will be called for reports. But that does not meet the difficulty. I know that the committees are occasionally called for Monday morning, but the difficulty is, that the call is never gone through with, and gentlemen have no opportunity of introducing their propositions to be referred to committees. It is true that one hour may be spent for that purpose, under the plan proposed by the committee, in two weeks; but one or two hours in two weeks will not be sufficient to go through with the call. I venture to say, that whenever the States and Territories have been called for this purpose, since I have been a member of this House, it has not been gone through with in less than three or four hours. You would scarcely commence the call in one hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will suggest to the gentleman that the reason has been that we have not adhered to the rule prohibiting all debate and discussion of bills and resolutions, but merely for reference. I think it has been within the experience of every member who has been here during the last Congress, that the call was frequently gone through with within an hour; and I think the House will find that, if this rule is adopted and adhered to, the time provided will be ample to enable gentlemen to introduce all their bills and resolutions.

Mr. PENDLETON. It may have been within the experience of the gentleman, for he has been here but a short time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Within the time in which the gentleman has been a member of the House.

Mr. PENDLETON. It may have been, but I have no recollection of any such occasion. I do not mean to say that the call is never completed. It has occurred once, and I believe only once, in the two months since this House has been organized. I only give my own experience in relation to the matter.

And, Mr. Chairman, when a member finally succeeds in his measure, it is almost impossible for him to get them before the House for consideration. They go before a committee, and that committee reports when it pleases and as it pleases. What is the result? Just this: that a measure is made, and it is not carried through under the operation of the previous question—a bill, sir, that commits this House to a course of legislation as to the propriety of which there is great doubt; a bill which makes criminal certain practices in the Territory of Utah—with out the House knowing really what are its provisions, what the penalties, and what the reasons for them.

What is the excuse for cutting off the five minutes' debate, and insisting upon an arbitrary power to call the previous question? It is the same in both cases; it is, that members have not time to consider matters of practical legislation; that the business of the House would be retarded by them. If we are to legislate at all, let us legislate upon the subjects before us. If we are to consider these bills, and to pass upon them, let us do so intelligently and after discussion and consideration. If the bill in reference to Utah Territory is introduced, let it be passed after discussion; let it be done when we all understand what it is. Do not let us pass any measure without fair and proper consideration. Yet, sir, as the rules now stand, if a majority, immediately upon the submission of a report from a committee, deem that the bill shall be passed, by calling the previous question and sustaining that call the bill can be passed, without giving to a single member the privilege of saying a word beyond uttering upon a call of the roll his "ay" or "no." I say that that is not right; that it is not in accordance with the rights and the rights of his constituents.

And what is the reason always given for it? That must hurry through with all important legislation, in order that gentlemen may go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the discussion of every important question in politics, in law, in philosophy; everything, indeed, except the matters which are fairly and legitimately before us. You cannot give an hour or two to the consideration of a practical question, when you give every day and week to the discussion of the ever-varying subject of the negro. And that, sir, has gone so far that it is the daily practice of the House—not just now, but it has been so within my experience, and it doubtless will be during this session—at two or three o'clock to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, by unanimous consent, with the understanding that no action shall be taken on any question. Then members address empty benches, or half a dozen pages, reading written essays, which are pertinent or impertinent, as the case may be, to the subject in hand; and the subject which can ever come before the House for consideration; and, as my colleague has said, the whole country is told next morning, by telegraph, that the House was electrified by the power and eloquence of the honorable gentleman who introduced the bill. Mr. Chairman, is this proposition? Why, sir, that two thirds of this House shall be necessary to cut off debate. Is it not right? If the gentleman is not afraid that the majority will abuse this power of cutting off debate, I would like to ask him whether he is afraid that one third of the House will exercise its power improperly by protracting debate?

Mr. NEILL here made a remark which could not be heard at the reporters' desk.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio, Will he contribute to the business of the House to bring into this House the operation substantially of the two-thirds rule? Will he accomplish any good by providing that no bill shall come from the Committee of the Whole to the state of the Union until two thirds of the members shall be ready for that proceeding? Will it not place the legislation of the country in the hands of one third of this House? I do not believe that the members of this House are prepared to adopt that two-thirds rule. If they did, then but few measures would ever come before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; for, sir, even as it is now, it is next to impossible to get any bill from that committee. If you enlarge the number of bills upon the Calendar, put more bills there than there are now, you may do so, but you will not even get one bill under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman from Maine can ask me a great many questions in relation to the rules which I cannot answer; a great many to which any attention has not been given; a great many to which I could not give the proper answer, even though I understood it, if I were required to point out the rule to be changed; for, sir, I commenced by stating that I knew very little about the rules of this House. I have seen and felt their practical operation in some particular cases. Now, in answer to the gentleman, I am prepared to admit that if you will confine the debate in this House to the subject which is pending for consideration, and if you then permit two thirds of the House only to call for the previous question, I think that it would be a great improvement upon the present system.

Now, sir, in my admission for this discussion in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message and other general matters. I do not think that it answers any good purpose. I do not think that it informs the country. I do not think that the consideration of the bill which is pending in that body, in that way, is of any benefit. The speeches made in this House ought to be made for the purpose of convincing the minds of members who are to vote upon specific propositions. Whenever you propose to embody in a bill or joint resolution any suggestions or recommendations of the President's message, and that bill or joint resolution is up for consideration and action, then I think that the particular policy to be pursued in that regard is properly up for discussion; but I am entirely opposed—no, I will not say opposed; I am opposed to admit it; I do not think it proper. I do not think it answers any good end for members here, day after day, to neglect the practical legislation of the country upon the pretense that we have not time, when we are here, or rather the House sits here nominally, and we ought to sit here actually, doing duty, discussing subjects which are not before us, and which probably never will come before us—discussing, I said—I mean reading essays upon such subjects, in bad taste, in a worse spirit, one-sided, partial, embittered essays, full of reckless assertion of facts, full of vituperation and abuse, discreditable to this House, discreditable to the authors, and useful only for evil.

Now, sir, I do not think a better illustration of this whole difficulty could be presented than is provided by the bill, read by the other gentleman from the Committee on the Judiciary, which I do not say that it did not come here under the rule; I do not say that it could not be voted on; but I say that the practical question then presented to the House was this: Will you pass this bill without first discussing it, and without knowing what it is, or will you send it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where you will never get at it? I do not know that that was necessarily the alternative upon that bill; but I inferred it from the expressions then made use of by gentlemen.

Now, sir, if there is any receptacle to which bills go, and out of which they cannot come; if the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is such a receptacle, then I want the rules of this House reformed in such a manner so that bills can be got out and brought before the House and considered; that they shall be brought here and subjected to the judgment of the House, and be passed or rejected. It does strike me, and I think that it will strike every one who comes here from the House, that the House is reduced to one or two sessions, that instead of aiding discussion; instead of making this House a deliberative assembly; instead of enabling us to do that, which we were sent here to do—to compare views, to correct our opinions by comparison with the opinions of others—the rules are contrived in such a way as to defeat the consideration of matters of practical legislation, and to give every advantage to questions of general political interest only. Now, it may be the fault is not in the rules; it may be in the temper of the members of the House; but certain it is, that the difficulty exists, and that we all know it.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] knows it as well as any other gentleman of this House; for his long experience must have forced it upon him. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVERETT] spoke of the growth through the country of the codes of practice; and he gave, as I think, a very good reason for the abolition of the original system of special pleading. He said that those who were opposed to that system, generally made the mistake of talking about it, and not about the remedy of that difficulty by abolishing the system altogether; whereas, the true course would have been to make the old rules more stringent, to abolish common counts and general issues. I am not prepared to say that that is not the case here. My friend from Virginia, [Mr. BOCCO], and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN], may know better than I do; but my long experience may lead them to say that the only reform needed is to make the rules still more stringent. But if that is the case, I should like to see those gentlemen who have undertaken to accomplish an amendment of the rules make us a report from which we can determine somewhat for ourselves whether this is a true reform. It is a reform proposed to deal in general denunciation of these rules; I do not understand the half of them; for when I read them, they are almost as unmeaning to me as before I did so. But I speak of two great evils under these rules which have not been noticed, and under which I have somewhat suffered. The first is the impossibility of getting a measure before the House, and the next is the impossibility of considering that which is practical which enters into the legislation of the country, instead of those matters which come up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which embrace every conceivable subject, of every character and description, which at any time it may enter into the brain of any gentleman upon this floor ought to be discussed before the House or the country, or his constituents, or for his amusement, without the least regard to the practical legislation which the country requires.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GROW] how many times in the eight or nine instances of the gentleman, has this House failed to second the demand for the previous question?

Mr. GROW. I do not recollect.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Name one instance.

Mr. GROW. There was one instance in Speaker Banks's time, and it got us into a great deal of difficulty, as the matter went over until the next day. I desire to correct an impression of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] about the rules. He is suffering under a slight mistake in supposing that there is no way in which gentlemen can have anything done except by unanimous consent, or by a vote of two thirds of the House. If all our rules are adhered to as they now stand, all our business can be disposed of. There is no way in which business can be reached and disposed of if our rules are adhered to.

And now, one word in regard to a point referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON], that in my objection to certain measures being received by the House I was in order to accomplish what the gentleman says now he wants to have done. The rules require the committees to be called, and after they have been gone through with, then the States and Territories are to be called, when the gentleman here would have an equal chance. So that what I wanted done, is exactly what the gentleman says he wants done. But gentlemen never appreciate objections made to what they desire to have done, and are disposed to think all such objections as captious and unwarrantable. Of course, if nothing being done out of the regular order, and thus we would be enabled to facilitate the business of the House. What the gentleman says he wants done can be done by doing the business of the House in regular order. Let your committee be called, and no one committee can occupy more than one day, and when the committees are called through then the call of the States is next in order, when any gentleman can bring forward his measures. But if you allow gentlemen to come in during the morning hours and make any number of motions to introduce measures, you will consume all your time and you never will reach the States.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has there ever been a call through the regular order of business upon any day?

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir; since we adopted this provision to the rules.

Mr. PENDLETON. In one session?

Mr. GROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON. How often?

Mr. GROW. Only one, I believe; because we adopted the rule only the Congress before the last, and have not practiced it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it not perfectly in accordance with the rules of this House, at any time after the morning hour has expired, to move to go into Committee of the Whole and cannot a majority, by doing so, interrupt the call, and prevent the introduction of measures. And it is not in order, on Monday, for any gentleman to object. Upon those days does it not require two thirds to introduce any proposition?

Mr. GROW. In the first place, your committees are required to be called in order. After one hour has expired any member can move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table; and you cannot take the floor from any gentleman, except for that purpose. If the House does not consent to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, then any member can move to go into Committee of the Whole. But you cannot take the floor from a member who has it to go into Committee of the Whole, even if the hour has expired. If the hour has expired, and you are on the floor, you are entitled to your hour, unless some gentleman rises and moves to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, which, if it is agreed to, postpones your business until the next day. Thus you have one hour for the dispatch of the committees' reports. When you have gone through all your regular committees in order, then you select one of the committees, and after they are concluded you commence the call of the States.

I desire to speak more particularly now in reference to the gentleman speaking of my objection. I know, as I said before, that it is an objection; but, without any intention of making reference to any gentleman, or without any desire to prevent what he seeks to attain, I make the general objection, in order that we may once more get to the regular order of business of the House according to its rules; for I must say, that our practice here for eight weeks did not inculcate much notion of regular business, and the House seemed a little loth to go to its work regularly. And I am anxious to get at our business in regular order, so that we may discharge the business.

Now, in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. STOUT.] If that amendment passes, no bill can pass this House without a two-thirds vote, I do not care what the bills are that are necessary to be passed. Under your present system of rules, no amendment is referred to the Committee of the Whole, if it is below the call on the Calendar and is not reached, cannot be taken out of the Committee of the Whole without a two-thirds vote.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will recollect that the amendment is not yet to bill which are not referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROW. Whatever is referred to the committee under the present system practically requires two thirds to take it out of committee, unless the bill should be near the top of the Calendar.

Mr. NOELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that no bills can pass this House without the previous question being sprung upon them?

Mr. GROW. I did not say that if the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon is adopted, no bill can pass without it has a two-thirds vote, but practically that will be the effect, because you require two thirds to pass a bill, should you desire to pass it without sending it to the Committee of the Whole. If you send it to committee, and desire to bring it again, it is not there, in most cases, at a two-thirds vote, because you cannot well reach it if it should be low down on the Calendar without two thirds are in favor of it. Thus you virtually put the power of the House, in reference to the passage of all bills, into the hands of a third of the House.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question for information. Is it not the regular order for a bill reported from a standing committee or a select committee to go to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GROW. No more than it is to put a bill upon its passage. The rules provide for both. The one is as much in order as the other. The rule only provides that if there is a motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole, or to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that motion must be first put. If it fails, the bill is to be put upon its passage. So both are equal orders. The proposition of the gentleman from Oregon would have the effect in practice—I do not know if it would have the effect in theory—of putting the Calendar, because there might be a few bills upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which you might reach; but I say it would have the practical effect of preventing any bill upon the Calendar passing without a two-thirds vote, because when a bill is reported the amendment provides expressly that it shall require a two-thirds vote, unless it is sent to the Committee of the Whole; and if sent to the Committee of the Whole, it will never be reached, for it practically requires two thirds to take it up. So you put the power of defeating a bill in the hands of one third of the House.

When a special order is made in committee, you must confine debate to the special order—and a majority may make an appropriation bill a special order—and that will meet the objection of the gentlemen from Missouri and Oregon, who want the discussion confined to the subject under consideration. We have a class of legislation, I grant—and that is the expenditures for the support of the Government—upon which we ought to have discussion. Now, do gentlemen propose to fix this matter in such a way that no general debate in this House can be had, either on the President's message, or the recommendation of the President, or the Department of the Interior? The way gentlemen seem to want this matter fixed would close the mouths of the Representatives of the people upon almost everything of national importance, such as Presidents' messages, reports of Departments, or any other communications to Congress not requiring legislative action. If you do not leave some time for general discussion of measures such as those which are contained in the messages and documents to which I have referred, you place a gag upon the Representatives of the people, and confine debate upon their lips to except matters relating to the expenditures of money by the Government. I am not in favor of that. I am in favor of confining debate upon expenditures strictly to the subject under consideration, and then you have all the advantage gentlemen want.

Now, in regard to the bill which requires a special order. Now it will require only a majority to make an appropriation bill a special order, and you leave other subjects open to general debate—the foreign policy of the Government, for instance. I ask, how could you do that? You have legitimate debate upon questions before Congress as to the intercourse of this Government with Russia, and other foreign Powers? You cannot bring in a bill to say that the intercourse between this country and Russia shall be in a particular way. The bill is not within the scope of legislation. How are you to discuss the great questions of your relations with the world, or your relations to each other at home as independent States, or the relations of the General Government to our common Territories? In reference to the latter, it is true, you may have an appropriation bill for building a penitentiary in one of your Territories; but could you then discuss the relations which exist between the people of a Territory and the general Government upon a bill making appropriation for that purpose? If that is the only place where you could discuss it, if this theory of legislation is carried out. The same would be true in reference to many other important questions; because, unless you should have some bill relating to the particular subject, there would be no opportunity when and where you could discuss those matters.

I have been led into this discussion by discussing the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon, and I will close by restating the two points I desire to make. One was, that if you bring the House to the regular order prescribed by the rules, there is a time for every class of business, and that it is under the control of a majority; that if you depart from the regular order, I grant that the evils which have been pointed out by the gentleman from Oregon will result, and it is to be avoided by asking unanimous consent, or attempting to get up some particular business out of its order, that all this confusion occurs. A member desires to accomplish a particular object out of its regular order, when, if he had insisted on business being conducted in regular order, he and others would have had an opportunity to introduce their propositions under the rules. The other object was, to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Oregon will, in effect, prevent the passage of any bill unless there are two thirds in favor of it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Chairman—
A MEMBER. You have occupied the floor once. Mr. PENDLETON. He is a practical illustration of the difficulty of which I complain; it is, that we are not willing to attend to any of these matters which directly affect the House or the country. When I first rose to make two or three remarks, I heard a member upon the other remark "we shall never get through with this change of rule." Although we have occupied only three or four hours upon it; and now when I rise again, I hear another gentleman remark, "you have occupied the floor once." I do not know that there is any rule of the House which prevents a gentleman occupying the floor twice; but if there is, the Chair need only remind me of the fact, and I will take my seat. These gentlemen are both impatient; they want to get into the debating society again. They cannot bear the tediousness of a practical question.

It is, however, unfortunate that I alluded to my own difficulties under the rules of the House, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania seemed to think I was capriciously complaining of his interposition and of the application of the rules to myself.

Mr. GROW. I had no such feeling. I took occasion to say what I did in justice to myself, because many seemed to think there had been capriciousness upon my part.

Mr. PENDLETON. I had no reason to suppose so. I was speaking with a disposition to find fault with the gentleman, or to complain particularly of the application of the rules of the House to myself. I am well aware that there is a great deal of good sense in these rules; and I have seen them carried out in other legislative bodies, where they operated very well. What I complain of is, of being a member of the Senate of the State of Ohio, rules very similar to these were in operation. The body was small, and the subjects which came before us were comparatively few. Day after day the regular order of business was carried out, and the gentleman, at the close of a day or two every gentleman had a vote upon them. I think, however, that when a body becomes larger, and when the subjects of legislation are so different kind, different rules should be adopted.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to be under great apprehension that members will be precluded from debating subjects of general interest. I ask him if he is not afraid that members will be precluded from debating subjects of special and specific interest in relation to the matters in hand? He says that he is afraid that members will be precluded from discussing the relations of the people to each other here, and their relations with foreign nations. When those matters are in any way connected with legislation, they can be discussed; at all other times their discussion should be subordinate to the other business of the House. I would like to know if he is not afraid that members will be precluded from giving their views upon the merits of the bills reported by the House can cut off debate by the previous question? I agree that general debate ought not to be cut off, that all matters of general interest should have a fair hearing in the House; but I object to a system of rules by which it is the regular order of business to cut off debate every day, and at all hours of the day except the first hour, to discuss matters of general interest, or of merely political significance, while all other subjects can only come up by sufferance of the House, excepting once or twice during the session.

Mr. STOUT. I wish to detain the committee but a moment, to answer some remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Perhaps modesty would have dictated that I should not have taken the ground I have attempted to participate at all in the amendment of these rules, with which I am not very familiar; but I have seen the difficulties growing out of the conduct of business in this House, which have struck me somewhat in the same manner as they have struck the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON], and I desire, if possible, to obviate one of the great and serious difficulties which I think attend us in our legislation.

I did not suppose that the amendment which I proposed would have the effect which is suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, nor do I believe so now. But admit, for the purpose of argument, that it would have the effect of requiring a two-thirds vote to take a bill out of its regular order for the purpose of passing it; I apprehend that it would not be wrong or unjust to do it in most cases. And the effect of such a rule would be to compel us to go to work regularly; to go into the Committee of the Whole, and, when we get there, not make long and unimportant speeches, but go to work, and dispose of the business on the Calendar, in order that we may get to that which most interests us.

As matters now stand, the members generally have only one little bill each for the relief of some of the constituents, in which they are specially interested. They bring those bills before the House, and persuade the House to pass them without referring them to the Committee of the Whole, and then they have no further interest in the business on the Calendar; and those of us who have important measures which we wish to have taken up and disposed of, are unable to bring about any legislation for ourselves and our constituents, simply because many other members get their bills passed without their being referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Now, if all bills were required to go to the Committee of the Whole and take the regular order, unless by a two-thirds vote, we should do much more business, and do it more understandingly, and with more efficiency than we now do. We should then all be put upon an equal footing; and it would take two thirds at least to give one member a preference over another.

I have no desire to obstruct legislation, or to interfere with the due action of the majority; and I have not the same confidence in my own judgment in relation to these matters that I have in that of many others here of greater experience than myself; but it does strike me that this amendment would work well, and would tend to aid in the progress of legislation.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the committee, to come in between the last sentence and the preceding one:

Wherever the House shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject of debate upon which no motion for the previous question had been made, the House may also, at any time, on motion, suspend the order of the members of the House, and suspend pending amendment or an amendment thereof, and cause the question to be put thereon, and this shall not preclude any further amendment by the House.

The object of this amendment is to establish in the House the same practice that the Committee of the Whole yesterday, on the report of the committee on the rules, established for the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GROW. I will say that as far as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] and myself are concerned, we are perfectly agreed to that. It makes the rule uniform in the House and in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLSON. I was about to say that I understand the committee on rules approve and adopt the amendment. It is intended to remove a difficulty which is very often felt by the House. When a bill is under consideration or discussion in the House—it may be bill of the House, or a twelve sections—an amendment may be offered to the first section, and an amendment to that, and we can go no further. A debate may spring up lasting several days. You cannot get rid of that debate except by killing the previous question. That precludes all further amendments in the House, and the House may not wish to do that. This amendment will give the House an opportunity of closing debate upon the pending amendment only, and then going on to receive and consider other amendments to other parts of the bill.

I will say, sir, in closing the brief remarks I am now submitting to the committee, that I hardly regard these suggestions of mine as implying any inadvertence or omission on the part of the committee. I believe they intended to embrace these very topics. I have examined over the amendments reported by the committee, and I may say that nearly all of them—perhaps all of them—meet my entire approbation. I think that this committee have performed the duty intrusted to them with nearly great judgment. I believe that nearly every change, and every change they propose, is desirable, and will be found to be advantageous; and I do not regard these suggestions of mine so much as amendments to their propositions as the carrying out of their own ideas as expressed in their report, but not carried out to the extent which my amendment provides.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state that I think I have consulted all the members of the committee who are present, and they agree to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, and suppose it is necessary to carry out their idea in regard to this matter.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was then adopted.

Fifteenth amendment:

Amend rule 58, by striking out all, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment, shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and from any cause, other business shall intervene, it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of. And the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed after the close of the business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sixteenth amendment:

Strike out all after the word "General," in the fourth line, and insert the word "General," in the fourth line of the following rule:

"61. A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States or directing it to be made by the head of either of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General, (or to print an extra number of any document or other matter, excepting messages of the President to both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in it) shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be amended for consideration in the order they were presented, immediately after reports are called for from select committees, and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be printed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Seventeenth amendment:

Amend rule 67, by striking out from the beginning to and including the word "be," in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "it shall lie on the table one day for consideration," and also by inserting after the word "afore," in the same line, the words "to aid in the enforcement of the order under the direction of the Speaker," so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arm to attend the House, and to be ready to aid in the enforcement of the order, under the direction of the Speaker; to execute the commands of the House from time to time, together with such other orders under the direction of the Speaker, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker.

The amendment was agreed to.

Eighteenth amendment:

Strike out the 7th rule, as follows:

"The Sergeant-at-Arm shall be sworn to keep the secrets of the House." (Provided for by proposed amendment to rule 14.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Nineteenth amendment:

Strike out rule 73, as follows:

"The Sergeant-at-Arm shall be appointed for the service of the House." (Provided for by proposed amendment to rule 14.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Twentieth amendment:

Strike out rule 74, as follows:

"The Sergeant-at-Arm shall be sworn to keep the secrets of the House." (Provided for by proposed amendment to rule 14.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-first amendment:

Strike out all of rule 75, as follows:

"The Sergeant-at-Arm shall be appointed for the post office kept in the Capitol for the accommodation of the members, shall be appointed by the House," and insert:

"The Sergeant-at-Arm shall be appointed for the post office kept in the Capitol for the accommodations of the members."

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-second amendment:

Amend rule 76, by striking out the word "eight," in the first line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven," and also by striking out the word "accused," in the second line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Congress," so that it will read:

"Twenty-seven standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, viz:—

1. A Committee on Engraving, to consist of three members."

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-third amendment:

Amend by striking out the words in brackets in the following rule:

"78. It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all such reports of the Treasury Department and all such propositions. Also, (if the revenue, as may be referred to them by the House) to inquire into the state of the public debt or the revenue, and of the expenditures of the Government, from time to time, that may be referred to them, and to report thereon; (to examine into the state of the several public Departments, and particularly into the laws making appropriations of money, and to report thereon; and to have been disbursed conformably with such laws; and also to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the Departments and the accountability of their officers.")

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Amend by striking out the words "and also to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government," in the following rule:

"102. It shall be the duty of the Committee of Accounts to supervise and audit the expenditures of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; also to audit and settle all accounts which may be charged thereon; and also to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government, and their attendance in the House."

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

Amend rule 103 by striking out the word "six," in the first line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "seven," by inserting at the end of the rule "7." A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Interior Department shall be read as follows:

"103. Seven additional standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each first session in each Congress, whose duties shall continue until the first session of the ensuing Congress.

To consist of five members each.

1. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of State;
2. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of War;
3. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Department of the Navy;
4. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Public Buildings;
5. A committee on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relates to the Interior Department.

(This amendment simply provides for the appointment of a committee on so much of the Department organized since the last revision of the rules.)

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-sixth amendment:

Amend rule 104, by striking out the words "there shall be appointed a standing committee of this House, to consist of three members, to be called the Committee on Engraving, to whom shall be referred, by the Clerk," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "there shall be appointed, by the Clerk, to the members of the Committee on Printing on the part of the House," so that it will read:

There shall be appointed, by the Clerk, to the members of the Committee on Printing on the part of the House, all drawings, maps, charts or other papers, which may at any time come before the House for engraving, lithographing or publishing in any way; which committee shall report to the House whether the same ought, in their opinion, to be published; and if the House order the publication of the same, that said committee shall direct the size and manner of execution of all such maps, charts, drawings, or other papers, and control the printing, engraving, lithographing, engraving, and coloring, as may be ordered by the House, which agreement shall be written and signed by the members of the Committee of Accounts, to govern said committee in all allowances for such work; and it shall be in order for said committee to report at any time.

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

Strike out rule 116, as follows:

"Not more than three bills, originating in the House, shall be committed to the Committee of the Whole; and such bills shall be analogous in their nature, which analogy shall be determined by the Speaker."

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. Without any very strong hope, I move the amendment which I am about to propose will meet the approval of the committee, I move to substitute the following for rule 118, which the committee propose to strike out, and I submit the amendment without comment:

Insert after the figure 8, the words "No bill shall contain more than one subject which shall be clearly expressed in its title; no amendment upon a subject not so expressed in the title, shall be in order; and no bill or joint resolution requiring the approval of the President shall be in order unless it contain the entire act or joint resolution proposed to be revived, or the section or sections thereof to be amended, and contain also a repeal of such section or sections."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment as reported by the committee was then agreed to.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

Amend rule 117, by adding at the end thereof the words,

"and to report thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

"whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommended to the said committee without further action by the House;" so that it will read:

"motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection."

Whenever a bill is reported from a Committee of the Whole, with a recommendation to strike out the enacting words, and such recommendation is disagreed to by the House, the bill shall stand recommended to the said committee without further action by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

Amend rule 119, by adding at the end the words, "and should such recommendation take effect (its disagreement, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill)" so that it will read:

After the committee and report thereof to the House, or at any time before its passage, a bill may be recommitted, and should such recommendation take place after its engrossment, and an amendment be reported and agreed to by the House, the question shall be again put on the engrossment of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Thirtieth amendment:

Strike out the 124th rule, which reads as follows, provision having been made for it in the 123rd rule, as amended, by the committee:

"It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House to receive itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union."

The amendment was agreed to.

Thirty-first amendment:

Amend rule 120, by striking out the words "all questions, whether in committee or in the House, shall be propounded in the order in which they were moved, except this;" so that it will read:

In filling up blanks the largest sum and longest time shall be put first.

Thirty-second amendment:

Amend rule 125, by adding at the end thereof "and all debate on special orders shall be considered subsidiary in the measure under consideration;" so that it will read:

"The Committee of the Whole House shall have the bills shall be taken up and disposed of in their order on the Calendar; but when objection is made in the consideration of a bill, a majority of the committee shall decide whether the debate thereon it shall be taken up and disposed of or laid aside: Provided, That general appropriation bills, and, in case of war, bills raising money, and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills at the discretion of the committee; and when disagreed to by any member, the question shall now prevail here; and all debate on special orders shall be confined strictly to the measure under consideration."

Mr. CASE. I move to amend by adding the following:

And all debate in violation of the rules of the House, except such as shall be indulged in by the unanimous consent of its members, shall be excluded from the official reports of the debates of this body.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to occupy the time of the committee at any considerable length in the discussion of the amendment I have submitted. I believe that if it is adopted it will prove to be one of the best remedies we could have devised for a great deal of the disorder and confusion which prevail in this House. I am not in the habit of speaking in this House, nor in the Committee of the Whole, when I can avoid doing so. I am in the habit of listening to what is said by others, and the difficulty I have experienced in doing this seems to be generally the same. I have been compelled to listen to about a dozen speeches at the same time. When we are under the operation of the previous question, or under the operation of other rules cutting off debate, gentlemen rise up here, and in defiance of the rules and calls of order, make remarks which are prohibited by the rules, but which members are anxious to get out for the purpose of explaining their position. They are not made, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of setting members right upon this floor—and I will say that I make reference to no particular number—but, if I may use the expression, for Buncombe, and that they may be referred to by the member when he is before his constituents. If we exclude from the Globe all proceedings which are not in order, we will, I think, get rid of much of the disorder and confusion which now prevail here. During the call of the roll, or when we are acting under the previous question, and when debate is not in order, it seems to me that much of the lawlessness and disregard of the rules occur. Then members seem determined to utter something which shall get into the Globe, and be read elsewhere; for it is done, I am sure, with no expectation of influencing the vote of any member in this House. I submit the amendment, and ask that the sense of the committee be taken on it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think that the reform contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is a good and needful one, and I am sure we can do it, and be accomplished by an amendment to the rules.

Mr. NOELL. The country, sir, only needs this amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to complete the work begun by the previous question. Freedom of speech has already been granted by the adoption of the previous question, in addition to that, it is now proposed to suppress the freedom of the press. Not only are we not permitted to make objections here, but it is now asked that power be conferred upon the Speaker of this House to determine when remarks made by a gentleman upon this floor are or are not in order, and shall or shall not be published in the record of our debates. I object to the amendment.

Mr. CASE. That power is not proposed to be vested in the Speaker any more than it is vested in him now.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I would cheerfully be willing to adopt a measure to do away with the official reports of our proceedings, and to exclude our friends, the reporters, from this floor, for the purpose of preventing the publication of our proceedings in the press; but, in order that the proceedings of this House, it is necessary that they should be fairly and fully reported; that all that is said and done should be put down. And I submit to the gentleman from Indiana that his proposition, if adopted, would be an exceedingly unwise one, for the reason that in many instances it would exclude many things that ought to be preserved.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to insert in the rule as amended, after the word "on," these words, "on appropriation bills when made;" so that it will read "all debate on appropriation bills when made special orders," &c.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly do not agree in opinion with some of the gentlemen who have addressed the committee on the subject of what is called general debate, or, as sometimes denominated, "Buncombe" speeches. This is a kind of debate, a sort of rhetoric, upon which many gentlemen look with little favor. It is complained, and with just reason, that the great mass of speeches and come here and read them. So far as my observation extends, the gentlemen who make the most complaint of written speeches are themselves the silver-tongued eloquist of the House. Now, so far as I am concerned, I would prefer that when a gentleman who is not gifted, as many are not, with the graces and beauties of oratory, attempts to address the House, that he should give us his best thoughts clothed in the best language that he can command, even if he is obliged to reduce the length of his speech. I have myself made a speech of the character complained of, for I have never spoken on any subject which was not directly a matter of legislation. Still, sir, I do think it is an important privilege that members of the House ought to enjoy, for in many instances it is the only way in which they can give their power to do, to raise a voice of protest against the action of a majority.

The rules of this House were designed for the protection of minorities against the action of a proud, triumphant, domineering, tyrannical majority, carried away by the very lust and greed of the power they possess. As the amendment is now proposed—though I am aware that the chairman of the committee for the revival of the rules [Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine.] differs with me in that respect—it seems to me that it would give the minority wholly in the power of the majority to determine what questions shall be debated; for it is known that in the House no debate is legitimate except upon the matter immediately under consideration. Our general debate occurs only when the Committee of the Whole is in session, and the amendment of the committee on the revision of the rules is adopted—in that the Committee of the Whole debate on special orders shall be limited to the subjects of the special orders—it does seem to me that it puts it closely within the power of the majority to control the whole of the debate in Committee of the Whole by never going into Committee of the Whole, except upon special orders.

The consequence, therefore, would be, that the majority of the House would hold the key to the entire debates of the House during the whole session.

Yesterday when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] was explaining the amendment that had been proposed by the committee, I called his attention to this amendment, with the view of ascertaining whether it was the purpose of the committee, in the report they had made, to cut off what is called general debate, and prevent members from speaking on any subject except that which was, for the time being, formally and nominally under consideration. He assured us that such was not their purpose; that they did not design to do any such thing. Now, if that had been their intention, then the question would have arisen directly for the House to decide whether they were prepared so to amend the rules as to cut off the general debates. I understand that that was not the purpose of the committee. But from the discussions which we have already had, and which I do not desire to renew, it is manifestly the intention of this Committee of the Whole not so to amend the rules as to change the present practice of the House. I therefore propose to limit the application of the amendment of the revising committee to general appropriation bills, which, as was said, is the only class of bills which the committee, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine.] are sometimes exceedingly necessary to be passed, in order to enable the business of the Government to be carried on. There is no other legislation of such high necessity, and consequently none which should receive the same consideration from the House in the construction and administration of its rules.

I fully sympathize with all that has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NOELL], yesterday, and I am sure that he would be as proper of urging important legislation upon the House, and pressing it upon the country, without any opportunity for investigation and debate; requiring us to decide important questions upon first impressions, without an opportunity to deliberate and decide. It is unnecessary to do so; and I were in a position to give advice to our friends of the Republican party, I would suggest to them that, unless they have a great deal more confidence in the decisions of their committees than I think most committees are entitled to enjoy, I should think they would be very hazardous to put important legislation through the House with as little consideration as they gave to the homestead bill and the printing bill, passed upon us during the present session. Having explained my reasons for offering this amendment, I will not extend my remarks any further.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] for the reason that I did not desire to suppress general debate in Committee of the Whole. I do not desire to see the House placed in a position in which there might be a general debate; where the Union generally, and all matters pertaining to the Union and to the interests of the country, might be discussed. But I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] errs in assuming that the Committee of the Whole, if a committee, if adopted, would tend in any degree to suppress general debate in the Committee of the Whole. Under the rules of the House, as they now stand, debate is not in order upon special orders. Formerly general debate was in order, even when the Committee of the Whole had under consideration special orders. The practice of the House in that regard was changed in 1852 or 1853, growing out of the practical mischief and inconvenience resulting from permitting general debate upon special orders. The Committee of the Whole were considering special orders. It was, I believe, upon the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill, or some other bill perhaps, that the entire time of its session given to the consideration of that question was exhausted by general debate, without one word of the subject of the bill being said in the special order. In consequence of that, and by the general and universal acquiescence of the House, the practice of the House was changed in that respect, so that now, whenever we are in Committee of the Whole upon a special order, general debate is not in order.

And what do we propose now? Simply that: that in addition to that, whenever the appropri-

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The House makes it own rules. It has the right and power under the Constitution to do so.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to know of the gentleman from Maine what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution which gives to "each House" the right to make its own rules of procedure; not that one House shall have a right to make rules for the next House, but each House shall have a right to make its own rules. I would like to know what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution?

Mr. GROW. This amendment does not so provide. It does not confer the action of any succeeding House in making its rules. They can make them when they please; but until they do make rules, these will stand just as Jefferson's Manual is now regarded, as the authority until rules are adopted which interfere with it. The amendment only provides that these shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them.

Mr. NOELL. The gentleman does not answer my question. My question is, what this House has got to do with making rules for the next House?

Mr. GROW. That is just what I am trying to answer.

Mr. NOELL. How can you make rules that will apply to the action of the House not now in existence?

Mr. GROW. We do not make rules for the next House. We only provide that these rules shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them; and, if they choose to not during the whole session without altering them, then they accept them as their rules by their own action. The House of Representatives continues under the Constitution, without interregnum, just as much as the Senate. This idea that there is a period of time when there is no Congress, under our Constitution, goes on the supposition that there is a period of time when there is no Government. There is a Congress in existence, under the Constitution, all the time; and when the House meets here, the Constitution says they shall select their Speaker. If you have not a House, how are you going to elect a Speaker? They are just as much a House of Representatives, under the Constitution, the day they meet, as they are after they have elected a Speaker; they are not organized under the forms they choose to adopt; that is all. Up to the time when they choose to adopt rules, by their acquiescence in the rules at any meeting, their own rules, so that they will not be left any time without rules.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, called for tellers on the amendment.

The committee was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas seventy-eight; a further count not being demanded.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Do I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. BURNETT. Will it be in order to move to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. A motion to reconsider is not in order in the committee; but the gentleman can say the yeas and nays upon the amendment in the House.

Mr. BURNETT. Well, sir, I think, if the gentleman from Maine wants to pass these rules in the House, he had better withdraw that amendment.

Mr. BOCKOC. I have one or two amendments which I wish to propose; they relate to mere matters of form, and I presume there will be no objection to them. The first amendment I shall propose is to the 69th rule, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be, for every arrest, the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and maintenance, one dollar; and for travelling expenses for himself, or a special messenger, going and returning, one tenth of a dollar per mile."

Mr. BOCKOC. I move to amend by adding to the end of that rule as follows:

"For each mile necessarily and actually traveled by such officer or other person in the execution of such precept or summons."

There is a law which provides what shall be the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms; and this is merely to make the rules of the House conform to that law, and for the purpose of having it before us, so that we may always understand how they are to be computed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOCKOC. I have another amendment which I propose to offer to the 79th rule, which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"It shall also be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, within thirty days after their appointment, at every session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of January, to report the general appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government; for the Army; for the Navy; and for the Indian Department and Indian annuities; or, in failure thereof, the reasons of such failure."

Mr. BOCKOC. I move to amend that rule by striking out all after "appropriation bills," in the fourth line, and to insert the word "annuities," in the seventh line, and inserting in lieu thereof:

"For legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for provisions; for the service of the Post Office Department, and for mail transportation by ocean steamers."

The object of the amendment is merely to adapt our rules to the designations which have been given to the regular appropriation bills, and which have been changed since that rule was adopted. Within the last two Congresses, gentlemen who have been here will remember that we have divided one of the appropriation bills, known as the civil and diplomatic bill, into three several bills, called by different names; and the object of this amendment is merely to designate the bills by the titles which are now given them. It makes no other change.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia whether it would not be well to add to the amendment the provision giving the Committee of Ways and Means the right to report these general appropriation bills and revenue bills at any time?

Mr. BOCKOC. I refer to appropriation bills; I do not refer to revenue bills. I would suggest as to give the Committee of Ways and Means leave to report at any time. My amendment refers only to appropriation bills; and if the gentleman wishes, I will add at the end of it, "and the Committee of Ways and Means shall have the right to report revenue bills at any time."

Mr. SHERMAN. "These bills and revenue bills."

Mr. BOCKOC. That would give rise to debate here certainly, before the committee would consent to adopt it, and I do not care to incubate my amendment with it. Unless the gentleman wishes me to modify it, as I have suggested, I will allow my amendment to stand as I originally offered it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a matter of no importance to me, that you should give the Committee of Ways and Means the right to report appropriation bills at any time, unless you include also revenue bills; because it is useless to report bills making appropriations of money unless we are allowed also to report bills to provide for raising the money. Unless the amendment is put in that shape, it can see no use in its adoption.

Mr. BOCKOC. The gentleman wishes that the Committee of Ways and Means shall have the right to report at any time a tariff bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. For revenue. For revenue.

Mr. NOELL. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that an appropriation bill is to be at the same time connected with a tariff bill as a matter of necessity?

Mr. SHERMAN. An appropriation is not necessarily a tariff bill. A tariff bill is a tariff bill.

Mr. NOELL. Do you mean that revenue bills necessarily include appropriation bills?

Mr. SHERMAN. Revenue bills are necessary if appropriation bills are to be passed. I move the amendment, and I submit the bill from Virginia by inserting "and revenue bills."

Mr. BOCKOC. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that motion. I say to the gentleman that the Committee of Ways and Means will have very little difficulty in reporting any tariff bill they shall agree upon, and it is very easy to bring such a bill before the House, and to give a bill of that description this peculiar privilege will do us good. It will certainly create discussion, and perhaps preclude the adoption of this amendment altogether.

Mr. GROW. I desire to know whether I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. Is it simply to specify in the 79th rule such bills as have been created since that rule was originally adopted?

Mr. BOCKOC. That is all. It is simply to define the appropriation bills as they are defined in the practice of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see no objection to that. Mr. SHERMAN will not put a word of amendment upon that of the gentleman from Virginia at this time, if he wishes me to withdraw it.

Mr. BOCKOC's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will offer, in connection with the amendment which has just been adopted, the following addition: That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to report general appropriation bills and revenue bills, for reference merely, at any time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand this amendment to include a tariff bill with the appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. It simply authorizes the Committee of Ways and Means to report them for reference.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the first branch of this amendment ought to be adopted; but the latter branch of it is certainly wrong, and ought not to be adopted. It is not one session in ten that anything like a modification, or change in the rates of duties to be levied on imports is proposed. It is very seldom that you will want to exercise the power, and without this privilege, whenever you want to report a tariff bill, there will be no difficulty in getting any bill that the Committee of Ways and Means shall have agreed on before the House; especially under the regulations contained in one of the changes which have been made to-day, by which all business unplaced upon at the close of one session resumes its place at the beginning of the next session of the same Congress, as if no recess had taken place. Under that rule, if a bill is introduced at any time during the first session of a Congress, it may be taken and acted upon in its order at any time before the close of the last session.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know to what this amendment is to be attached. I understood the Chair to decide yesterday that the rule of the House was to be left to the committee of that body, the rule to which this has reference is not before us, and, as a matter of course, this amendment cannot be in order. If the Chairman decides in this regard as he did yesterday, then I make the point of order that this amendment cannot be received, because there is nothing under consideration to which it can attach.

Mr. GROW. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BOCKOC), just adopted, is the matter to which, I suppose, this amendment attaches.

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment has been adopted, and is not before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio to be offered as an additional rule.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I not understand that it can be offered as such under the ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the report of the special committee to be the matter before us, and that you should give the committee to make additions to that report.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then that brings all the rules of the House practically before the committee. Now, sir, I do not understand that there is an absolute necessity even for the first branch of this amendment. The 79th rule, as it is, makes it the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report the general appropriation bills; and, as I understand it, gives the committee the right to report them at any time. Under the decision of the Chair yesterday, the rules of the House are not before this committee; and I submit that this amendment—which, if adopted at all, should be attached to the 79th rule—cannot be properly received. It is the same, in fact, if received, as an additional rule; as if the 79th rule were before us, and it is not before us, and it is added to that.

Mr. OLIN. I think the gentleman from Alabama is mistaken in reference to the ruling of the Chair. I remember that I attempted to offer an amendment to the 64th rule, which had not been referred to in the report of the committee. I was told then that these amendments were before the committee; and the gentleman upon my left raised the point of order that it was not then in order for me to propose my amendment, but that it would be when the amendments of the committee on the revision of the rules had been gone through with.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is wholly mistaken, for the point of order was made upon me.

Mr. OLIN. I am not mistaken.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point of order was made upon me. It may also have been made upon the gentleman. The Chair will remember that I presented the direct and positive point for the decision of the Chair. I put the question whether the rules of the House were not before this committee so that we could propose amendments to them. The Chair decided that the rules were not before the committee, and that it was not within my power to propose an amendment to any rule which the report of the committee did not bring before this committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to discuss this question, and, in order to save the time of the committee, I withdraw my amendment and move to add to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bocock], "and the officers of the House," for revising revenue for reference. That will make the amendment include all we design to provide for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state how he understands this question of order. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hooper] yesterday made the point that an amendment to an amendment to an amendment of the committee on the revision of the rules was an amendment in the third degree, and therefore not in order. He considered that the rules of the House were the text. The Chair holds that the report of the committee was in the same manner to be considered as amendments of the Senate to a House bill; that it was the text, and that it was in order to move to that report amendments in the second degree. This select committee was organized for the purpose of examining, revising, and reporting amendments to the rules of the House. They have reported thirty-eight amendments. As those amendments were being passed upon, the question was made as to whether it was in order to interpose an amendment to one of the amendments. The committee had not proposed to amend. The Chair decided that it was not in order to act upon other amendments to the rules until the amendments of the committee were disposed of; and that then, when the amendments reported by the committee were acted upon, it would be in order to move additional amendments to the rules. Therefore the Chair now holds that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is in order, as an addition to the amendments of the rules reported by the committee.

Mr. BOECK. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Sweeney] has thought it incumbent upon him to submit this amendment. The committee on the revision of the rules, as the Chair has just stated, came forward with thirty-six or thirty-seven amendments to the rules. Those amendments, taking everything into consideration, have been received here with a remarkable degree of favor. My honorable colleague from the Norfolk district, [Mr. Murtz], who had his name submitted to this subject during the last Congress, and who was a member of the special committee on the rules of the last Congress, did us the credit to say that he had examined our amendments thoroughly, and was of the belief that every single one of them would work advantage and reform in the rules as they now stand. We had progressed in our action entirely through them. They would have gone through the House; and I think that they would have been received by the country—at least by those who attend and submit subject to the great deal of favor. I am sure that they would have facilitated the business of the House. The state of mind in which the action of this committee upon the amendments had left the members of the House was a pleasant and agreeable one, but the gentleman from Ohio comes forward with a proposition that has just now one which will excite a great deal of opposition; one which will be received with a great deal of disfavor, because it is a proposition to give precedence to party legislation.

I tell gentlemen upon the other side that if they want some change of the tariff, they will have opportunity to bring forward any bill for that purpose upon which the Committee of Ways and Means may agree. There will be no difficulty, I think, in that particular. Sooner or later the committee will get an opportunity to bring it into the House.

Gentlemen ask me why, then, not allow this amendment to pass? What, I am asked, is the difference between a revenue measure and an appropriation bill? I will tell gentlemen. There is a difference between them as clear as sunlight and as broad as truth from error. Why let the Committee of Ways and Means report the appropriation bills at any time? Every appropriation bill lasts for only a certain fixed time. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Sweeney] reports a bill for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1861. Unless there is additional legislation at the time named that appropriation bill will exhaust itself, and the officers will then be without money to carry on the operations of the Government. It is necessary, therefore, at stated periods, to bring in appropriation bills for the purpose of executing the laws and carrying on the functions of the Government. It is necessary that they should be brought forward early in the session and put through in time.

How is it with a revenue bill? A revenue bill when passed into law stands upon the statute-book until it is repealed. It does not expire, like an appropriation bill, upon the 30th of June; therefore it is that I state that appropriation bills and revenue bills do not occupy the same position. One of them is as much independent legislation as anything that can be brought before this House. And, sir, there is no good reason for allowing the Committee of Ways and Means to give precedence to a tariff bill which would not equally apply in favor of allowing the Committee on Commerce to report a river and harbor bill, or of allowing the Committee on Public Lands to report a bill to the Government. I am sure that the argument is wrong and ought not to be adopted; for we certainly, in the state of affairs now existing, ought not to have a rule permanently established which is meant to give precedence to a party measure at this time. I say that there is no need for it. A revenue bill stands upon a totally different ground from appropriation bills. Revenue bills remain upon the statute-book until repealed, whereas appropriation bills exhaust themselves at the end of the fiscal year for which they are passed. I trust that the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. CAMPBELL took the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at this point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. I want to know the precise condition of this amendment, and what is the Chair's decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that the amendment is in order as an addition to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. That it is in order as an amendment to the report of the committee which has been adopted, and which it is now within the power of this committee to alter?

The CHAIRMAN. The report of the committee on the revision of the rules is acted upon, one amendment after the other, and the Chair thinks that it is in order now to move additional amendments to that report.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the point I make. I differ with the Chair in respect to what occurred between him and myself yesterday. I have been looking for the decision of the Chair, but have been unable to find it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a point of order. Mr. CAMPBELL. It has been decided, and is not now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to take an appeal.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understood, yesterday, that the Chair decided that the rules were not before the committee. I make a point of that report of the committee on the revision of the rules having been agreed to, there is nothing left for this committee to add to. The report has been agreed to; it has been acted on, and not a line and not a word of it can be touched by us. We cannot in this committee change a sentence of it; we cannot take from it or add to it, for it has passed from us and is out of our jurisdiction, having been agreed to by the Committee of the Whole on the subject of the revision of the rules.

Now, sir, I make the point of order, that that being true, such an amendment is not in order now; and more especially is it not in order, unless it come in the shape of a distinct and independent section, as it were, of a bill. And even that, by action of the presiding officers of this House, has been overruled. And in this case, where you are acting upon a set of rules, upon a matter which your special committee have presented to you for your action, your authority over it ceases whenever you have acted upon the last part of the subject-matter in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The report of the committee is not yet disposed of. There is yet a resolution in the report of the committee to be acted upon, and therefore the report of the committee has not been acted upon.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there a part of the report yet to be acted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. There is. The resolution still remains unacted upon; the report of the committee is not yet disposed of; and the officers of the House stand further that, acting upon the construction now placed upon it, he advised gentlemen yesterday that their amendments would be in order when we had gone through with the amendments reported by the committee; and he will adhere to that.

Mr. HOUSTON. If this amendment is germane to the remaining portion of the report yet to be acted upon, then it is clearly in order; if not, then it stands as I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that everything that is germane to the rules of the House. But the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Sweeney] cannot be attached to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bocock], because the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not germane to it.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the reading of the amendment offered by Mr. Bocock, which had been adopted; and it was accordingly read, as follows:

Strike out of rule 73 the words "for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government" for the Army, for the Navy; and for the Indian department and Indian annuities; and insert in lieu thereof

"For legislative, circuit, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian department; for the payment of land and other pensions for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post Office Department; and for mail transportation by ocean steamers—; in fullness thereof the reasons of such failure."

Mr. GROW. Will the Clerk read the rule as it will stand if amended in the way proposed?

The rule was then read, as follows:

"I shall also be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report the following bills: for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, on the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills—for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian department; for the payment of land and other pensions for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post Office Department; and for mail transportation by ocean steamers—in fullness thereof the reasons of such failure."

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Sweeney]?

The amendment was reported, as follows:

Add to the amendment already adopted—

And that said committee shall have leave to report said bills and bills for raising revenue, for reference only, at any time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Bocock] does not object to the first clause of that amendment.

Mr. BOECK. I do not object to anything in the amendment, except the words "and bills for raising revenue."

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing that those words should be stricken out, and that the question be taken upon the amendment so modified.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. SHERMAN, as modified; and it was agreed to.

Mr. OLIN. I propose to offer an amendment to the 24th rule of the House; and, in order that it may be fully understood, I will read that rule as it now stands, and then read the amendment I propose to offer to it. The rule now reads:

"Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, indorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereon; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker; if any petition or memorial is so handed in, without the judgment of the Speaker, it is excluded by the rules; the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received."

I propose to amend, by adding the following:

Provided, No memorial, petition, or claim, that has once been presented to either House, referred to a committee, and reported upon adversely, shall be again presented in the House, by filing with the Clerk; but may be presented in the House accompanied by a statement indorsed thereon, of the reason why a further investigation is desired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker resuming the chair, the House received a message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKER, its Clerk, that the Senate had passed the following bills, in which they asked the concurrence of the House:

• A resolution (No. 6) authorizing the enlargement of, and construction of, a branch to the Louisville and Portland canal;

• An act (No. 386) to amend the existing laws relative to the compensation of the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States; and

• An act (No. 347) for the relief of Mary E. Casner.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—AGAIN.

The Committee of the Whole again resumed its session.

The question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. OLIN to the 24th rule of the House.

Mr. OLIN. The object of that amendment is this: a great labor is imposed upon the committees of this House, who are obliged to investigate claims that are constantly thrust before them; and in being obliged to reinvestigate over and again the same claim, who there is no possibility of furnishing any additional proof whatever. Nay, so far has this practice gone under that rule that during the same session of Congress, after a claim has been presented and referred to one committee, acted upon by that committee, and reported adversely, the same claimant will come forward through your Departments here, get the papers again, and, under that rule, refer them to a different committee, who will also examine them, and report adversely upon the claim. And if you will examine your printed volumes of the indexing of these claims, you will see that a great variety of these claims have been reported upon over and over again adversely by various committees.

Now the rule, standing as it does now, but with the addition I propose, will leave every claim occasionally presented to the House, and referred to the committees under the rule. But when a claim has been once referred, and has been reported upon adversely, my amendment proposes to require that the claimant shall bring it before the House with the reasons indorsed upon it, why a reconsideration of the claim is required. I think the adoption of this amendment would save our committee a vast amount of labor: I know that some gentlemen have said to me, that when these claims are repeatedly referred, all they do is to ascertain whether they have been once examined and reported upon adversely, and then they lay them aside. But I hardly think that such a course is consistent with the proper discharge of the duties devolved upon the committees. When a claim is referred for examination a second time, that second examination is just as laborious and difficult as the first examination was, although the committee arrive at the same conclusion. I hope, therefore, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not think there is any necessity for that amendment of the rules, for the reason that memorials and petitions are very frequently referred to committees, who report upon them adversely, and that, too, when they ought not to be so reported. No injury can result either to the business of the House, or to the parties interested in those papers, by not adopting the amendment which the gentleman proposes.

The more investigation, it strikes me, we may have in reference to any matter, the more likely we shall be to arrive at just and correct conclusions. I know it is repeatedly the case, that the action of a former committee has been reversed by the action of the House, and that, too, in a great number of instances, where it was not to do so. It seems to me, that the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York will tend to embarrass the business of the House, instead of doing any good in any way.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. With all due respect to my colleague, it seems to me that this amendment would be a very unwise one to adopt. If the gentleman would consent to accept an alteration of the phraseology of the amendment, to the effect that a memorial or petition should not be presented a second time during the same Congress, I could vote for it. But, sir, if we take the position that the decision of a general or special committee of this House, adverse to the memorial, shall be conclusive for all future time, we are assuming the position of a court of law, and the House may at all times interfere the plea of res adjudicata to any case which may be presented a second time.

Mr. OLIN. The gentleman evidently does not understand the force of the amendment I have proposed. It does not preclude the petitioner from having his claim reexamined. It only compels him to show upon the face of the papers that his claim has been once examined and reported upon adversely, and to state briefly why he insists upon a reexamination. It does not interfere with the right of the petitioner to only appear in the House if the claim has been once adjudicated, and why the petitioner insists upon a readjudication. It does not deprive the petitioner of any substantial right whatever. While I am upon the floor, permit me to suggest a modification of my amendment, which may be useful to some gentlemen in interpretation. It is to insert, after the words "that the claim has been reported upon adversely," the words "and the report adopted by the House."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. As my colleague expresses his amendment, I see, in fact, no great objection to it, except that it is a work of supererogation. It may, perhaps, tend to facilitate the business of the committee, to which petitions are referred. Whether a memorial or petition has been referred to the committee or not, I do not know, whether action has been had upon it, as shown upon the Journals of the House. At no time has there been any difficulty in ascertaining the antecedents of a memorial or petition. I do not know that it is very important, though it may be of some advantage to the committee, to know by indorsement, what has been the previous history of the memorial or petition, and for what reason it is again referred to the committee. If, therefore, that be the extent of the amendment, and no more, I do not see that it is very objectionable, nor do I see any good reason for its adoption.

Mr. GROW. I do not see any advantage to result from this amendment, except that it may relieve the committee from a little labor.

Mr. WHITELEY. I desire to offer an amendment to the twenty-sixth amendment proposed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order now to amend any amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WHITELEY. Then I will offer it as an independent amendment. I had my amendment drawn up as an amendment to the amendment; but I will have it phraseology altered. It will be necessary to state the connection in which it comes in before I offer it. The committee propose to abolish the Committee on Engraving, and to devote its duties upon the Committee on Printing. My amendment proposes that all engraving, lithographing, printing, drawing, and coloring, shall be given over to the Committee on Printing, who are established in two of the newspapers in Washington; and then, that the committee shall contract for such work with the lowest bidder.

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman that the amendment which he proposes is but a rule, and not an amendment.

Mr. WHITELEY. I assume that the House of Representatives can regulate the giving out of their own work by contract as well as by agreement. Why can they not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman that no debate is in order until the amendment has been presented.

Mr. WHITELEY. My amendment reads as follows:

All contracts shall be made by the Committee on Printing with the lowest bidder, for the engraving, lithographing, printing, drawing, and coloring, upon proposals issued by the committee, and published in two of the newspapers printed in the city of Washington.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, there have been various rumors in reference to the bestowment of these contracts or agreements by the committees of this House for years.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a point of order. There is a law controlling the joint Committee on Printing. They are bound by that law, and the rules of the House cannot change it. This amendment is not germane to the rules or to any amendment which the committee on rules has reported.

Mr. WHITELEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania: there is a law of the United States, or provision of law, which prohibits this House from giving its own work by contract, or letting the Committee on Printing and the Committee on Engraving do any private agreements between themselves and other persons?

Mr. GROW. My point of order is, that a rule of the House cannot supersede a law of Congress, and that the committee will be bound to observe the law and not the rule, if you pass it.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be very difficult for the Chair to say whether the amendment is in conflict with the law, unless he had the law before him. Besides that, it may be a question whether it is in conflict with the law or not; and it is for the committee to determine that question, not for the Chair to decide it, and question of order.

Mr. WHITELEY. In reference to the binding, a clause in an appropriation bill says that the Committee on Printing shall do so and so; but I defy the gentleman from Pennsylvania to point to any law which in any manner prohibits the Committee on Representatives from letting the lithography and engraving shall be done by contract, after asking for bids, rather than in the way it is now done—by an agreement between the committee and the parties proposing to do the work.

But, sir, what I was about to say when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was, that this work is now done under an agreement made between the committee and the persons applying for it, with no knowledge further than what the committee may have in reference to the agreement which they make. Now, without entering into the reflections which have been cast on the Committee on Engraving and Printing, both in this and in past Congresses, I say that this amendment will relieve them from the liability of such charges, and shall have no work done properly. There can certainly be no harm in providing that when the House has any work to be done it shall be done by contract; that it shall be thrown open to public competition, and that every person shall have an opportunity of bidding. It is not in the least to be reflected from these charges and the work will certainly be done more economically.

The work is now done by an arrangement between the committee and any persons who come before them. The plan I propose is certainly more fair, more just, and more economical. I therefore hope that my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. While I have no desire to throw obstruction in the way of the gentleman from Delaware in obtaining such legislation, or such order or resolution of the House as he supposes may be expedient in reference to this matter of binding, engraving, &c., I wish to suggest to him and to the committee, that the rules of the House are hardly the proper place for the amendment of any such purpose; but I think the rule can be amended so as to make the provision which he desires. In case the measure should operate unfavorably, it would be too inconvenient and difficult to change it if we place it in this position. If there is a necessity for some amendment in regard to this matter, there is another way, and the gentleman knows it very well, in which he can accomplish what he desires.

Mr. FLORENCE. I think the practice of the Committee on Engraving and the Committee on Printing now is, to invite bids for contracts. The Committee on Engraving invites proposals for contracts for the lithography and engraving ordered by the House. I do not think that they advertise for proposals, but I think I have seen in the papers an advertisement from the Superintendent of the Public Printing for proposals for the lithography and wood cuts to be executed under the order of the House.

Mr. WHITELEY. If the gentleman will read the twenty-sixth amendment proposed by the committee on the revision of the rules, he will find that the committee are authorized to make an agreement for the lithographing, engraving, coloring, &c., with any persons, and there is no law upon the statute-book compelling them to receive any bids or make any contracts. My amendment proposes that, before they make any agreement, they shall advertise for bids, and give the work to the lowest bidder. Now, I would ask for the law.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am not prepared to refer to the law. I am speaking of the practice and usage, and I will tell the gentleman how it grew up. Gentlemen who were here three or four years ago will recollect that at that time there was some suspicion attached to the acts of the Committee on Engraving of the House, if I recollect distinctly; and it was said that fairness had not been exercised. One of the positions of the committee was, that the House had adopted a resolution, and authorized the Superintendent of the Public Printing to advertise for bids for the lithography and wood cuts to be executed for documents printed by order of the House. That practice has continued from that day to this; and while there may be no objection to the authority being given, as proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, I do not think that it is necessary, for the work is now executed under that system.

But if the gentleman asks me what I think of the present system, I will tell him. I think it a very bad system indeed. Take the binding executed for this House as an illustration. It is given to the lowest bidder. The price fixed for it, or by resolution of the House—for I do not know what authority they have for this—has been the practice and usage—the price fixed for a certain description of binding is twelve and a half cents a volume. Proposals are invited and received for executing the binding, and the work is done for ten cents a volume. Well, it is "cheap and handy," on the Canal street plan [Laughter.] It is not executed as it ought to be. If gentlemen examine the documents which are bound at the low price of ten cents a volume, they will find that they are stuck together with glue, or some such substance, and not stitched together, as they ought to be. The consequence is, that if, by any accident, a mail-bag containing such documents is thrown into the water, the documents drop to pieces; whereas, if they were properly bound, and for a fair compensation, they would not fall to pieces if water got into them. I have seen them tested, and it is the experience of every one who has investigated the matter.

That is the result of the contract system. Go into the market and make a fair contract, taking the fundamental principle upon which we ought to run the superintendence here, that every man who comes on this floor is an honest man, and intends to perform his duty conscientiously and honestly. Let the committee go out and make an arrangement with practical binders—not speculators, not advertising men, but practical men going round here at the organization of the House to get jobs, but practical men, and my word for it, you will get the work well done. [Cries of "Louders!"] Yes, sir, I wish I could halloo loud enough to impress upon gentlemen the fact, that if we are to have loyalty, integrity, and fair dealing in the transaction of the business of the Government, we must have a fair price for the work to be done, as the basis upon which it is to be done.

Mr. REAGAN. I merely want to make a suggestion. I understand that the object of the adoption of the rules of this House is to provide regulations for the government of this body, and that all matters of contract should be regulated by a law of Congress. I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Delaware, as to the object of his amendment, but without having examined the subject with any degree of care, it is my impression that the mode of letting these contracts should be a matter of reservation by law.

Mr. WHITELEY. The 26th rule provides for an agreement between the Committee on Printing and Engraving.

Mr. GROW. I rise to a question of order. Both of these gentlemen have already addressed the committee upon this amendment. I ask that the question shall be taken.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I now move that the resolution at the close of the report be voted on.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That John M. Barclay, assistant clerk of the House of Representatives, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to rearrange the rules of the House of Representatives of the United States, amended, with a view to make the connection and subject of said rules correspond as nearly as practicable; and that said rearrangement be to be made under the direction of the committee on the revision of the rules, together with the Constitution of the United States, Jefferson's Manual, the rules of the Senate, the joint rules of the two Houses, and a revised edition of the Manual lately prepared by said Barclay, be furnished by him for the use of the House.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I would suggest the committee which has had this matter in charge also perform the work of correcting the numerous typographical errors which are in the rules as they are now printed. I understand the work is stereotyped, and that they will not be corrected unless some such arrangement is made.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I move that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That in addition to the standing committees appointed by this House, there shall be a committee appointed whose address shall consist in codifying, amending, and explaining the present standing rules of this House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That resolution is not in order.

The resolution reported by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the committee rise and report the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to. The committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair. The Chairman (Mr. STANTON) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the question of the select committee on the rules, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that they be passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order. I have no wish to interfere with this report, but I understand that the question of reference of the Military Academy bill, with the amendments of the Senate, is the first question before the House as the unfinished business of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reserves the right that the report of the committee on rules, having been made the special order, will take precedence.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to this report being disposed of now, supposing that the report which I have referred will come up next in order.

Mr. BOGOCK. I would suggest, that without reading all these amendments, gentlemen should designate such as they wish a separate vote upon, and that the vote be taken upon the others in the aggregate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will pursue that course, if no objection be made.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment. Gentlemen around me are desirous that a vote shall be taken by yeas and nays upon the motion to abolish this hour rule. I ask the gentleman to allow that motion to be made, and a vote taken upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Gentlemen around me are desirous that they would like to have a vote upon that proposition, and also upon the amendment which I submitted in committee to fix the hour of daily meeting at two o'clock. I am willing to allow both these amendments to be considered as pending, and withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I move, then, to adjourn to the first clause of the 34th rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I submit the amendment which I have indicated, and I now call the previous question.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PEYTON demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Virginia, and CECILY were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 85, nays 42.

Mr. TAPPAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRANCH. I move that the motion to adjourn over be withdrawn, and that we will not be subjected to the infliction of hearing the roll called upon it. I am in favor of the adjournment over, but I do not want to see half an hour consumed with a roll-call.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I hope the demand for the yeas and nays will be insisted on.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Aldrich, William C. Anderson, Babbitt, Baskin, Barr, Biscoe, Bingham, Butler, Branch, Burch, Burnett, Campbell, John B. Clark, Chapin, Cobb, John Cochrane, Conkling, Cooper, Borah, Crager, Crary, Custer, Curtis, H. W. Davis, David, G. Davis, De Jarnette, Fenton, Ferry, Folsom, French, Garrett, Gervill, Guiler, Hall, Hamilton, J. Morrison, Harris, John T. Harris, Haskin, R. H. Hendricks, Holmes, Hoopes, Jenkins, Jones, William Kellogg, Kilgore, Kunkel, Landrum, Larrabee, James M. Leach, Logan, Longprecher, Love, Lovejoy, Maynard, McCall, McCallister, McCallister, Montgomery, Latham T. Moore, Hyde, Hamner, Morrill, Mussey, Nelson, Nisbitt, Neill, Phelps, Potter, Pryor, Pugh, Reagan, Rice, Riggs, R. H. Roberts, Russell, Stewart, Sherman, Ricker, William N. Smith, Stevenson, Stout, Taylor, Train, Vallandigham, Vandever, Walden, Caldwell, C. W. Washburn, Webster, Windsor, Woodson, and Wright—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Charles F. Adams, Allen, Avery, Bigelow, Blair, Bland, Brewster, Breyer, Brown, Coffey, Coffey, Cox, James Craig, Dawes, Dwell, Dunn, Edwards, Elton, Elkhart, Foster, Frank, Lusk, Graham, Cron, George H. Hale, Hansman, Helms, Hoar, Houston, Humphrey, Hutchins, Jackson, Francis W. Kellogg, Killinger, DeWitt C. Leach, Lewis, Leavitt, Malloy, Marston, Martin, May, Maynard, McKelzie, McPherson, Milton, Monroah, Ohio, Pendleton, Peyton, Porter, Christopher, R. H. Roberts, Russell, Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Stokes, Tappan, Tompkins, Underwood, Verree, Watson, Isaac Washburn, Wiley, and Wright—42.

So the House agreed that when it adjourned, it would adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Pending the above call, Mr. BUFFINTON stated that his colleague, Mr. ALLEY, was paired with Mr. VANCE.

Mr. LEACH, of Michigan, stated that Mr. AVERY was still detained at his room by illness.

Mr. MALLORY stated that his colleague, Mr. BRISTOW, was paired, but with what member he could not recollect.

Mr. ALDRICH stated that Mr. CARTER was paired with Mr. HARRIS.

Mr. BURNETT stated that Mr. CASE was paired with Mr. MARTIN, of Virginia.

Mr. DELANO stated that he was paired with Mr. FORCE.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that he was paired with Mr. HAYWARD, of Massachusetts, but that he had reserved to himself the right of voting on the adjournment over, and would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD stated that his colleague, Mr. JACKSON, was paired with Mr. BENHAM.

Mr. LARABEE stated that he was paired with Mr. BERLINGSAME for a week from Tuesday on political questions merely; that he did not consider this a political question, and would therefore vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PALMER stated that he was paired with Mr. RICE, of Maryland.

Mr. MAYNARD stated that Mr. GARBLE was paired with Mr. PETTIT.

Mr. HUTCHINS stated that Mr. WADS was paired with Mr. LEAKE.

Mr. STOLB said that he was paired with Mr. STRATTON.

Mr. WILSON stated that he was paired with Mr. KEITT.

On motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, the reading of the names of those who had voted was dispensed with.

NEW YORK CITY CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, as the House has adjourned until Monday next, and as I cannot call up the case of Williams and Sickles to-morrow, I give notice that I will call it on Monday next, at one o'clock.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The main question has been ordered upon the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I now suggest that the amendments reported in the rules, upon which separate votes are not asked, be voted upon en masse. I do not believe it is necessary to read them all over again, for they must be fresh in the memory of every gentleman here.

The SPEAKER. That course will be adopted, if there is no objection.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw his motion to adjourn until we can act upon the amendments which are not objected to, and upon which separate votes are not asked.

ANNULMENT OF MORMON LAWS.

Mr. BRANCH. I ask my friend to withdraw his motion until I can move that an amendment which I propose to offer to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, in favor of the annulment of certain laws of the Territory of Utah, be ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARNETT. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRANCH. I move that the amendment I have stated be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I ask that members now state what amendments they desire the House shall separately vote upon.

Mr. STANTON. I want a separate vote on the twenty-sixth amendment, in relation to the contracting for the engraving.

Mr. WELLS. I ask for a separate vote on the fourth amendment.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the 34th rule.

The question was then taken on the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to which there was no objection, and they were concurred in en masse.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Did the vote just taken include the resolution reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker understood that it did.

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir. I want a separate vote on that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Let it be read. The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That John M. Barclay, assistant clerk of the House of Representatives, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to rearrange the rules of the House of Representatives of the United States, as amended, with a view to make the contents and subject of said rules as compact as nearly as practicable; and that said rearrangement, to be made under the direction of the committee on the revision of the rules, together with the Constitution of the United States, Jefferson's Manual, the rules of the Senate, the joint rules of the two Houses, and a revised edition of the Manual lately prepared by said Barclay, be furnished by him for the use of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know but that I will vote for the resolution, if the gentleman from Maine will satisfactorily answer a question I will put to him. Has the committee on the revision of the rules made any estimate of what will be the cost of this work which they recommend?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have not, for one. I do not know whether any estimate has been made.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman, furthermore, what will be the size of the book containing the Constitution of the United States, Jefferson's Manual and the rules compiled as suggested by the committee?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. About one fourth larger than the present book.

Mr. GROW. That is about what will be its size.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not want to do anything that will interfere with any good reform that may be proposed by this committee. I think that the amendments proposed, so far as I have examined them, are good ones. I do hope, however, that the committee will not urge upon this House the publication of a book when they are unable to inform us what will be its cost.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The present book containing the Manual and rules is stereotyped, and consequently there will be little advantage. It is necessary that we should have these rules rearranged, and that we should have the admirable digest made by Mr. Barclay.

Mr. GROW. Unless that is done we will be led into inextricable confusion in reference to the rules.

The question was taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. GROW moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is nothing now pending before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The amendment of the rules is now before the House. I ask for a vote upon that amendment upon which a separate vote was demanded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WELLS].

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON. I thought that you, Mr. Speaker, decided that I was entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that if from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] presents the matter of which he has the charge, it will be first in order. If the House agrees to the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE], to adjourn, the subject of the amendment of the rules will be first in order when the House meets again.

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] will withdraw his motion to adjourn, as I desire but a few moments of the time of the House.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The motion to adjourn was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] allow me to make a motion to refer a bill to a committee?

Mr. HAMILTON. I would like to oblige the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY], but the matter I have in hand is very important.

Mr. MALLORY. You will have the floor when I get through, and it will take but a moment.

Mr. HAMILTON. With that understanding I will yield the floor.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to take up from the table, and refer to the Committee on Roads and Canals, the joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the enlargement of, and the construction of a branch of the Louisville and Portland canal.

Mr. NIBLACK objected to taking up the joint resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON. I wish to say to the House that when the adjournment occurred on yesterday there were two motions pending: one by myself, to refer the appropriation bill for the Military Academy, at West Point, to the Committee on Military Affairs; and the other motion by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SUMNER], charging the Committee of Ways and Means, to have the bill referred to his committee. The House adjourned pending the consideration of these motions; and I suppose that, in the regular order of business, had it not been for the precedence of the subject of the amendment of the rules, it would have been the first business to-day. I now ask the indulgence of the House to dispose of these motions at this time. The reason why I ask it, is that the State that I and my colleague [Mr. REAGAN] have the honor to represent upon this floor demands that there should be speedy action. It must be known to all gentlemen who have given any attention to the subject that we have a line of frontier of more than two thousand miles—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must object to this, for we are now acting under the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the special order, the amendment of the rules, is insisted on by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN], it must be gone through with before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] will be in order.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the House adjourn.

And the House accordingly (at half past four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

Monday, March 19, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GURLEY.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a copy of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay, concluded on the 4th February, 1860, and proclaimed on the 10th instant, and invite the attention of Congress to the expediency of such legislation as may be deemed necessary to carry into effect the stipulations of the convention relative to the organization of the commission provided for therein. The commissioner on the part of Paraguay is now in this city, and is prepared to enter upon the duties devolved upon the joint commission.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1860.

On motion of Mr. HAMILIN, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the acting Secretary of War, with the accompanying papers, communicating the information called for by the resolution of the Senate, of the 9th instant, respecting the marble columns for the Capitol extension; which was on motion of Mr. SILLIE, referred to the Committee on Pensions, Invalids and Soldiers; and a motion by him to print the message was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received, and will present to the Senate, certain memorials of manufacturers, coal operators, merchants, business men, farmers, mechanics, laborers, and miners, in Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, representing that the great industrial and productive interests of the country are suffering from the want of adequate protection. They are opposed to the present low tariff. They ask Congress to abolish or make a radical change in the present warehouse system. They desire the substitution of a tariff for the present duties on goods, and represent that they do not ask protection for coal and iron alone, but desire to extend it to the different interests requiring protection North and South, and East and West. The memorials will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THOMSON presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the public lands of the United States, and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KING presented papers in relation to the claim of John Reed to a pension, on account of an injury received while in the military service, during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of James W. Nye and other citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the public lands of the United States, and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the enactment of a uniform bankruptcy law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 77.

Mr. LANE presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, praying that treaties may be formed with the Chehalis and other tribes of Indians in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BIGLER presented a petition of citizens of Elk county, Pennsylvania, praying the establishment of a mail route from Hellen to Bengtzen, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. LATHAM presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a new land district in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of an extension of the period of the preemption privilege to actual settlers on the public lands in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail between Stockton and Mariposa, and all intermediate post offices; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, requesting arms for the use of that State; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES presented the petition of James H. Montrose and other citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the public lands of the United States, and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of citizens of Washington Territory, for the improvement of North Capitol street; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the petition of John M. and George O. Poote, praying the right to locate certain land scrips; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the public lands of the United States, and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of C. Champ and others, praying that land may be granted to the heirs of those who, if living, would be entitled to bounty for services in the war of 1812, and the various wars against Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of Robert A. Matthews, for the confirmation of the entry of a tract of land in the Sioux City district, Iowa, by Charles W. Tash, or for the refunding of the purchase-money to the said Matthews, as his attorney; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a memorial of citizens of Fort Smith, Arkansas, in favor of the revocation of the African slave trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, praying the establishment of a daily mail from Eddyville to Des Moines, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a petition of Joseph Applegate and others, praying that pensions may be allowed to the surviving militia of the war of 1812, who served in the United States for four years or more in battle, and to the widows of those deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of S. W. Hilliard and other citizens of New York, praying the passage of a law to prevent all further traffic in and monopoly of the publiclands of the United States, and that they be laid out in farms and lots for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of Susan Rhind, and other daughters of Charles Rhind, deceased, praying the compensation due their father for negotiating a treaty, with the Ottomian Porte; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Pontiac, Michigan, praying the enactment of a uniform bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER, it was Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the papers relating to the claims of James Keruan, United States consul at Hong Kong, in China, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of Lieutenant Nathan Weeks, for seven years' half pay, and the back pay due him, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Lieutenant William F. Lovell, of the United States Navy, praying that the same additional compensation may be paid to the officer and seaman who accompanied the expedition in search of Dr. Kane, as was allowed to those who accompanied the expedition of Lieutenant Dr. Haven, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of John C. Rose, of Virginia (deceased), and the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Alexander Rose, of the revolutionary war, praying the allowance of one hundred dollars, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the watchmen in the Washington yard, praying to be allowed the benefit of the seventh section of the act of 3d March, 1851, "making appropriations for civil and diplomatic expenses," &c., and the memorial of the watchmen in the Capitol, praying to amend the third section of an act making appropriations for civil and diplomatic expenses," &c., on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 291) for the relief of Mary Preston, widow of George Preston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 292) for the protection of disbursing officers acting in obedience to law, and to insure the execution of measures for which appropriations are made; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 293) to provide two additional superintendencies of Indian affairs for the State of Oregon and Territory of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 294) to extend the right of preemption over unreserved lands in the State of Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BIGLER. The Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 10) in addition to "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," have instructed me to report it back with an amendment in the shape of a substitute. I desire to say that this is a very important bill, in relation to the interests of the Patent Office and the inventor of the country, and so soon as it can be printed, I shall endeavor to secure its consideration by the Senate.

The memorial of John L. Hayes, in relation to discrimination in charges and fees against citizens of foreign countries who apply for patents, was referred to the Committee on Patents, and the Patent Office. That committee have instructed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, for the reason that the object is accomplished in the general bill which I have just reported.

The committee were discharged.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of William Vance & Brothers, for reimbursement of expenses incurred in furnishing outfits to certain volunteers for the Mexican war, who were marched to the place of rendezvous, but were not finally mustered into the service of the United States, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 290) for the relief of Vance & Brothers. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Israel Johnson, praying compensation for services rendered and supplies furnished to the Miami and Potawatomi Indians by the Government of the United States Indian agents, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 293) to compensate Israel Johnson for services performed by direction of the Indian agents, at the treaty ground at the forks of the Walush, in 1833. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Shubrick, praying to be released on the books of the Treasury Department from liability for a certain sum of money expended for public service by him, as commander-in-chief of the naval force of the Pacific, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 295) for the relief of William B. Shubrick. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

MARKS ON NEWSPAPER WRAPPERS.

Mr. YULEE. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 341) authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire, have directed me to report it back with amendments. There is no pressing necessity, in the opinion of the committee, for action on the bill; but I believe the parties who have interested themselves in it are very anxious to have it disposed of. If any Senator desires present action on it, I will move that it be acted on now. If not, I ask that the amendments be printed, and that the bill be taken up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the bill will be permitted to pass at once. I believe there is no objection to it.

Mr. YULEE. I have no objection to taking it up now.

The bill was considered as a Committee of the Whole. It proposes to modify the second clause of the third section of the act of 30th of August, 1852, "establishing the rates of postage on printed matter," so as to make it read:

"They shall be no word or communication printed on the name after the title, the ledger account sheet, or wrapper thereof, nor any writing nor mark upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name, the ledger account sheet, the date when the subscription expires, the wrapper number, and the address of the person to whom it is to be sent."

The amendments of the committee were to strike out the words "the ledger account sheet," and also the words "the wrapper number;" so as to make it read:

"There shall be no word or communication printed on the name after its publication, or upon the cover or wrapper thereof, nor any writing nor mark upon it, nor upon the cover or wrapper thereof, except the name, the date when the subscription expires, and the address of the person to whom it is to be sent."

And to add as an additional section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws declaring that postage at the rate of one cent each shall be charged on all drop letters or letters placed in any post office not for transportation, but for delivery only, be, and the same are hereby repealed so far as they apply to drop letters delivered within the limits of any city or town by carriers under the authority of the Post Office Department, on which letters the rate of postage imposed by the act of the carrier system in such city or town shall be collected, and no more.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment of the committee.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If I understand this amendment, it is this: the bill proposes to allow publishers to put upon the envelop or wrapper, in addition to the address of the person to whom the newspaper is sent, a statement of the date when the subscription expires; and the amendment prohibits putting upon the envelop also a statement of the amount due by him.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I so understood it.

Mr. YULEE. Not at all.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should like to understand the effect of it.

Mr. YULEE. I will state precisely what it is. By the existing laws, publishers are permitted to send, without charge of postage, under the wrappers containing the names of the subscribers, their subscribers, their bills and receipts. It is proposed now to allow them, instead of that privilege, to indorse, together with the address of the subscriber, the date to which he has paid his subscription. To this there is no objection. For this purpose the bill appears to have been intended, as seems by its title, "An act authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire." The amendments made by the committee are intended to extend to the publishers of newspapers the privilege desired, and to carry out fully the purpose of the bill as declared in its title, but to relieve the publishers from the condition which the phraseology of the bill would otherwise impose upon them, of using a particular patent which has been recently taken out, and no other. The bill, as amended by the House, would be to put the publishers under the necessity, as the only condition upon which they can avail themselves of the more liberal provision of this enactment, of using a particular machine which has been invented, and which may be substituted for any other of the same kind, and which some publishers may prefer to dispense with, and save the expense of paying to the inventor the charge which he requires, when they can accomplish the same purpose by other means, and by a little labor. It is the amount of it. The purpose is to put the publishers at all pray, without subjecting them to the obligation of using a particular invention, which they would have to do if we adhered to the words of the bill as it came from the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the second amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is that?

Mr. YULEE. I will state what the purpose of the amendment is. Under the existing law, there is a charge of one cent made for all drop letters.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have we passed upon the amendments to the first section?

Mr. YULEE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK in the chair.) The question now is on the second amendment, reported by the committee, which is, in line eleven to strike out the words "the wrapper number."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to insert as a new section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws declaring that postage at the rate of one cent each shall be charged on all drop letters or letters placed in any post office not for transportation, but for delivery only, be, and the same are hereby repealed, so far as they apply to drop letters delivered within the limits of any city or town by carriers, under the authority of the Post Office Department, on which letters the rate of postage imposed by the act of the carrier system in such city or town shall be collected, and no more.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is any objection in the world to the amendment which the Senator from Florida has introduced; but it is legislation upon another subject. This bill now only provides for one simple thing, which is it is very desirable should pass. The other matter just introduced is not connected with it at all. The only object, as I understand, of this bill, is to obviate an inconvenience which publishers of newspapers are laboring under, and which is also an inconvenience to the subscribers, and merely to allow the publishers to put upon their papers, with the address, the date when the subscription expires. That is substantially all there is in the bill; and it is a provision to which I presume no one has any objection. The verbal amendment suggested by the Senator from Florida, which he indicated seemed to be very proper; but now, to introduce a separate clause in regard to another subject, it seems to me, will embarrass the passage of the bill. I hope it will not be insisted upon by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I am not prepared to discuss it at all. I do not know that I have any objection to it by itself; but if we go into other legislation, I think the result of it will be that it will retard this simple matter, which I think every member of the Senate understands and appreciates, and would be willing to let pass by itself. I hope that the other amendment will not be pressed.

Mr. YULEE. I presume there can be no objection to adopting this amendment upon the bill which is now before the Senate. It is an amendment to which there can be no objection from any quarter. It is for the relief of the public from a very great annoyance and a great injustice. It is to enable the Department to make the carrier service effective and useful in the large cities. No one can object to it. My reason for proposing this amendment to this bill is simply this: no objection is made in the other House to amendments having reference to general legislation upon appropriation bills. The bills which go from the Senate are apt to be upon their Calendar, in consequence of the obstruction thrown in the House by the minority. I would not be disposed to put upon this bill anything that would lead to discussion or debate, or could be objectionable at all; but here is an amendment which is entirely unobjectionable, and which will be useful; and as the bill has been amended, and must necessarily go back to the House, and no one can object to this any more than to the other amendments already made, I see no reason why we should not take advantage of this opportunity to correct an evil and to relieve the people from a burden. At the same time, we were relieving the publishers from what they alleged to be a burden, and extending to them a privilege, I thought that we should also give to the inhabitants of large cities the very important benefit of the carrier system for their express matter in the cities, which they may have the responsibility and regularity and care of the Post Office Department, instead of being obliged to depend, in consequence of the difference of charge, upon city express for the conveyance of all their city matter. I can see no objection to its being adopted as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. KING. I should judge that the construction of the amendment would require that all letters dropped in the post office should be sent through the carriers. It may be that the party who leaves a letter in the post office may desire that it should be delivered from the office through his box. I would inquire of the Senator from Florida, how he understands that; if his attention has been directed to that point? A great many persons in the cities have their boxes, and they therefore do not prefer to have their letters sent by the carriers.

Mr. YULEE. Of course they will not go into the hands of the carriers. You relieve them from the cost. They will be distributed, under the existing system of the Department, precisely as they are now. The only difference is, that, instead of charges for the cost, we shall charge no cent, in the case of the delivery of a drop letter by a carrier.

Mr. KING. My impression is—and that is the point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator—that the construction of the amendment requires that it should go through the carrier, and be charged carrier's price.

Mr. YULEE. That depends upon the option of the party receiving. He may pay one cent without delivery by the carrier, or course.

Mr. KING. Let the Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. YULEE. All letters for persons having boxes are put in their boxes, whether drop letters or otherwise.

Mr. KING. Let us see what the amendment says.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. KING. Now, I understand that section to provide that the charge for a letter delivered by the carrier, is to be made upon every drop letter.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. KING. I so understand the language; it is that that shall be charged, "and no more."

Mr. YULEE. I think it means to read: "and for all letters intended for delivery, and which are delivered by carriers, the only charge that be one cent, which is the rate charged by city express."

Now we are obliged to charge two cents: one cent for the carrier and one cent for the drop. The section was prepared as it is, and is very much desired and very necessary.

Mr. MASON. I should like to learn of the honorable chairman of the committee whether the effect of this bill will be to diminish the revenue of the Department.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir. On the contrary, it will probably increase them. It is expected at the Department to increase the revenue by enabling the Post Office to do what is now done by city express altogether in large cities, and to accomplish the same thing at a less cost.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill is, "An act authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire, and in relation to the postage on drop letters."

BOUNDARY OF OREGON.

Mr. LANE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for running and marking the forty-six parallel of latitude, so far as said parallel is the boundary line between the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington.

CAPTAIN WALLER'S REPORT.

Mr. LANE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of Captain L. D. Waller of the expedition made in 1855, from Dallas City to Great Salt Lake, and back.

PREEMPTION TO LAND.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 142) to secure the right of preemption to certain settlers on land temporarily occupied as an Indian reserve in Oregon, and for other purposes, to report it back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and to ask that it be put on its passage. It is a bill that ought to pass at once. It will lead to no debate at all.

Mr. MASON. I have an earnest desire to preserve the resolution as it was reported, but I will ask if that bill will take any time, it had better go over.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It will take any time, or is disputed at all, I will consent that it shall go over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would ask if that is not a private bill?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. No, sir; it is not. The Senator will see that it is not when it is read.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 142) to secure the right of preemption to certain settlers on lands temporarily occupied as an Indian reserve in Oregon, and for other purposes. The Committee on Public Lands report and recommend that the amendment be adopted, and all after the word "whereas" in the preamble, and insert in lieu thereof:

By a treaty entered into on the 16th September, 1852, between the Government of the United States and the Rogue River tribe of Indians, in Oregon, to make a reservation of Indians should be allowed to occupy, temporarily, a certain tract or district of territory described in the second article of said treaty, and which year to be struck out and inserted in the preamble, and all after the word "whereas" in the preamble, and insert in lieu thereof:

ing said tract temporarily set apart for their use were returned to the Grant, Bland and Sibley reserves, which have been selected for their permanent residence; and whereas certain individuals, citizens of the United States, have settled upon and improved a portion of the tract described in the second article of said treaty of 18th September, 1853, and still reside thereon, or who were compelled to abandon the same on the issue of the Indian, as a part of the reserve: Therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on House of Representatives of the United States do hereby recommend that every such settler upon said tract who now resides, or has settled and resided upon and cultivated the same, or made substantial improvements in good faith, with a view to permanent residence and cultivation of the same, and who has not received the benefits of the act of September 27, 1850, entitled "An act to create the office of surveyor general of public lands in Oregon, and to provide for the survey and sale of the public lands in Oregon," be and he is hereby authorized, upon application at the land office of the district in which said land is situated, to him may be situated, allowed to purchase the same, not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres, at the rate of $1 35 per acre, the preemption right hereby conferred on such settler to be adjudicated and enforced in all cases in accordance with the provisions of the act of September 27, 1850, and acts amendatory thereto.

And he is further authorized that the records of said tract heretofore referred to, not claimed by actual settlers, and sold as herein provided, within twelve months after the passage of this act, and the title to the same, hereby, declared subject in all respects whatever to the existing laws relating to the survey and disposal of the public lands in Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

POST ROUTE IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be and they are hereby authorized to cause the establishment of a post route from Greenwood to Sharkey, in the State of Mississippi.

MOUNTAIN MEADOW MASSACRE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to offer a resolution which I shall ask the Senate to consider and adopt at this time. It will lead to no debate whatever. It calls for information in regard to the Mountain Meadow massacre, and the information has never been collected and thrown into such a shape that a fair and just judgment could be made upon it:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate the correspondence and facts, with such information as may be in the possession of any branch or Department of the Government, tending to establish the guilt or innocence and attitude of the Mountain Meadow massacre, in August, 1857, or any subsequent massacre in Utah Territory; and also to inform the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken to discover the authors, or to direct inquiry towards the parties guilty of a crime so perfidious and unparagoned of age, sex, and condition; and to furnish to the Senate all the facts in connection with the recovery of the survivors of the Mountain Meadow massacre; giving the names of the survivors, the parties connected to their death in the United States, and their present condition, so far as is known.

I ask the Senate now to adopt the resolution. All those facts ought to be before the Senate.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

JAPANESE MISDEED.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence between the Japanese and American Governments, and the resident of the United States in Japan, concerning the proposed diplomatic mission from Japan to the United States; and that the Government be and it is hereby authorized to acquire upon the propriety of providing by law for the receipt of said mission in the mode usual in the country from which it comes.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MASON. I rise to ask that I may be excused from further service in the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do so with regret; but I find it impossible, from the other duties of committee service devolving on me, to remain on it without doing great injustice to that committee and to myself. I have told the chairman reluctantly that I should be obliged to ask to be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ALTERATION OF THE SENATE CHAMBER.

Mr. HALE. I have a resolution of inquiry, which I offer and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the architect of the Capitol extension be instructed to report to the Senate on the practicability and expense of so altering and reconstructing the present room occupied by the Senate, that it may be extended to the windows on the north end, or east or west side of the north wing of the Capitol.

Mr. MASON. As I understand the resolution, it does not leave it to the committee to inquire into the expediency of the proposed alteration.

Mr. HALE. It is an instruction to the architect simply to report on the practicability and expense.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the resolution will not be adopted. I do not wish to inject its consideration; but I hope it will not be adopted at all for two reasons. First, there is a superintendent in charge of the work, who, if he knows any thing, must be a better constructor than the architect.

Mr. HALE. Well, I am willing that he should take it.

Mr. DAVIS. The next objection is, we have a Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it is not an inquiry ought to be referred if it is one that ought to be made.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DAVIS. No.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to get the plan to see if it is practicable, and also the estimate of the expense. When we have that statement, I shall move to refer it to the Committee on Public Buildings; but I want the plan first.

Mr. DAVIS. I move, as a matter of respect to the officer in charge of the work, that the inquiry be made by the superintendent in charge of the extension, and not by the architect.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

ST. CLAIR FLATS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that Senate bill No. 37 be taken up for the purpose of fixing a day for its consideration.

Mr. CLAY. What bill is it?

Mr. CHANDLER. The bill for deepening the channel over the St. Clair Flats. I move that it be made the special order for Thursday, at one o'clock, if there be no special order for that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is to take up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Colburn, Critchfield, Hildes, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foster, Giddings, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Sawyer, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Briggs, Butler, Cass, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Humphreys, Hunter, Iveson, John, Johnston, Johnson, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Nichols, Pender, Rice, Schuyler, Sebastian, Russell, Tomlinson, and Vance—29.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the homestead bill, which, I believe, is regularly on the calendar of the unfinished business. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MALLORY. The special order at two o'clock is the bill for the payment of the Florida interest claims. If there is no business before the Senate but the unfinished business, I move to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee has precedence. It is moved and seconded that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the homestead bill.

It is not the bill which was under consideration when we adjourned on Thursday, and which was interrupted by the consideration of private bills on Friday, the unfinished business for to-day—I allude to the bill to sell arms to the Seneca. It was under discussion when we adjourned to the consideration of private bills on Friday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the bill to which he alludes was postponed by order of the Senate, and consequently it is not the unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. I thought it was only laid aside because of the special order to take up the private bills, and would now recur as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is not the rule. The rule gives precedence only to the unfinished business of the last preceding adjournment of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Very much obliged.

Mr. MALLORY. Is my motion in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee, which has precedence of the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TOOMBS. Does the Chair decide that the homestead bill is first in order? There is a special order for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now pending is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, to proceed to the consideration of the homestead bill. It is in order for a Senator to give reasons why it should or should not be taken up, but not to discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is a special order for to-day, that was made some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One o'clock is the time fixed for the special order referred to—the bill in relation to the Florida claims.

Mr. MALLORY. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To proceed to the consideration of the homestead bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I trust the special order will be called up at two o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, unless the Senate see proper to postpone it.

The motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, was agreed to.

So the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1) to grant to every person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of not exceeding eighty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period therein specified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I suppose it is not necessary to read the bill. Every one knows what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Before the Senator from Tennessee proceeds, I desire to submit an amendment to the first section. It is to strike out all after the word "entitled," in the fifth line, and substitute for the words stricken out:

To have issued to him or her, by the Commissioner of Public Lands, a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, to be located in the same manner as that under which the homestead warrants heretofore issued have been located, on any of the public lands of the United States subject to entry under the act, to present any valid claim or support of his claim in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. President, my only objection, as a matter of courtesy, to the floor on this bill, and has yielded to me with the understanding that I shall explain the object and character of this bill and assign the reasons which, in my judgment, commend it to our support. His intimate connection with this subject since the year 1846, when the measure was originated by him in the other House, qualifies him much better than myself to perform this task; but as he prefers to hear the objections which may be made before addressing the Senate himself, I will proceed, as briefly as I can, to present my own view of the subject. On examining the bill which came from the House of Representatives, I find in it provisions which are so objectionable to my mind that I cannot support it. The bill matured by the Senate committee, and now before the Senate, is relieved of these objectionable provisions, and to that I shall confine my remarks.

It provides that any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed his intention to become a citizen in pursuance of our naturalization laws, shall have the right to enter one quarter section of the unappropriated public domain; but in exercising this right, such person is to be restricted to those lands that have been surveyed, proclaimed, and offered for sale, and are consequently subject to private entry under existing laws. This privilege of entry is further restricted to the odd sections, and no patent is to be issued until it shall be satisfactorily shown that the land has been surveyed and cultivated for five continuous years from the date of the entry, and that the patentee is then a citizen of the United States. It is further provided that this act shall in no wise impair or interfere with existing laws on the subject of preemptions, donations, or gradations.

These, Mr. President, are the general provisions of the bill. They indicate, with sufficient distinctness, the nature and object of the measure, without further reference to its details. The policy proposed to be adopted is based upon the assumption that the great leading purpose of the Government, in regard to our public domain, are its occupancy and cultivation, with a view to the ultimate formation of sovereign States. In carrying out this policy, it is not proposed to disturb the existing enactments, which provide the rules and regulations that constitute our present land law system. This system has grown up and matured in the light of many years of observation and experience. It has proved eminently beneficial and successful in its practical operations. Its machinery is now working smoothly, and it proposes no modification or addition that, in the least degree, impede its continued successful operation.

Nor is it proposed by this measure, Mr. President, to repeal or interfere with any of that series of laws which constitute the established policy of the Government in respect to the disposition and appropriation of the public lands. The several statutes which provide and secure rights, privileges, and benefits by means of donations, gradations, and preemptions are, in express terms, intended to be permanent. Those who have already acquired interests and rights under these laws, will continue to enjoy them as fully as they do at present. Those who may hereafter desire to avail themselves of the benefits and privileges of these laws, will do so as completely as they could do now. The provisions of the bill now before the Senate in strict conformity with the policy of the graduation, donation, and preemption laws, and therefore does not in any way interfere with or disturb them.

The bill proposes no change in the established policy of extending the right of entry to the public lands at a rate proportionate to the progressive disposition thereof. On this subject the Secretary of the Interior, in his last report, makes the following remarks:

"As Congress has, for a series of years, sanctioned, by its legislation, the extension of the right of entry to the lands, at a rate proportionate to the progressive disposition thereof, this basis has been assumed in preparing and submitting the estimates for the surveys to be made during the next fiscal year.

"During the five quarters ending September 30, 1859, 16,618,165 acres of the public lands were disposed of; 4,929,500 acres were sold for cash, yielding $4,107,476; 2,617,440 acres were located with homestead warrants; 1,120,000 acres were approved to be surveyed and settled to land, under the swamp grants of March 2, 1849, and September 28, 1850; and 6,358,225 acres were certified, as being in them under the grants for the purpose of settlement.

"During the same period of time, 13,671,231 acres were surveyed and prepared for sale, and 16,735,552 acres proffered and offered at public sale.

"The aggregate quantity of public land that has been surveyed, but not yet proffered for sale at public sale, on the 30th of September, 1859, was 56,970,941 acres; and the estimated quantity which had been offered at public sale, but remained subject to private entry at the various land offices, was 50,000,000 acres."

It appears, from this statement, Mr. President, that the entire area of the public lands subject to private entry, and within which the present measure will operate, contains eighty million acres. For this quantity, I learn by a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, that forty-four million have been in market for ten to thirty years, and are therefore subject to entry under the graduation law.

The statement of the Secretary of the Interior further shows that the quantity made proffered for all purposes, during the last five quarters, is sixteen million acres, or at the rate of twelve million for the last year. Assuming that no change should be made in the laws, and that the operations of our land system during the past year furnish a fair index to the future operations, the annual amounts of land surveyed and disposed of would be twelve million acres. If the present measure should become a law, these amounts, to be annually surveyed and disposed of, will be increased in proportion to the extent to which they may increase settlements. We have no data on which to estimate, with certainty, the amount of the increased settlements. Any estimate, therefore, must be conjectural. If we assume that as many settlers will avail themselves of this law as availed themselves during the past year of the preemption law, the annual increase of settlements will amount to about twenty thousand families, requiring that number of quarter sections, or about three million acres, for their homesteads. Upon this estimate, which is entirely conjectural, though high enough in my judgment, it would be necessary to add about three million acres more to about twenty thousand acres disposed of, making in all the annual amount of about fifteen and a half million acres. Upon the same estimate this amount would be disposed of as follows:

For cash.....	3,279,575	$1,200,000
For military bounties.....	2,713,080	"
For swamp lands.....	1,984,000	"
For railroads.....	4,728,000	"
For homesteads.....	2,304,000	"
Total.....	15,662,505	$1,500,000

I repeat, Mr. President, that this estimate is made upon the assumption that the operations of our system of land laws for the past year furnish a fair guide in judging of their operations hereafter, and upon the further conjecture that, if the present bill passes, its provisions will increase twenty thousand heads of families, annually, to seek its benefits. I will have occasion hereafter to state more fully the reasons on which I adopt this estimate as to the increase of settlements under the influence of the pending measure. For the present, I do not propose to present it by way of illustrating the practical working of the policy on which the present measure is based. It is apparent that, upon the usual estimate of five individuals to a family, the Government will by this bill furnish homes annually to one hundred thousand persons, and that, without any change in our land policy, we have public land sufficient to furnish homes to a like number annually for a hundred years to come. And this, too, contemplates the continuance of the grants under our donation, preemption, swamp, railroad, and military bounty laws at the same rate at which they were made during the past year.

But, Mr. President, we are met here with the intertongue: have we the constitutional authority to enact the provisions of this bill into a law? We have the right, in other words, to take from market and sell annually three million acres of the public domain, to be appropriated to homesteads for twenty thousand families, upon the sole consideration of actual occupancy and cultivation of their respective quarter sections during a period of five years? This question is entirely pertinent, and if it cannot be answered satisfactorily in the affirmative the bill ought to be rejected. I shall proceed, therefore, to state the grounds on which my own mind repose, upon the conviction that the bill is not only in perfect harmony with our present land policy, but entirely consistent with the Constitution.

In discussing the powers of Congress over the public lands, it is customary, Mr. President, to look alone to the clause in the Constitution which confers on Congress power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations in respect to the territory. So far as those lands are concerned, which had been ceded to the United States at the time the Constitution was formed, or which were then expected to be so ceded, no doubt can be entertained that this clause was intended to confer on Congress its powers for their disposition and government. But in construing this clause, with a view of ascertaining the character and extent of the powers conferred, it is necessary to consider the language of the Constitution in connection with the provisions relating to the deeds of cession. It is matter of history that these cessions grew out of a serious controversy among those States which had no waste lands within their limits and those which had, as to the disposition which ought to be made of them at the close of the revolutionary war. The question was, whether they should be the exclusive property of the States within whose limits they were situated, or whether they should be regarded as common property of all the States, upon the ground that they had been acquired in a common cause, and by the joint toils and sacrifices and expenditures of all the States. The fact that all of the States were heavily burdened with the revolutionary debt, gave to the controversy its chief interest. To quiet the dispute, the Congress of the Confederation, in 1780, recommended to the States within whose geographical boundaries the waste lands were situated, to cede them, and relinquish their claims to the United States, to be "disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States," &c. Virginia took the lead in responding to this recommendation. As the terms employed in her deed of cession were substantially followed by the other States in making their cessions, it will answer my purpose to quote only from the Virginia deed of cession, made in 1784. The language of that deed was, that the lands ceded—

"shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal Union of said States, Virginia having no objection fully and honestly to dispose of that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever."

The necessary legal effect of this deed, as well as those of the States that succeeded by the other States, was to vest the title of the lands in the United States, as a trustee for the use and benefit of all the States. The objects of the trust are distinctly enumerated: the lands were to constitute a common fund; and were to be faithfully disposed of, without any view to the use of the same as a fund, and for no other use or purpose whatever; and in due time, after settlements should be made thereon, they were to be formed into States, and be admitted as such into the Confederation. The paramount consideration that gave interest to the original controversy was the substantial value of the lands, in connection with the heavy pecuniary embarrassments under which the States were all laboring. Hence the leading idea in the deed of cession looks to the money value of the lands. They were to be a common fund; they were to be faithfully disposed of for the purpose of a common fund—and for no other use or purpose whatever but a common fund.

It was to authorize the new Government to execute the trusts raised in the cession deeds, that the clause in the Constitution was inserted, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory; and for ascertaining the nature and extent of the power, the language of the deeds of cession furnishes the true exposition. This clause, construed in connection with the cession deeds, would give to Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory," for the purpose of raising a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States. It is thus conclusively shown, that the first great object of the deeds of cession, and of the clause in the Constitution made to enable Congress to execute the trusts, was the raising of revenue by selling the lands, and that the encouragement of settlements with a view to the early formation of States was then a secondary object.

In view of the objects of the cessions and the power of Congress under the territorial clause of the Constitution, I am fully sustained by the Supreme Court, in the late Dred Scott case. The following extracts from the opinion of the Court bear directly on the subject.

Speaking of the cession by Virginia, the Chief Justice says:

"The only object of the State in making this cession was to put an end to the threatening and exciting controversy, and to the war which had been waged on the lands, and to appropriate the proceeds as a common fund for the common benefit of the States."

Again:

"The example of Virginia was soon afterwards followed by other States." "The main object for which these cessions were desired and made, was the raising of revenue to be applied to the discharge of the public debt, and to the support of the Government, and to the dangerous controversy, as to who was to decide to the proceeds when the lands should be sold."

Speaking of the territorial clause in the Constitution, the Chief Justice says:

"It begins its enumeration of powers by that of disposing—in other words, making sale of the lands, or raising money from them, which, as we have already said, was the main object of the cession, and was accordingly the first thing provided for in the article."

It would be difficult, Mr. President, if not impossible, to reconcile much of our legislation in regard to the public lands to this construction of the Constitution, if it be conceded that the powers of Congress, as to all our public domain, are to be deduced from the territorial clause of the Constitution. It could only be done upon the assumption that when Congress provided for the future sale of the lands of the Revolution, and the Federal Government became responsible for their payment, and especially after they had been actually paid, the great purpose of the cession was accomplished, and the Government thereby so far released from its fiduciary obligation as to be justified in its subsequent management of the trust, in looking chiefly to the consummation of its second object—the encouragement of settlements on the public lands, with a view to the formation and admission of new States into the Union. It was upon this view of the subject that President Jackson, in 1823, suggested to Congress the propriety of abandoning the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands. He regarded the public lands as having been pledged for the payment of the revolutionary debt, and when this object was accomplished he considered the trust as discharged. However plausible this view may be, it is certain that it has not been adopted as universally satisfactory. Many of our statesmen still insist that the territorial clause of the Constitution forbids Congress from making any disposition of public lands, which does not look to revenue and money equivalent as essential considerations. This opinion recognizes no distinction between the lands ceded and those acquired by purchase, and derives the power of Congress over all of our public domain from the territorial clause in the Constitution. If it can be shown that the territorial clause in the Constitution has no application to the public lands, obtained by purchase or treaty from foreign nations, the error of deducing the powers of Congress over those lands from that clause will be manifest. This conclusion is of great importance in the present discussion, inasmuch as the bill before the Senate is confined in its operation to the lands acquired by purchase or treaty.

Fortunately, Mr. President, I am relieved from the necessity of arguing the question by the reasoning and adjudication of the Supreme Court in the same case from which I have already made quotations. In the course of the very elaborate examination of the source from whence Congress derives its power over the Territories, the chief justice, in regard to the territorial clause, says:

"The language used in the clause, the arrangement and combination of the powers, and the somewhat unusual phraseology it uses, when it speaks of the political power to be given to the government of the territory, in the design and meaning of the clause to be such as we have maintained. It does not speak of any territory, nor of Territories, but uses language which, according to its legitimate meaning, points to a particular thing. The power is given only in relation to the territory of the United States; that is, to a territory then in existence, and then known or claimed as the territory of the United States."

He announces the conclusion of the court on the question in language still more pointed. He says:

"Therefore, whether, then, we take the particular clause in question (the territorial clause) by itself, or in connection with the other portions of the Constitution, we think it clear that it applies only to the territory then in existence which we have spoken of (the ceded territory), and hence, by any just rule of interpretation, be extended to territory which the Government might afterwards obtain from a foreign nation."

This Government, Mr. President, is direct to the point, and is conclusive; it explodes the error that the powers of Congress over the purchased domain are deducible from the territorial clause in the Constitution; it explodes, at the same time, the idea based on that clause and the cession deeds, that, in disposing of the purchased domain, Congress is bound to regard revenue and a money equivalent as essential considerations. If any restrictive obligation or condition be insisted upon Congress, it is now made manifest that it must be found in some other than the territorial clause of the Constitution.

It devolves upon us next, Mr. President, to find the clause in the Constitution from which Congress derives its power over the territory acquired by purchase or treaty. The court, in the case already referred to, has removed all difficulty in locating this power, as will be manifest from the following extracts from that opinion. The Chief Justice says:

"The power to acquire the territory of the United States, by the admission of new States, is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government, it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory by the admission of new States, as it is admitted as soon as its population and situation would enable it to admission. It is required to become a State, and not to be admitted as a territory, and it is not to be admitted as a territory; and as the property of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the same is committed to that authority for that purpose for the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must be applied to the acquisition of territory by the admission of new States."

"As the people of the United States could act in this matter only through the Government which represented them, and through which they acted, and as the territory was acquired, it was not only within the scope of its powers, but it was its duty to pass such laws and establish such a government as would enable those by whose authority they acted, to reap the advantages anticipated from its acquisition, and to gather there a population which would be able to assume the position to which it was entitled among the States of the Union. The power to acquire necessarily carries with it the power to preserve and apply to the purposes for which it was acquired."

"Whenever it (the Federal Government) acquires, it acquires for the benefit of the people of the several States who created it. It is their trustee acting for them, and charged with the duty of promoting the interests of the whole of the Union in the exercise of the powers specifically granted."

It follows, Mr. President, that the relation of the Federal Government to our public domain, whether obtained by cessions from States or purchases from foreign nations, is that of a trustee for the benefit of the people of the several States.

The lands of the United States, whether obtained by cession or purchase, are essentially different in regard to the two kinds of domain in this: that, as to the ceded domain, the trustee was expressly required, by the terms of the deed, to dispose of the lands for money, as the means of providing a common fund, to be applied to the benefit of the people of the several States to the purchase domain, no such specific instruction or obligation is imposed upon the trustee. In both cases, the formation of new States is the ultimate object to be accomplished; in both cases, the trustee has to look to the constitution for his authority for the limitations there laid down. In both cases, the power is found in the territorial clause; and that, coupled with the cession deeds, limits the power of the trustee to dispositions of the lands for money; in the other case, the power is found in the fiscal clause, and the cession deeds, with it the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the specific grant to admit new States into the Union. The public domain obtained by purchase was not acquired for the purpose of making profit for the Government, but for the purpose of gathering a population, to be formed into new States. Laws, therefore, necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power to admit new States, must look directly and legitimately to the accomplishment of that purpose. If that purpose can be better accomplished, or if it can be as well accomplished, by selling the lands for profit, such disposition would be legitimate and proper. As a faithful trustee, the Federal Government is bound not to squander or misappropriate the lands, and therefore, on sound principles of equity, ought to be held responsible to reimburse the Government for all outlays in acquiring and preserving the lands. As the lands sold have already reimbursed the Government for these outlays, the trust, in this respect, has been faithfully executed. But the grant of the power of disposal and protection, and further, executing the trust should be that every law passed providing for the disposal of the lands should be "necessary and proper," in the sense of the Constitution, for accomplishing the object for which they were acquired. By this the bill before the Senate, as well as much of the existing land legislation, must be tested.

But, Mr. President, before proceeding to apply this test, I desire to allude to certain opinions and propositions in regard to the public lands, from the correctness of which I entirely dissent. A large number of our statesmen, and a large portion of the existing land legislation, must be tested. As a faithful trustee, the Federal Government is bound not to squander or misappropriate the lands, and therefore, on sound principles of equity, ought to be held responsible to reimburse the Government for all outlays in acquiring and preserving the lands. As the lands sold have already reimbursed the Government for these outlays, the trust, in this respect, has been faithfully executed. But the grant of the power of disposal and protection, and further, executing the trust should be that every law passed providing for the disposal of the lands should be "necessary and proper," in the sense of the Constitution, for accomplishing the object for which they were acquired. By this the bill before the Senate, as well as much of the existing land legislation, must be tested.

But, Mr. President, before proceeding to apply this test, I desire to allude to certain opinions and propositions in regard to the public lands, from the correctness of which I entirely dissent. A large number of our statesmen, and a large portion of the existing land legislation, must be tested. As a faithful trustee, the Federal Government is bound not to squander or misappropriate the lands, and therefore, on sound principles of equity, ought to be held responsible to reimburse the Government for all outlays in acquiring and preserving the lands. As the lands sold have already reimbursed the Government for these outlays, the trust, in this respect, has been faithfully executed. But the grant of the power of disposal and protection, and further, executing the trust should be that every law passed providing for the disposal of the lands should be "necessary and proper," in the sense of the Constitution, for accomplishing the object for which they were acquired. By this the bill before the Senate, as well as much of the existing land legislation, must be tested.

These receipts, when no disturbing causes interfere, average about three million dollars a year—the interest on a permanent investment of $50,000,000—which would be thus indicated as the money value of the public lands; an amount less than the receipts for a single year from customs. The true way of establishing and increasing the public credit is, to induce settlements of the public lands; and by developing the resources of the uncultivated soil, to swell the annual products of labor, and thereby add to the prosperity and wealth of the country. Our present rich credit rests upon the agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and commercial resources of a population numbering thirty million, sustained by individual industry and enterprise, and protected by the firmness, stability, and strength of our Federal system of government, and not upon our thousand millions of uncultivated lands.

Originating in the same erroneous estimate as to the money value of our public lands, propositions have been made that the Federal Government should divide out the public domain among the States, and thereby divest itself entirely or partially of the trust. Notwithstanding its absurdity, and its violation of all sound principle, this proposition still has its advocates. Estimating the lands to be worth $2,000,000,000, and giving this sum to be divided among the States, the sum would fall to each State, an urgent appeal is made to the supposed cupidity of the people in behalf of the distribution of the public domain among the States. Besides being utterly false in its assumption as to the value of the lands, the proposition is so palpably repugnant to the obligations and duties of the Government as a faithful trustee, that it needs no other refutation than the mere statement of its absurdity.

Equally inconsistent with the constitutional obligations of the Government as a trustee, and all propositions for giving public lands to associations or institutions within States where the public lands proposed to be given are not situated, based upon reasons of charity or humanity, or other local considerations, is enough to say of all such propositions, that they are as repugnant to reaching the Treasury of the nation for local objects. The lands are wanted to be converted into money for the benefit of the objects sought to be promoted. The Government has no more right to give lands for such purposes, than to give money out of the Treasury for which the lands may be sold, or which may have been derived from imposts. Such donations, not being necessary or proper as means of promoting the object for which the lands were acquired, are not sanctioned by the Constitution.

The distribution of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands can, under no pretense, be regarded as a policy necessary and proper in carrying out the power to admit new States. Its claim to constitutionality, therefore, must rest upon some other basis than the Constitution. If any clause can be found, and I am sure none exists, which authorizes Congress to take money from the Treasury and distribute it among the States, then the distribution policy may be defended, and I will support it to the hilt. If any clause can be found, and I am sure none exists, which authorizes Congress to take money from the Treasury and distribute it among the States, then the distribution policy may be defended, and I will support it to the hilt. If any clause can be found, and I am sure none exists, which authorizes Congress to take money from the Treasury and distribute it among the States, then the distribution policy may be defended, and I will support it to the hilt.

I come now, Mr. President, to speak of that series of enactments which make up our present system of land laws, and to state, as they all rest upon the same principle on which the homestead policy is based. Under these laws, grants of lands have been made to States for schools, for internal improvements, for the reclamation of swamps, and for the construction of railroads and public buildings. These grants were made without compensation, or a money equivalent; the Government received no money for them, although, in the aggregate, they amount to more than one hundred and fifty million acres. The question arises: on what principle has the trustee given away an amount of the trust property, which, at the minimum price, would have brought into the Treasury nearly two hundred million dollars? The answer given is, that the principle on which this policy has been inaugurated and sanctioned is, that the United States, as proprietor, receives, from the application of the grants to the prescribed uses, a compensation in the enhanced value and salubrity of the remaining lands. Upon an allegation of waste against the trustee for having disposed of the trust property without a money equivalent, this answer would probably be deemed sufficient, especially if the fact were shown that the remaining lands were enhanced in value and salubrity sufficiently to compensate for those given away. To my mind, however, the answer would have been greatly strengthened, if it had proceeded to state that the lands were acquired to be peopled and formed into States; that so long as the trust continued, it was the duty of the trustee to add to the revenue necessary and proper to gather population on the lands; that the granting of donations for schools, for internal improvements, for the reclamation of uninhabitable swamps, and for the construction of railroads and public buildings, were obviously necessary and proper means to be resorted to on the public lands, and thus to execute and carry out the leading object of the trust; and that the results had fully demonstrated the wisdom of the policy. Such an answer, with the additional statement that the remaining and adjoining lands had been enhanced in value and salubrity, would be conclusive as to the fidelity of the trustee.

The graduation and preemption laws stand with equal firmness on the principle that they were necessary and proper means for carrying out the object for which the lands were acquired. If the raising of revenue was the chief purpose to be accomplished in disposing of the public lands, it would be exceedingly difficult to comprehend the political ethics which would excuse a trustee for assuming that the lands of the United States thirty years are worth only twelve and a half cents an acre, when the minimum price as to other lands subject to private entry, but which have not been in market ten years, is $1.25. To object to the reason for the policy, and not to the policy itself. Put it upon the ground that the great object is to induce settlement of the public lands, and not to raise revenue from them, and then the policy rests on a principle which requires no apology for adopting it. The preemption law grants peculiar privileges to preceptors. It authorizes them to follow on the lands of the United States, and make selections of the choice lands, to hold, improve, and cultivate them, or to assign away their preemption claims, up to the day when the lands are proclaimed and offered for sale. The Secretary of the Interior, early as I think, proposed to give away these lands two years from the date of their entries for payment. This policy has my cordial approval; it had my support nineteen years ago, in this body. The Secretary of the Interior has well said that "the advantages and profits arising from the first settlement of a new country ought to be enjoyed by the early settlers. They have peculiar hardships and privations to undergo, especial dangers and labors to encounter. The law does not contemplate that they shall have any competition, except from other actual settlers, in selecting the most fertile lands and the choicest locations." That is all well and truly said, but does it furnish a sufficient reason for granting the privilege of securing, without competition, lands worth ten or twenty dollars an acre, at the price of $1.25, or, if revenue, or a money equivalent, is the object, to be looked to in disposing of the lands? Upon the hypothesis that the settlement of the lands is the main object, and the raising of revenue merely a secondary consideration, the reasons of the Secretary for granting this valuable preference to the pioneers, and of not competing with them, are amply sufficient. They place the law on the principle that the trustee is in the discharge of his duty when he adopts measures so manifestly necessary and proper in carrying out the objects of the trust.

It remains now, Mr. President, for me to show that the bill before the Senate stands upon the same principle on which the entire system of laws for the present land policy is based, and is justified. The direct, immediate, and only object sought to be accomplished by the bill, is the gathering on the public lands of population, with the view of forming new States. The Constitution was formed upon the assumption that the formation and admission of new States were great objects, calculated to promote the prosperity, happiness, and greatness of the Federal Republic. It was for these purposes, and these alone, that our Federal system was endowed with the power of expansion. This measure, like all the others embraced in our system of land laws, looks to the accomplishment of these cardinal constitutional objects. After the preceptors have made their selections, and after the purchasers at the public sales have made their investments, an invitation is extended to all kinds of families to make homes on the unappropriated odd lands, subject to private entry; and, as an inducement to do so, a title in fee is tendered to a quarter section, upon the condition of five years' occupancy and cultivation. If it be objected, that the measure is intended to increase the revenue to the Government, in the first place, that occupancy and cultivation of the soil, with a view to new States and not revenue, are the great constitutional objects to be accomplished. In the second place, that no revenue is derived from the grants for railroads, internal improvements, public buildings, or schools on the public lands, though more than one hundred and fifty million acres have been thus disposed of. In the third place, that whilst no present revenue is derived from the homestead bill, nor from the grants for the several objects just enumerated, yet, in the articles of the bill, it is provided that, in order that it may be made a permanent law, there shall be an increase of population and application of labor and industry in developing the resources of the soil, as to enable the population to trouble and quadruple in an early day, their ability to use and render service to each other, and to the country, so that it may be made a permanent law, and that it may be made a fruitful measure of revenue. In the fourth place, that whilst neither the homestead bill nor either of the other measures produces present revenue, yet they all have a direct and necessary tendency to increase the revenue to the Government on the remaining and adjacent lands. And, in the last place, that the receipts from graduation, preemption, and private entries, and from public sales, (these being the only sources from which land revenue is now derived,) are not interfered with by the bill, except as to the odd sections subject to private entry, its only effect being to appropriate these odd sections as homesteads for a class of settlers who would never be purchasers for cost, and therefore producing no diminution in the present revenue to the Government. On the score of policy, therefore, no distinction can be drawn between the bill now before the Senate and the other measures of the land system, and, on the score of principle, they all rest firmly together on the same constitutional platform.

I have made the conjectural estimate, that under the provisions of this measure, twenty thousand families would be annually induced to emigrate from the States to the public lands to become freeholders. The inducements held out are certainly not so great as to produce any very extensive exodus from the States. The new settlers are coupled with necessary privations, sacrifices, dangers, and toils, in making settlements in a new country, which will deter most of those who now have comfortable means of subsistence from changing their habitations. It must be kept in mind, that the best offer is only one hundred and sixty acres of wild land, worth no more than two hundred dollars. To make it comfortable as a home, much labor must be expended, to say nothing of the hardships and sufferings to be endured.

The new country must be reclaimed from the hands of the freeholders can be secured only after years of toilsome industry and close economy. Such considerations will operate to repel the families now in independent circumstances, as well as those who lack the energy and enterprise to tear themselves away from a condition of dependence and poverty. There are none of the attractions of sudden wealth to be realized in this measure.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend his remarks. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up at this hour the special order, which is the bill (S. No. 230) for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty of 1819, between the United States and Spain, and this bill is now before the Senate, unless some motion to postpone be made.

MR. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope that proposition will be waived until my colleague has concluded his speech.

MR. MALLORY. I suppose my friend from Tennessee will take but a short time to finish his remarks.

MR. NICHOLSON. I shall occupy but about half an hour more.

MR. TOOMBS. The bill can be passed over informally until the Senator has concluded, provided it does not lose its priority. I shall not object to that.

MR. MALLORY. I have no objection to allowing the special order to be passed over informally for a week or two, if the Senator will, so that I may not lose its place, with a view to allow the Senator from Tennessee to conclude his speech.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be considered as the sense of the Senate unless objected to.

MR. NICHOLSON. I am very much obliged to Senators for allowing me to conclude my remarks.

It promises homes to those who have the courage to encounter the sacrifices and dangers of a frontier life, and who have the industry to seek for utility and improvement in the pursuit of labor and privation. Few of those who crowd our cities, the victims of want and misery, will ever be induced by the bill to surrender the habits which enslave them to a life of precarious subsistence in order to secure its benefits. Wherever capital presses too heavily upon labor, and will possess the necessary energy and courage to avail themselves of the inducements of the measure. In every State will be found, here and there, families in necessitous circumstances willing to respond to the call of the public lands. The inducements held out by the preemption policy, the number of preceptors for the last year was about twenty thousand. Under all the circumstances, and inasmuch as the last year was marked by very little of the land speculation mania, I have ventured to take this number as a criterion by which to estimate the operation of the homestead bill. Will the annual transfer of twenty thousand families, embracing probably one hundred thousand individuals from the old States, where their labor is now producing a scanty subsistence to the public lands, where the labor will be employed in developing their rich resources, be productive of beneficial results to the country? If it be true—and it will not be doubted—that the ties which bind us to homes and friends are our own strength, the best security which attach to our country and our Government, it is a matter of no small moment to inaugurate a measure which, in a single decade of years, elevates two hundred thousand families, embracing one million souls, from a condition of dependence to a dignity and independence and love of country which characterize the landholder. They become better soldiers in time of peace, make better soldiers in time of war, and rear up families with sentiments of ardent devotion to the Government which has contributed so materially to their freedom from their former dependent condition. But to appreciate properly the public benefits of this policy, we should be able to call up and pass in review the results of ten years of labor and industry by the twenty thousand families annually availing themselves of the inducements of the bill. The results already produced by our system of encouraging the settlement of the public lands, to render it necessary for me to attempt such a review. It will be sufficient for my purpose to remark, that, as the country progresses in improving their towns and condition, the best contributors of the revenue of the Government, by becoming consumers of articles of comfort and even of luxury, from the enjoyment of which they were debarred by their former necessities in their former condition. In this way, whilst the labor and industry of the individuals advance their own prosperity, they contribute to the prosperity of the country. Instead of diminishing the revenue of the Government, as some apprehend, it is no difficult matter to show that the necessary consequence of the progressive development of the agricultural nature of the country, and of its rich soil, annually brought into cultivation, must be to swell immensely the exports of the country, and in like proportion to increase the imports; thus operating as a measure for constantly increasing the public revenue, as well as the power and prosperity of the Government.

But, Mr. President, if it be conceded, as I do not doubt will be, that labor, and especially agricultural labor, is the basis of national prosperity, the question under consideration is readily solved. It follows, that the greater the amount of labor, and the more productive it is, just in that proportion the interest of the nation is promoted. The measure before us has for its leading object the increase of agricultural labor, and it invites that labor to a field where it can be employed with the greatest advantage to all interests, and consequently with the greatest benefit to the country. It says to the laboring man in the crowded States, where competition for employment has reduced his wages to a scanty subsistence, "Here, in the far West, is employment, without ruinous competition, where your labor and industry shall inure to the benefit of yourself and family." The nation, as well as himself and his family, is interested in his acceptance of the invitation.

The measure before us, Mr. President, bears strongly upon another subject connected with the interests of republican Government, which is too important to be overlooked. Mr. Madison said, that "the most difficult of all political arrangements is that of so adjusting the claims of those with and those without property, as to give security to each and promote the welfare of all." This man as he lived and died, and who, when we are bound to know that there will always be one portion with and another portion without property. As property, as well as personal rights, is an essential object of laws, the question was early presented to our legislatures, and the time might not come when the answer would be without property, and whether, in that state of society, the interests of property would be safe under the control of such a majority? This danger was not apprehended until population should become dense, and the competition for employment should reduce labor to the subsistence point. The results in other countries forewarned the founders of our Government that, in the unavoidable contest between capital and labor, property accumulates and concentrates in the hands of the few, whilst it dissolves in the hands of the many. It was known that the Federal principle in our system of Government would prove efficient in checking this tendency to social inequality. Much, too, was expected by the abolition of the laws of primogeniture and entailments, and the substitution of the law of descent and distribution, which would make property of all kinds transmissible and diffusible. These laws have operated beneficially; but it may be well doubted whether the ingenious devices of capital, in procuring exemption from the general laws, by means of incorporation and associations, has not materially counteracted that influence in those localities where population has become crowded and the competition for employment great. But the great preventive in our country against the evil consequences of a crowded population is the interest of labor in the land, which has been found in the vast public domain which has been added to our original territorial possessions. It is in this point of view that the wisdom of those territorial acquisitions which we have made is most signally illustrated and demonstrated. The results of the laws have confirmed the wisdom of our growing and crowding population in the old States, has proved a powerful protection to labor in its conflict with capital. If we could now imagine the condition of things which would exist, with our entire population confined and crowded together within the original limits of our Government, we should be able to appreciate the value of our acquisitions of territory and the successful operation of our system of land laws, which give encouragement to settlements on the public lands.

It cannot be assumed, however, that the outlet to labor furnished by our public lands has proved entirely effective in preventing the evils to the interests of labor apprehended from too dense a population. Within a few weeks past we have witnessed indications of dissatisfaction amongst laboring men and women in some of the New England States, which show that the competition for employment has reduced the wages of labor to a point at which it looks out for relief from the oppressions of capital. We have had placed on our tables a paper, purporting to be a memorial to the Legislature of New York, containing statements as to the growth and prevalence of pauperism in that State, which are so astounding that it is difficult to give them credit. In that paper it is said:

"The Governor, in his annual message, declares, that 'while in twenty years, from 1831 to 1851, the population of the State increased only sixty-one per cent, pauperism increased seven hundred and six per cent. In 1851, there was one person relieved to every one hundred and twenty-two in 1841, one to every thirty in 1831, and one to every twenty-four in 1820, one to every seven in 1810.'"

If these be facts, they show a state of social inequality that fully justifies the apprehensions on this subject manifested by the founders of our Government, and furnishes a pointed illustration of the truth, that

"It throws the land, to hasten this a prey,

"Where wealth accumulates, and woe beguile."

These words were impressively quoted in the Senate, a few days ago, by one of the Senators from that State, [Mr. SEWARD.]

I do not allude to this subject with the view of criticising the social system in the States where these inequalities of condition are thus exhibited, but with the view of showing the bearing of the bill before the Senate on the interests of labor in its competitions for employment, and its contest with capital for remunerative wages. Its influence on this subject will be apparent when it is remembered that its direct tendency will be to diminish the competition for employment, by drawing off a portion of those seeking it, and thus benefiting those who remain behind; whilst it furnishes remunerative employment to that portion which shall accept the terms offered by the bill. Whether we look at the measure in this way, or whether, in the Territories, the measure will be productive of beneficial results. At the same time, it secures a large annual increase in the number of those having the interests of property as well as of personal rights to strengthen their attachment to the Government, thus diminishing the evils apprehended from too great a proportion of those having no sympathy with the rights and interests of property.

When the policy proposed by this bill, Mr. President, was originated, in 1816, in the House of Representatives, by my colleague, I examined the bill, and came to the conclusion that it was a measure of great national moment. At that time the spirit of sectional agitation had not progressed so far as to array the two sections against each other in dangerous antagonism. Hence the fact, then as now, discernible as it is now, that the measure would be sought for by enterprising and needy families in all sections of the country, yet that its operation would be greatest in the northern States, did not induce me to hesitate as to the propriety of its adoption. It became a grave question, now, however, when sectionalism has been formally installed by a distinct political organization, and when it is believed to be actuated by sentiments inconsistent with the full enjoyment of their constitutional rights by southern men, whether, in this altered condition of things, the measure should not be withheld until holding support from the measure. In considering this question, I am bound to concede that the majority of those who will be attracted to the public domain by this bill, will be opposed in sentiment to my views on the subject of slavery. I am bound to concede that the force that will be formed upon the population thus gathered together will be free States. I am bound, further, to know that every new State thus formed and admitted into the Confederacy, will increase the preponderance of free political power against the South. I am bound to believe, from the facts around me, that when this preponderance reaches a certain point, if the sectional spirit that now predominates in the free States shall then prevail, an attempt will be made to destroy the institution of slavery by means of an amendment of the Federal Constitution. On the other hand, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact, that the public domain, to be peopled under the operation of this bill, is inevitably destined to be free territory—that this is the fact of the laws of nature if not of our law. I cannot avoid seeing that the tide of emigration westward, under the influence of our present land laws, must, at no very distant period, reach the public domain such an amount of population as will render the formation and admission of new free States unavoidable. I cannot see any other result from the growth of population on our public lands, under existing laws, than the continual increase of the political preponderance of free States, until that point shall be reached when the power will exist to amend the Constitution by the exercise of a pure sectional strength. Whether this bill, then, passes or not, the result is to be the same—new free States are to be formed and added to the Union until they are to constitute a controlling political power in the Government.

The question then assumes this attitude: the public lands were acquired to be settled and prepared for admission as States. Congress holds in its trust the property, and the people, authorized by the Constitution to adopt the measures necessary and proper to execute the trust. The homestead policy is, in my judgment, such a measure. Shall I then decline to discharge what I regard as the duty of the trustee, because a political organization has sprung into existence, which shows so much hostility to an institution essential to the interests of the South that nothing but lack of political power restrains it from destroying that institution? Am I to assume that sectionalism is destined to rule our politics, to control until there shall be such a preponderance of free States as to enable it to accomplish its ultimate purpose? In my judgment, this sectional antagonism must end, and end soon, or the southern States will be constrained to adopt effectual measures of resistance and redress. The former course, however, the homestead policy will be in operation, in giving expansion, growth, prosperity, and strength to our Federal system. If the latter result must come, it must come long before the homestead policy shall have brought any new free States into the Confederacy.

I therefore discard all sectional considerations, as entitled to no legitimate influence in deciding upon the merits of the measure. If men opposed to the institution of slavery avail themselves of its benefits, they will certainly not molest or oppose it on their farms in the far West, than in the localities from which they may emigrate. Having been familiar with the character of pioneers; having observed the influence on that character exerted by the habits which distinguish the early settlers who encounter the hardships and sacrifices and dangers of frontier life, I cherish the confident belief and hope that the emigrants, when withdrawn from constant contact with professional agitators in the crowded towns and cities, and when removed from the influence of that mysterious and malignant influence which is the source of domestic populations, will become liberalized, and be taught moderation and conservatism in their new homes. The open-handed generosity, unselfish hospitality, whole-souled sense of honor, and uncalculating courage which characterize pioneer life, are wholly inconsistent with the contracted, bigoted, and fanatical spirit which characterizes sectionalism. When the settlers begin to reap the fruits of their agricultural labor, and to become contributors to the commercial resources of the country, they will lead a more useful and patriotic life in the different sections are real elements of harmony and strength, and not of dissension and weakness. They will be taught by experience that their interests and those of southern labor are mutually dependent and mutually beneficial, and that both are promoted by cultivating sentiments and relations of fraternity. From such a population it would be strange if sentiments of disloyalty to the Federal Government should ever proceed. The danger is not in that quarter, and therefore I will not subject myself to the reproaches of the seceders, should I complain of others, by withholding my support from the bill on such grounds.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move that the American Army," provided for by the ninth article of the treaty. In Spain the judges, of course, stopped receiving the testimony. To remedy that evil, the Congress of the United States, on the 26th of June, 1834, passed an additional act to this effect:

"An act for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida."

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the Treasury not more than six hundred and sixty thousand dollars, or the amount awarded by the judge of the superior court of St. Augustine, in the Territory of Florida, under the authority of the several laws and sixth first chapter of the act of the Seventeenth Congress, approved March 3, 1813, for losses occasioned in East Florida by the troops of the United States in the year 1813 and 1814, in all cases where the decision of the said judge shall be deemed by the Secretary of the Treasury to be just and equitable. This award shall be paid except in the case of those who, at the time of suffering the loss, were actual subjects of the Spanish Government, and provided also, that no award be made for depredations committed in East Florida previous to the entrance into that province of the agent or troops of the United States."

That was to pay for the existing adjudicated claims, which were about forty-three thousand dollars: that it has been alleged, I think, in some of the reports, was stated by the then Delegate of Florida to be the whole amount of the claims; which was not true. He did not say so, but that that had been then adjudicated. But the second section of the same act went on further to provide:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the judge of the superior court of St. Augustine be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and decide upon the claims for losses occasioned by the troops aforesaid, in 1813 and 1814, not heretofore presented to the said judge, and the evidence was withheld, in consequence of the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, that such claims were not proper for the benefit of the United States, and that the Governments of the United States and Spain: Provided, That such claims be presented to the said judge in the space of one year from the passage of this act, and that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, that such claims were not proper for the benefit of the United States and Spain: Provided, That the authority herein given shall be subject to the restrictions created by the provisions to the preceding section."

This act overruled the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and directed the claims to be going out of the institution of 1812 and 1813 to be adjudicated. It had been decided at the Treasury Department that these claims were not within the treaty. Then the claimants came to Congress, and a law was passed by the legislative and executive departments overruling the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and declaring they were within the operation of the treaty, and giving jurisdiction to the courts; and telling them to go on; and this act has been decided by all the judges of all the courts, and by all the Attorneys General, by everybody who has been consulted, to be in pari materia with the act of 1823, and expressly upon its face to carry out the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 with Spain. Then, I say, on the face of the treaty itself these claims were under it; but whether they were or not, it was a question adjudicated twenty-six years ago by this department of the Government, who had a right to decide on it, that they were within it. Congress then overruled expressly, as I have read, by the second section, the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, and directed the claims to be going out of the institution of 1812 and 1813 to be adjudicated by putting this class of cases under the judicial determination of the courts of Florida.

Another question subsequently arose. Mr. Rush, then Secretary of the Treasury, after the passage of this act, when the adjudications of the courts in Florida were first commenced, he decided that, according to the custom of the Department, they did not pay interest, and therefore they would not pay it. They claimed the right even to review the judicial decision. It was always contended by the claimants, and contended by the Treasury, that the courts of Florida had no right to review the judicial decisions of the courts in Florida; but that question has passed away; it is not now involved. We bound ourselves by a treaty with a foreign nation, whose subjects have been injured, that we would satisfy their claims for damages, which it should be ascertained, "by process of law," they had sustained. These are technical terms, as old as Magna Charta, which have been vindicated and approved for between six and seven centuries. I believe it was in 1237 that they were first mentioned in the Magna Charta. At least for six hundred years these particular words have had a certain definite technical legal meaning. It was by "process of law" that they were to be determined. They were to be judicially determined; they were to be determined by the courts. Under another clause of the same treaty with Spain, by which we were to receive damages from her, it was provided that they should be settled by a commission; but in regard to this class of cases, where she turned over to us her subjects who remained in Florida up to the exchange of flags, Spain, in royal good faith to those subjects, not only provided that they should be redressed, but provided that in due manner, and said they should have a right to have their claims determined judicially, "by process of law," and not by a commission. The reason for it, Senators can see, was very obvious. They then became our citizens, except those who chose to leave Florida—some of them did go; they went to the Spanish islands; some of these claimants are now foreigners—but the great number of them are citizens of the United States, who did not leave the country, and could not do it, and did not desire to do it, preferring allegiance to us rather than to Spain.

Congress, in 1823, in order to carry out this treaty, appointed a judicial tribunal to determine the question. They appointed the highest judicial tribunal in the Territory. The Federal court of the Territory heard and decided upon the claims. Florida came into the Union, and that class of cases then went to the United States district judge. The clause of the act of 1823, as you will perceive, seems to give the control to the Secretary of the Treasury; but that we are not complaining of. The principle of the act is, that if Mr. Crawford and Mr. Rush having decided that these claims were not within the treaty, Congress reversed that decision, and put them under the treaty expressly by the act of 1834. Then they decided, as a purely municipal rule in the Treasury, as it appears from all the records and from the Secretary's own statements of the Treasury and Attorneys General since—I have them all before me—not to allow interest, on the ground that it was a regulation of the Treasury with reference to our domestic affairs. I think it is very common with all men to lay a general rule, as between the Government and the citizen, that the Government is not to pay interest. The reason given is, that sovereigns are presumed always to be ready to pay; and that is the sole reason. This sovereign has not been ready or willing to pay on these pending judgments to the courts. So even if it had been a domestic debt, the reason has ceased, for the claimants have gone, from time to time, to all the departments, from court to court; and one of these cases, to test this question, went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and determined they had no jurisdiction; that Congress had given this special jurisdiction to the district court of Florida, subject to be revised by the Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore they dismissed it. They went to the Court of Claims. There Judge Seaburg declared, in strong and emphatic language, that they had jurisdiction, and that nothing could release us but payment; that we were under every obligation of good faith, of national honor, of justice, and of right, to pay the utmost farthing of these decrees according to the terms of the law according to the law according to justice; and one of the other judges held that the claim for interest was clearly right, and that he had no doubt about it; but two of the judges said they had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal from the Secretary of the Treasury. Judge Blackford said he expressed no opinion on the claims either way, and only that they had no jurisdiction, and there stands the cause.

Where then are they to go? You agreed to determine their rights by judicial principles. They went to the judicial tribunals and got the decrees. They were scanned, and scanned closely, as any one will find who will look into them as I have done. In some of the cases the Government had counsel, who appeared and argued for the United States. They were critically examined, and then, when the time came, when the reviewing officer, the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, He reviewed them critically, and paid so much as he thought was just of the principal, and rejected the balance. Subsequently, where one Secretary of the Treasury had refused to pay the principal of the principal, others made additional allowances to the whole extent. I believe now that probably the whole principal has been paid, and there is nothing left but the mere question of interest, which is the only thing in this bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator from Georgia wish to ask him a question there?

Mr. TOOMBS. With great pleasure.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is in relation to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read that decision some time ago; I have not read it recently; but I understood that decision at the time I read it, and I understand it as follows, that under the treaty, Congress bound itself to establish a special tribunal for the adjudication of these cases; and that it had done so by enabling the Florida judges in the first instance to investigate them; second, that Congress had created the Secretary of the Treasury as a special tribunal for the determination of these cases; that that was within the constitutional power of Congress, and was in conformity to the treaty; and thirdly, that when the Secretary of the Treasury had exercised this special jurisdiction, by determining finally the amount due, that was conclusive; and it was upon that ground that there was no appeal either to the Supreme Court or the Court of Claims; that being a final adjudication of the question as a judicial question. I understood that to be the decision.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand that a great part of the United States decided that the Florida judges, in examining these cases, were not judges, but commissioners; and therefore there was no appeal to the Supreme Court. That was the only point that was really decided. They said that they were commissioners, and not judges; and they held that the claimants were entitled to due process of law, and subsequently, in a note to that decision, the Senator will find an explanation by the judges. They did decide at that time that Congress had a right to make the judges commissioners, though it was decided in 1793 that they had not. The Supreme Court decided that Congress had made them commissioners, and therefore that an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury was right, and in accordance with the treaty; and hence there can be no appeal either to the Supreme Court of Florida to the Supreme Court. If it acted as a court, the claimants had a right to appeal under the law; if the judges acted as commissioners, they could not appeal; but the Secretary could determine. That was the decision; and they dismissed the case solely on the ground that they had no jurisdiction.

That decision, though, which was made by the Supreme Court, was itself modified, as the Senator will find by examining the case, by a note in Howard's Reports. It was made upon a mistake in the facts of the case. But, if they held that they shall have due process of law, which a commission is not. They give a commission on the other class of claims between Spain and the United States. Congress, in 1823, went on to carry out the treaty; and they directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the allowances made by the judges if they were equitable and just, and within the provisions of the treaty. Under that clause of the act, the Secretaries claimed a right to review them. The propriety of that claim is doubtful, but that is the fact. They were not paid. After the decision of the judges of the district of Florida, the Secretaries of the Treasury examined the evidence, and frequently withheld a portion of the amount decreed; but I know some of them have since been paid in full, and I assume that, for the principle on which all the later Secretaries of the Treasury considering that they were bound to pay the whole principal sum of the awards, if the claims were within the treaty and the allowances were equitable and just.

Then, I say, they have gone to the Secretary on the question of interest. They were entitled to a decision of the courts by the treaty. You gave them courts; you gave them a review power; and they went to the Supreme Court when the Secretary of the Treasury decided against them. The Supreme Court decided against them. They decided. They went to the Court of Claims, and two of those judges declared that they were entitled to every dollar they claimed by the treaty, by justice, by the laws of nations, and by our own laws; though one of them declared that the court had no jurisdiction over the cases, and the judge expressed an opinion upon it, holding that there was a want of jurisdiction. There stand the judicial determinations. No judicial tribunal in these thirty odd years ever expressed an opinion against the principle of this bill, or against the debt one way or the other; not a judge, not a Secretary of the Treasury since the act of 1834; not an Attorney General. Fifteen committees of Congress have reported in favor of the allowance, and among those who made these reports may be named some of the ablest men—Mr. Everett, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in the other House, and Mr. Webster in this. Fifteen committees of the House have also declared that it is in conformity with the treaty, and that these people are entitled to it. What are the objections to it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, as I should like to give my vote on principle, I wish to ask a question.

Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand Mr. Crittenden reported against this claim.

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is so stated, I think, in the reports I looked at at this morning. I will refer the Senator to the report.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have the opinion of six or seven Attorneys General before me.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The report of the committee gives the opinion of Mr. Webster in favor of these claims; and Mr. How has declared that it says, that his views "are more or less in conflict with opinions which have been given in these cases by recent Attorneys General of the United States—Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Legare, and Mr. Nelson."

Mr. TOOMBS. I have the opinions of Mr. Legare and Mr. Crittenden before me. They gave opinions in favor of it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I have the report before me. Mr. TOOMBS. That is on another portion of the case—the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I merely called the Senator's attention to this for explanation, as he stated there was no Attorney General against it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have them all. Attorneys General Crittenden, Legare, and Cushing, have all decided that the act of 1834 was a bona fide matter, and both intended to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty. That was the main point. The point on which the claims have been attacked was, that the act of 1834 did not bring them within the treaty. On the question of interest, there has been much diversity. No doubt, Mr. Webster was correct; there was diversity on some points; and you must look to those points to know on which he differed with those gentlemen. These very gentlemen—Attorneys General Crittenden, Nelson, and Legare—decided that the Government could not sue under the treaty, under the ruling of the Department, but that Congress was the tribunal for them to come to. I read their opinions with great care. They decided that the Treasury could not pay, because they would not overrule the decision of the Treasury Department, commencing, in 1836 or 1837, with Mr. Woodbury, and running down to 1851 or 1853. They all held, however, that, after all, the claims were just; that, in their opinion, they came within the treaty and the act of 1834, but, at the same time, they said, they must refer the case to the Department. That is the way their opinions were given—that they ought not to overrule the previous adjudications which had been made. Mr. Attorney General Legare said:

"The act of 1834 associated, in the same time, the operations referred to in the treaty, and the claims in 1812."

Again he said, speaking of the treaty:

"By one of its stipulations, the Government was bound to make compensation for injuries admitted to have been done by the troops in 1812, and to submit the alleged injury to examination, according to the usual course of judicial authority."

That is the only point necessary to carry this case. The parties who oppose the claim deny this. They put their objections on the ground, first, that the operations of the army of 1812 and 1813 were not within the ninth article of the treaty of 1819; and, in the second place, that the act of 1834 did not put them there; that that was a gratuity. To-day, as far as I am informed, these are the only objections to the payment of these claims. There may be others; but I am answering those which were hitherto when I reported on this case four years ago. They were put then solely on that ground.

I recollect that some person with very little knowledge of the subject, probably a gentleman of some distinction in the House of Representatives, four or five years ago made a random speech about it, and said that in looking at the testimony he found that fifty cents a pound had been charged by these people for San Island cotton, and I presume two thirds of that very learned body, although not well skilled in cotton, thought of course that was proof of fraud. There was not a pound of San Island cotton in the United States in 1812. The cotton was not in the market. He thought he had discovered a mare's nest, and no doubt misled many intelligent men like himself. But now all question as to the reasonableness, as to the justice of the original claims, has been decided even by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been decided that they were not excessive and should get their money, and that the Government was bound to give a judicial decision to these people. She attempted it, and she established the courts. The cases were tried in her own way, in conformity to her own policy, her judges; and the Secretaries of the Treasury passed on these people's claims, and the Government has paid the principal; but she says it is not the custom of the Treasury to pay interest, and there is the difficulty of the case; and that is all this bill proposes to do. I have no dissenting opinion.

In this stage of the proceeding, I will merely state some of the leading principles, namely: I doubt not to most Senators, on that question. We had a difficulty with England under the treaty of 1783, as I believe we have had with regard to the treaty now before us, and we were unable to get on. On the settlement of the difficulties and the allowance of pecuniary satisfaction interest was paid. We had a difficulty with her about the treaty of Ghent. We referred it to the Emperor, and we decided that we should have full satisfaction, even for our slaves who she carried away in contravention of the treaty of peace. Subsequently, she said she would not pay interest. The question was argued before the two Governments, and she finally paid five per cent. interest to us. I have no dissenting opinion. I have no objection to our Government: "you are paying us in 1825 or 1830 for damages done in 1815 when you took away the property; paying now for the property you took away then; is no indemnification; it is no satisfaction for the wrong; but in order to do away with the wrong, we have been obliged to use it;" and that is most usual among all civilized countries, and it is generally ascertained, if they choose, some what arbitrarily, by fixing upon some rate of interest. She paid us five per cent.

Not long ago, another case arose in our relations with England, and I have before me a communication from Mr. Stevenson, who was our minister to England, and Lord Palmerston, on the point. The Comet and Encomium were taken into a British island, and they agreed to pay for them. We demanded interest. Lord Palmerston admitted that it was the settled policy of the laws of nations, whenever indemnity or satisfaction was to be made for an injury under treaty stipulations, that there should be interest, and he paid five per cent. interest. Our Government has no objection to the payment of interest on all nations. It is in conformity to our own publicist, one of the ablest in the world—Mr. Wheaton—and recognized by Vattel and by Grotius. It is a principle founded in justice. It is the ordinary principle of the common law. Take the case of a trespass for the recovery of real property, or trover—which is the common law action most common to recover the possession of the property taken—the measure of damages is the thing taken and interest upon its value for the depreciation of its use up to the time of satisfaction is rendered. That is the universal rule of common law. I believe it is the same with the civil law; but my friend from Louisiana is better acquainted with that. Of course, it would be very far short of that measure of complete justice which the Government would be bound to give, if it were the value of the thing destroyed, though satisfaction be not made for ten or fifteen years afterwards.

I say this is the general principle of the common law; it is founded in justice; it is a universal principle of the laws of nations. It has been recognized by our Government; it is a principle by ourselves to others. Our Mexican commission allowed interest; and the Government, through your whole diplomacy, from the first treaty of peace and independence, from 1783 until now, in all your commissions, in all your judicial tribunals, everywhere, you have demanded it, and to everybody else you have paid it, and why not, then, to these people? Why shall they be made an exception? The words here are, that you shall give "satisfaction;" and is paying the value of the property taken forty years ago, satisfaction? Upon what principle do you call it satisfaction? It is part satisfaction, to be sure. You destroyed a man's property, and you have not made satisfaction to him in 1840 what their value was in 1813? I am arguing now on the ground that you have agreed to pay, and of course when you paid the principal, you admitted that. The judge gave a judgment for the principal and five per cent. interest, the interest was about one-third the injury was done up to the time the judgments were rendered. The Government of the United States paid the principal, but refused to pay the interest. Now, I wish to know to what principle? It was under this mistake: Mr. Woodbury said it was not the custom to pay interest on domestic debts. We have heard a great deal about that. It is not for the reason I have stated, though the rule is by no means universal, but is constantly departed from by Congress; constantly varying with the times, and the necessities of the country. I have shown, that Governments being always presumed to be ready to pay their acknowledged debts, it is deemed to be the fault of the creditor if he does not come up and demand it; and therefore the Government is not bound, and ought not to be bound, to show that it has been ready to pay. But in this case you opened your courts, and your creditors went in upon your own limitation, as meager as your justice was, and presented their claims within twelve months, and pursued your through the courts; went to the Secretary of the Treasury, demanded justice; then went to your Supreme Court, demanded it there; went to your Court of Claims, demanded it there; came to Congress, demanded it here day after day, and year after year. They have stood before the tribunals of the country, and demanded their right, not for a moment being in default, not for a moment abandoning it, not for an instant discontinuing it; but, greatly to the grievance of my old friend, Judge Butler, as he said, pursuing him with a zeal very inconsistent with his comfort and convenience. I have before me the arguments which were made against this measure some four years ago. No argument is made in any of the courts against it, for its justice is admitted by all the judges who have expressed an opinion on the subject. There is no antagonism to be there, that is what Mr. Crittenden and when the report I have before me, made by myself and Mr. Pettit at that time, was presented to the Senate of the United States; and we argued it, as you will find by turning to that document, exclusively on the question that interest should be paid. Then a majority of the Judiciary Committee said it should not be paid, because "late operations" meant not the invasion of 1812 and 1813, but the invasion of 1814 or 1818; but Congress, by the act of 1834, as I have stated, settled that, and settled the Government's right to the claim. The measure was the property party to settle it. These claimants came to them and demanded of them to correct the decision of the Treasury Department, and the Congress of the United States carried out their treaty stipulations with fidelity and honor by declaring that they were true to the treaty of 1819, and telling the claimants to go to the proper tribunal for those damages of 1812 and 1813. That was the decision, final and just, and in conformity with the treaty itself. Therefore, I say, I dismiss these questions, and will not go into them. It is settled, though, that the measure of the act of 1834 was, that nothing should be paid unless the damage was done after troops of the United States entered the Territory. Well, General Matthews entered the Territory. The judges were ordered to try the case, and the Government had no damage before he went in there, except for the two or three days they were marching to Fernandina. They embodied themselves on the Spanish side of the St. Mary's, and took Fernandina. These operations at Fernandina were excluded. The American agent tried to possess the island by American army marched under the walls of Fernandina, devastating the State and destroying property. That was one of the questions to be decided; and it has been judicially determined. You agreed to give a judicial determination; it has been had; and now we are asked to go behind that

The language of this paper cannot be harmonized with the construction sought (in violation of a substantiating law, in full force, on the statute-book to be placed on the English version of the treaty.

This protocol contains the proposition of Spain, accepted by the United States. That was the basis of the treaty; and here I will remark that these by no means were the only outstanding matters of importance between the United States and Spain. Our promise to Spain is embodied in the Spanish version. If the two versions cannot be harmonized, then the language of the promisor governs. I think that is a principle of international law that cannot be controverted. I hold, therefore, where two parties make a treaty, and one makes a promise upon a condition, and that condition has been complied with, if the promise can be harmonized with the condition precedent, the language must be taken most strongly against the promisor. That is the common-law rule as to the construction of deeds. Upon that subject, Yattel says:

"In making construction, attention ought principally to be paid to the words of the promising party."—Fattel, book 17, art. 267.

If the treaty had only intended to cover the invasion of West Florida by General Jackson, in 1818, the language would have embraced the two provinces, ("las Floridas.") both East and West Florida. The act of 1823, "to carry into effect the treaty," need not have given jurisdiction to be "in the territory ceded to the United States at St. Augustine," for there would have been no cases "within his jurisdiction," as the act assumes there were.

As I have said before, it would hardly have been probable that they would have used the word "latest," at all, if they intended only to include the invasion of 1818. They would have used the word "last" or "latest," because six years before was certainly "late" as between these two contracting parties. It was not as late, to be sure, as one year, but in common treaty-making parlance it was as terrible legal and as much of the same as all the treaties we have ever made.

I further contend—and I beg leave to dwell on this particularly; because, in my judgment, the votes of all those Senators who will not sustain this measure will turn on this point—that the word "late" in the American version of the treaty, which has no place and no equivalent in the Spanish version, may be interpreted by the condition of things which then existed between Spain and ourselves. The treaty of 1795, between the United States and Spain, was claimed by each Government to have been violated in the disturbances and was growing out of the French Revolution, before the year 1802; and in that year a convention was negotiated between these two Governments, stipulating mutual indemnities for certain past injuries. This convention was accepted by the United States, and sent to Spain for her ratification; which she declined. In consequence of this refusal, all those injuries, extending from the date of the treaty of 1795 to the date of the convention of 1802, were subjects of mutual controversy in the negotiations which led to the treaty of 1819; and a careful examination will show that in these negotiations the injuries provided for by that unratified convention (unratified by Spain) are distinguished from those which occurred after the date of said convention. Thus, in a letter from Mr. Ewing, the American Minister, to the Spanish Secretary of State, of the 26th August, 1816, the injuries anterior to the date of the said convention are denominated "ancient causes of misunderstanding," and those of a subsequent date, "recent occurrences."—The injuries subsequent to the date of said convention, and "similar injuries subsequent to its date." (American State Papers, vol. 4 of Foreign Affairs, p. 434.)

Again, in a letter from the same to the same, dated August 17, 1817, injuries occurring since the said convention are denominated "more recent occurrences."—(Ibid., p. 446.)

In another letter from the same to the same, dated August 19, 1817, claims for injuries anterior and subsequent to said convention, are styled causes "as ancient as of recent date." (Ibid., volume of State Papers, p. 449.)

This language and this distinction are continued down to the treaty of 1819.

At the date of the treaty of 1819, the injuries of 1812 and 1813 (all one series of acts) were less than six years old, while those which occurred between the date of the treaty of 1795 and the convention of 1802, were from eight to twenty-five years old. Those of 1812 and 1813 were, therefore, most properly denominated "late" and "recent events" and operations, in contradistinction to those originating anterior to the convention of 1802. This convention of 1802, and the injuries provided for, are designated and named and settled by the same ninth article of the treaty of 1819, by which the injuries in both the Floridas (not West Florida alone, as contended) are provided for as "recent events," "late operations of the American army," in the English version, (but not in the Spanish,) "late operations," but not the latest or last, "recent" or "late," in contradistinction to those anterior to 1802, provided for in the same article. (For the convention of 11th August, 1802, ibid., volume State Papers, p. 407. For the nineteenth article of the treaty of 1819, ibid., p. 623.)

Mutual indemnities for all injuries in violation of the treaty of 1795, or of the law of nations, were fully agreed upon in the negotiation which terminated in the treaty of 1819, before General Jackson entered West Florida, in 1818. I wish to draw attention to this important circumstance, as one of very great consequence. The negotiations which contemplated the formation of a treaty to provide for the very claims that we are now considering, were commenced before General Jackson commenced his operations in 1818, and which altogether amounted to less than $25,000. Here is another common-sense view of this question which it is impossible to get over. From the beginning, the negotiation was upon the basis of mutual indemnities, for all injuries, on the part of Spain. (See the American State Papers, p. 446, 447.)

It is a letter from Mr. Onís to Mr. Adams, dated January 24, 1818, Mr. Onís says:

"I now proceed to state the most obvious and essential difficulties which render your three proposals for the settlement of indemnities inadmissible. I observe that, in speaking of the injuries of the United States, you speak of injuries suffered by American citizens, and claim that which is equivalent to indemnities for injuries sustained by the citizens and authorities of this Republic, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaty. I also observe that you do not omit this consideration of reciprocity and common justice, but propose the immediate cessation of both the Floridas—which two Spanish provinces have been ceded to the United States in return for the payment of what may appear to be due by Spain to American citizens, according to the arbitration of the joint commission."

Mr. Onís proceeded in this letter to enforce the injustice of this want of mutuality and of reciprocity, which he pronounces, "offensive to the dignity and honor of Spain." (Ibid., vol. of State Papers, p. 465.)

In a letter to Mr. Adams, dated February 10, 1818, Mr. Onís said:

"The question of indemnities can be attended with no difficulty. The Spanish Government has always been willing to give due satisfaction for the losses and injuries sustained by the citizens of this Republic, and committed to Spain, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaty; but it cannot relinquish its claim to comprehend, in like manner, the adjustment of those losses and injuries as may have been committed by citizens and authorities of this Republic on the Crown and subjects of Spain, in violation of the law of nations and the existing treaty. Your Government, in making the justice of this demand, cannot fail to see that it is, thus, ratifying the convention agreed on in 1802, as I have said, proposed to you, the question of indemnities will be easily settled and determined."

In reply to these propositions for mutual indemnities, Mr. Adams, United States Secretary of State, in a communication to Mr. Onís, dated March 12, 1818, said:

"You express the willingness of your Government to reimburse the United States for the injuries of 1795, and to extend its stipulations to the cases of complaint of a similar character to those provided for in it, which have since that time occurred. It is undoubtedly the intention of the Government that its engagements should be reciprocal; and if this was not expressly declared in my note of the 16th of January, it was merely because the President was not aware that any such claims of Spanish subjects for indemnities from the United States Government were in contemplation."

It was the predecessor of the President then in office who acted under the secret act for the invasion of East Florida:

"I am authorized to assure you that there will be no difficulty in including any such as may exist in the convention now pending in the United States, and that all such indemnities which may be justly due by them."—Ibid., vol. of State Papers, p. 425.

This letter, thus explicitly agreeing to mutual indemnities for all injuries in violation of the law of nations and of the treaty of 1795, bears date, let it be remembered, on the 12th of March, 1818.

The records of the Government show beyond all possible question that at that date General Jackson had not entered Florida. I wish the Senate to recollect that fact as one which I think is conclusive of the entire argument made by the Senate from Delaware. When Mr. Adams, as Secretary of State, told Don Onís that he designed expressly to provide for these claims of 1812 and 1813, General Jackson had not then entered the Floridas, and his operations were confined to West Florida, and consequently that could not have been in his mind during the negotiations. The fact that General Jackson had not then been in West Florida is shown by the correspondence between the War Department and General Jackson, printed in the American State Papers, Military Affairs, vol. 1, pp. 690, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 704.

At page 695, it is shown that General Jackson had not entered Florida on the 25th of March, 1818—thirteen days after the date of Mr. Adams's communication to the Spanish Minister.

Mr. Onís made his first complaint to the Secretary of State, against this invasion of West Florida by General Jackson, on the 17th of June, 1818; which was about as early as the news, at that day, could have reached the seat of Government.

The remonstrance of Mr. Onís against the act, bearing date the 8th July, 1818. (American State Papers, Foreign Relations, vol. 4, p. 495.)

Sir, the question whether the injuries of 1812 and 1813, in East Florida, are within the ninth article of the treaty of 1819, has been fully considered by the Senate, and Congress, by a declaratory law, (the act of 1834,) under which the claimants have proceeded, in the manner therein prescribed, to establish their rights. That law is binding on the United States; and the rights of the claimants under the judgments they have obtained, (for such a great expense of time and money,) are vested irrevocably in them, and are protected by the Constitution, as well as by the honor and good faith of the United States.

The question is no longer an open one, having been settled by a valid constitutional law, which is in full force on the statute-book, though not fully executed.

The final decision of this question belonged to Congress. That body has made a decision in favor of the claimants, by a valid law, and that decision is binding on the Executive, as Congress confirming a contract grant of land; which act would operate as a grant, and could be recalled, even though a gratuity.

The second section of the act of 1834 clearly and distinctly recognizes the injuries of 1812 and 1813 to be within the ninth article of the treaty, and directs them to be adjudged and paid accordingly, under the act of 1823 passed "to carry into effect" that article; and the claimants have a legal right to the execution of that law. There is no question open but that of the faithful execution of that law, and that the Secretary has a constitutional right. A subsequent Congress cannot constitutionally retract or annihilate rights given by the legislation of a previous Congress, even in doubtful cases, which this is not. If they could it would be most extraordinary. They could, contented cases and questions would never be settled, and the whole doctrine of vested rights under congressional legislation would perish in endless conflicts of opinion between different legislative bodies; and rights, in the constitutional sense, could not exist as an act of Congress. Every right thus attempted to be given would depend upon the volition of subsequent Congress. This, it is submitted, is not the basis of the rights of the people of the United States under the legislation of Congress.

The act of 1834, recognizing the injuries of 1812 and 1813 to be within the treaty, has stood upon the statute-book for twenty-six years! And in all that long period, no officer of the United States has questioned its validity, or suggested a doubt that the treaty question was not finally and forever settled by that act. The Secretary, Woodbury, Trevelyan, Spencer, Bibb, Meredith, Forward, Walker, and Corwin; and Attorneys General Crittenden, Legare, Nelson, Johnson, and Cush-of the United States. In consequence of their travels and cargoes having been taken by the subjects of his Catholic Majesty during the late war between Spain and France, it is agreed that all such cases shall be referred to the decision of commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner:—Sc. 1. The commissioners shall be three, one to be chosen by the United States, one by Spain, and the third to be chosen a third, and the award of the commissioners, or two of them, will be final, and the Spanish Government to pay the amount in specie.

"This commission awarded interest as part of the damages. (See American State Papers, vol. 1, Intercourse, p. 285.) So in the case of claims of American citizens against Brazil, settled by Mr. Tudor, United States Minister, interest was claimed and allowed. (See American Document, first session, Twenty-Fifth Congress, House of Representatives, Dec. 22, p. 249.)

"Interest is in the controversy with Mexico of the 11th of April, 1839, by which provision was made by Mexico for the payment of claims of American citizens for injuries to persons and property by the Mexican authority, a civil commission was provided for, and this commission allowed interest in all cases. (See communication of the President to the House of Representatives, including the report of the commissioners, under date of the 25th August, 1842, Executive Document, House of Representatives, second session of Twenty-fifth Congress, vol. 2, Doc. 291.)

"So, also, under the late treaty with Mexico of 24 February, 1847. The board of commissioners for the adjustment of claims under that treaty, with interest, was constituted, allowed interest, in all cases, for property lost, from the origin of the claim until the day when the commission terminated.

"Other cases might be shown in which the United States has authorized diplomatic agents, here claimed interest in such cases, or where it has been done. (See Mr. Russell's letter to the Count de Eginberg, Paris, 18th Aug., 1845, Am. State Papers, vol. 4, Foreign Relations, p. 738, and proceedings of the United States, vol. 2, Foreign Relations, of October, 1852, Elliott's Dip. Code, page 131.) But I think it can hardly be necessary to pursue this subject further in order to show the proper treatment with foreign nations, or with claimants under treaties.

Judge Bronson then goes on to give the common law rule upon the subject.

"The rule of the common law on this point is the same as that already laid down as the rule of the public international law.

"In the case of Comard against the Pacific Insurance Company, it was stated by Judge Baldwin that, in actions of trespass, or for torts, 'the general rule of damage is the value of the property taken, with interest from the date of taking down to the time of trial. This is generally correct as legal compensation, which refers solely to the injury done to the property taken, and not to any consequential damages resulting to the owner by the injury.' There are taken into consideration only a case of trespass, or tort, or injury, and not any consequential damages. The Supreme Court affirm the correctness of this rule.

"See Baldwin on the Measure of Damages, pp. 549 and 550 says:

"When trespass is brought for personal property, and an circumstance of aggravation are shown, the value of the property, with interest, furnishes the measure of damages."

"In the case of injury to property, the measure of damages is the value of the property at the time of the injury, with interest thereon from that time to the measure of damages, and not to any consequential damages, and in various cases of trespass, trover, case, replevin, &c., this rule is abundantly supported by the following authorities:—Wilson vs. Cooke, 9 Johnston's Rep., p. 208, 94 Greenleaf Evidence, p. 282, and cases there cited;—Particularly 14 Pickering, pp. 245 and 261, 14 Johns. 372; 15 Id., 195, 205, deducted on Damages, 37, 17 Pickering, p. 11; 31 Id., p. 256, 7 Moore, 399; 1 Metcalf, 172; 9 Hall, 131; 3 Dane, 97; 7 Metcalf, 394; 3 Little, 65; Also, Butler vs. Foster, 10 Johns. p. 549, and Boyd vs. 1792, (Am. State Papers, vol. 1, Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 291, 213, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.)

"In fact, this principle must be familiar to every common law lawyer, that it is perhaps true that every common law lawyer, more than to accumulate them, which they are entitled to do almost of themselves. I will only add two or three illustrations, drawn from the cases of United States vs. Smith, where damages were awarded in cases of wrongful taking of property; as part of the damages, by Justice. (See 11 Id., 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 939, 940, 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 954, 955, 956, 957, 958, 959, 960, 961, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 973, 974, 975, 976, 977, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 993, 994, 995, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1000.)

He says further:

"To the course of the argument my attention was called by the well-known letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Hammond, the British Minister, of 26th May, 1792. (Am. State Papers, vol. 1, Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 291, 213, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, man; which was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

MOSES MEEKER.

Mr. WALTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Moses Meeker; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

JAMES PHELAN.

Mr. WALTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of James Phelan; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALTON, I now ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, it is not in order.

GEORGE HALL.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the memorial of George Hall; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the same committee, also reported back the memorial of James Monroe; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I am instructed by the Committee of Claims to make several adverse reports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to the reception, during this hour, of any reports which are not to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, or to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The objection is well taken.

EDWARD JARVIS.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Edward Jarvis; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

SYLVESTER DAY.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (C. C. No. 91) for the relief of the legal representatives of Sylvester Day, late surgeon in the United States Army; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS FILLBROWN.

Mr. HUTCHINS, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Fillbrown; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

DAVID MYERLE.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of David Myerle; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

OLIVER HARRIS.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Oliver Harris; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

HANNIBAL GRAHAM.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Hannibal Graham; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

P. P. HALL.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of P. P. Hall, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to make several adverse reports.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have already objected to receiving any adverse reports during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Adverse reports are not in order. The rule only contemplates the reception of bills.

PETER ROGERSON & SONS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Peter Rogerson & Sons, of St. Johns, Newfoundland, owners of the British brig Jessie; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELIOT, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for light-houses, life-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

TENCH TILGHMAN.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the same committee, reported back a bill (S. No. 79) for the relief of Tench Tilghman; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS HUTTMANN.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, from the same committee, also reported back a bill (S. No. 78) for the relief of Francis Huttman; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ARTHUR EDWARDS AND OTHERS.

Mr. HELMICK, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 221) for the relief of Arthur Edwards and others; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALLEN L. PORTER.

Mr. HELMICK, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Allen L. Porter; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN SCOTT AND OTHERS.

Mr. COLFAX, from the same committee, reported back an act (S. No. 29) for the relief of John Scott, Hill W. House, and Samuel O. House; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES HOOTEN.

Mr. WOODRUFF, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of James Hooten; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS R. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas R. Livingston; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. C. FERRY.

Mr. LEE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of J. C. Ferry, for carrying the mail for one quarter from Pittsburg to Franklin; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ST. JOHN O. GIBBS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of St. John O. Gibbs; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN KELLY.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of John Kelly; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER ALBERTSON.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Alexander Albertson, of Platte county, in the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. DE GROTE.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution for the relief of William H. De Grote; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL NASH.

Mr. BURNETT, from the same committee, also reported back an act (S. No. 63) for the relief of Michael Nash, of the District of Columbia; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DANIEL B. VONDERSMITH.

Mr. HINDMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of the creditors of Daniel B. Vondermuth; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN MOSHER.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Mosher; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARRIET DE LA PALM BAKER.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the children of Mrs. Harriet de la Palm Baker, widow, deceased, daughter and legal heir of the late Lieutenant Colonel Frederick W. Wieseneis, of the army of the Revolution; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL JONES.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain Samuel Jones, of the Virginia continental line during the revolutionary war; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHILDREN OF ISRAEL FISHER.

Mr. DUELL, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the surviving children of Israel Fisher, a revolutionary soldier; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF CAPTAIN HOPPER.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Captain John A. Hopper; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLET'S POINT FORTIFICATION.

Mr. HASKIN, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported a bill to repeal an act for fortifications opposite Fort Schuyler, at Willet's or Wilkin's Point, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSHUA ATKINS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 78.

for the relief of Josiah Atkins, of Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM PACKWOOD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of William Packwood; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BOULIGNY, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, a bill (H. R. No. 118) to confirm certain private land claims in the State of Missouri; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRAXTON BRAGG AND R. L. GIBSON.

Mr. BOULIGNY, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Braxton Bragg and R. L. Gibson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TILMAN LEAKE.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, an act (S. No. 55) for the relief of Tilman Leake, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the Senate report adopted by the committee, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE STALEY.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (S. No. 70) for the relief of George Staley; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIVINGSTON, KINKADEE & CO.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill (S. No. 691) for the relief of Livingston, Kinkadee & Co.; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DEPREDACTIONS UPON THE SHAWNEES.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the same committee, also reported a bill to provide for payment for depredations committed by the whites upon the Shawnee Indians in Kansas Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL T. SIMMONS.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Michael T. Simmons; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which the Committee on Indian Affairs have instructed me to submit to the House, at the instance of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in regard to some contemplated treaty stipulations.

Mr. GROW. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the reception of anything but bills.

ISRAEL JOHNSON.

Mr. LEACH, of Michigan, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Israel Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. EATON.

Mr. STANTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Joseph B. Eaton; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. M'FARREN.

Mr. BUFFINGTON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John C. McFarren, of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HUTCHINSON.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William Hutchinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

METHODIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. JANE M. M'CRABB.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 63, for the relief of Jane M'Crabb, widow of the late Captain John W. M'Crabb, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

Mr. MORSE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 56, for the relief of Richard W. Meade; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. FROST.

Mr. MORSE, from the same committee, also reported back Senate joint resolution No. 77, for the relief of John H. Frost, deceased; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN W. L. HUDSON AND J. K. SANDS.

Mr. SCHWARTZ, from the same committee, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 16, authorizing Captain William L. Hudson and Joseph K. Sands to accept certain testimonials awarded to them by the Government of Great Britain; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY ETING.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 91, for the relief of Henry Eting; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

DAVID D. PORTER.

Mr. POTTLE, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 57, for the relief of David D. Porter; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

HIRAM PAULING.

Mr. POTTLE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Pauling; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill providing for the examination of claims for Indian depredations in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to say that the Committee on Indian Affairs were unanimous in their report of that bill, with the exception of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRACONER.]

DAVID K. WHITING.

Mr. CASE, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the relief of David K. Whiting; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES H. MASON.

Mr. WALDRON, from the same committee, reported back House bill (No. 189) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Charles H. Mason; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

REUBEN AND RHODA H. CHAMPTION.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Reuben and Rhoda H. Champion; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

TOUSANT LA VARNWAY.

Mr. POTTER, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of the children of Toussant La Varnway; which was read a first and second time, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS' HALF PAY.

Mr. POTTER, from the same committee, also reported a joint resolution, giving construction to the second section of the act of February 3, 1860, to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. POTTER. I have been instructed by the committee to ask that this bill be made the special order for next Wednesday week.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly made a special order.

SUBANNAH SCOTT.

Mr. JUNKIN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill granting a pension to Subannah Scott, widow of William Scott; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN FORRESTER.

Mr. BABBITT, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the surviving children of John Forrester, a soldier of the Revolution; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES SAXTON.

Mr. BABBITT, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of James Saxton, a soldier of the Revolution; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES W. BROOKS.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back bill of the House No. 214, for the relief of Charles W. Brooks, of New York; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SETTON M. YOUNG.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Setton M. Young; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SYLVANUS BURNHAM.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Sylvanus Burnham; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BERRIAH WRIGHT.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Berriah Wright; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ZEINA WILLIAMS.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Zeina Williams; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL GOODRICH.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Goodrich; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ISAAC CARPENTER.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting deficiency and increase of pension to Isaac Carpenter; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADAM GARLOCK.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Adam Garlock; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN BURNELL.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Stephen Burnell; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN PIPER.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to John Piper; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY TAYLOR.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Henry Taylor; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATHAN RANDALL.

Mr. FENTON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Nathan Randall; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY J. MADDEX.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Mary J. Maddex; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHAUNCEY W. FULLER.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Chauncey W. Fuller; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT MICHAEL B. CLARK.

Mr. BRABSON, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Michael B. Clark; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANN G. BARKER.

Mr. BRABSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a continuation of pension to Ann G. Barker; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH BLACKWELL.

Mr. BRABSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Sarah Blackwell; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADELINE CADDIS.

Mr. BRABSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Adeline Caddis; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES FLOYD.

Mr. BRABSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of James Floyd; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD DRAZIER.

Mr. FOSTER, from the same committee, reported a bill granting an increased pension to Richard Drazier; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY BENNETT.

Mr. FOSTER, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Mary Bennett; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MICHAEL HANSON.

Mr. FOSTER, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Michael Hanson; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH FILES.

Mr. STOKES, from the same committee, reported a bill granting an increase of pension to Joseph Files; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PHOEBE ANN SHOCKLEY.

Mr. STOKES, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting a pension to Phoebe Ann Shockley; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EZEKIEL JONES.

Mr. STOKES, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an invalid pension to Ezekiel Jones; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM K. BLAIR.

Mr. STOKES. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to ask that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William K. Blair, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. GROW. That cannot come in under the rules, and I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the report cannot be received.

GUSTAVUS B. HORNBER.

Mr. DE JARRETTE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Gustavus B. Hornber, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay, concluded on the 4th of February, 1859, and proclaimed on the 12th instant, and inviting the attention of Congress to the expediency of such legislation as may be deemed necessary; which went into effect the stipulations of the convention relative to the organization of the commission provided therein; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Department of the Interior, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted March 14, 1860, transmitting copies of correspondence on file in that Department relative to the charges made against A. D. Donatelli, United States agent for the Menominee Indians, and informing the House that an investigation was ordered on the 18th ultimo, and that a special agent, Mr. Pritchett, has already left for the Menominee country.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. SIEMMAN. I desire now to call up the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] to reconsider the vote by which certain resolutions introduced by me were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I call now for the execution of the special order of the House, under the previous question. I refer to the amendment of the rules.

Mr. SIEMMAN. The motion to reconsider is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, the Chair is of opinion that the amendment of the rules demands the first attention, as the House made that matter a special order.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following joint resolution: Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the two Houses of Congress do adjourn on the 20th of April next, until the 30th of May next, 1860.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce it.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. SIMMS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a private bill, for reference only.

Mr. DURN. I object.

AMENDMENT OF RULES—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the amendment of the committee on the amendment of the rules to the 17th rule.

The amendment recommended by the committee was as follows:

Amend rule 17 by inserting after the word "States," in the fourth line, the words, "and of the Court of Claims;" so that it will read:

No person, except members of the Senate, their Secretary, Justices of the Supreme Court, President's Private Secretary, the Governor for the time being of any State, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I did, sir. I voted with the majority. I voted under a misapprehension, and therefore it is that I move to reconsider. On that proposition I desire to submit a remark or two.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, as the gentleman must know. The House is acting upon the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Cannot I be permitted to change my vote?

[Loud cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, I move to reconsider, at any rate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion to reconsider.

Mr. McQUEEN. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. STANTON. If the yeas and nays are to be called, let them be called but once, and on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SIMMS. Let us take them on the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McQUEEN. At the instance of some of my friends, I wish the yeas and nays to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STANTON. Now, let us have the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he had better withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider. I have no doubt the vote will be reconsidered, and then we can have a test vote on the main question.

Mr. GROW. It will be a test vote if we refuse to reconsider.

Mr. FLORENCE. That is a dishonest way, in my judgment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I yield to the suggestions of others, and will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion, the gentleman cannot withdraw the call except by unanimous consent.

Several Members objected.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 88, yeas 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Green, Adams, Aldrich, William C. Anderson, Ashley, Ayer, Balliett, Barr, Barrett, Bingham, Blake, Branson, Bryant, Briggs, Burleigh, Burroughs, Butterfield, Chase, John B. Clark, Cobb, Crocker, James Craig, Davidson, Delano, Doell, Edwards, Eitel, English, Etheridge, Florence, Foster, Frank, French, Grosch, Graham, Hamilton, John T. Harris, Hall, Hoad, Holman, Howard, Hughes, Humphrey, Jackson, Jenkins, Kilgore, Kunkel, James M. Leach, Logan, Mallory, E. B. Martin, Maynard, McFarland, Milburn, L. T. Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Nelson, Nimitz, North, Olin, Pendleton, Perry, Ripston, Postle, Rayburn, Briggs, Robinson, Thomas, William Smith, William N. H. Smith, Simmon, James A. Stewart, Stokes, Stout, Tappan, Taylor, Theaker, Train, Underwood, Vallentyne, Vernon, Caldwell, W. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Webster, Wilson, Winslow, Woodruff, and Wood—88.

AYE—Messrs. Allen, Johnson, Barkside, Blair, Bock, Bonham, Boyce, Buffum, Bush, Campbell, Carey, Carter, Clifton, John C. Cleburne, Collins, Cocking, Cox, Cushman, Curran, Crawford, Curry, Davis, John D. Davis, Reuben Davis, Dawes, De la Jarrie, Dunn, Edgerston, Farnsworth, Foster, Francis, Garrett, Gilmer, Hove, Humes, Hutton, Hiram, Horst, Hurling, Jenkins, Jones, Kirk, Francis W. Loring, William H. Lyndon, Keeney, James Lindsey, Lee, Loomis, Love, Lurvey, Mackay, Marston, McKean, McPherson, McQueen, McKee, Rice, Wyndham Moore, Edgerton, J. Morris, Palmer, Pease, Phelps, Post, Rags, Christopher Reade, Trimble, Verme, Walden, Washburn, C. Washburn, Ellis B. Washburn, James Washburn, Veits, Whitely, Winslow, Wood, and Woodruff—94.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call, Mr. GOUCHER stated that Mr. Adams, of Massachusetts, had paired off for to-day with Mr. BARNETT, after this vote.

Mr. ALLEN stated that Mr. COOPER had paired off with Mr. LEACH, of Michigan.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 341) authorizing publishers to print on their papers the date when subscriptions expire.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—AGAIN.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. VALLANDIGHAM to abolish the hour rule, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. SICKLES. Can I be permitted to ask a question of the chairman of the committee on the revision of the rules, to govern my vote? I wish to inquire if there is to be a vote on a proposition to confine debate to the matter in hand?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think that has been decided.

Mr. SICKLES. No; it has not been adopted. I would ask the gentleman if he will agree to a vote on a proposition to strike out from the thirty-second amendment the words "on special orders."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am not authorized to do such a thing.

Mr. ALDRICH. What would be the effect of the adoption of the amendment on which we are about to vote? Would it allow a member to talk two, three, or four hours, or a week?

The SPEAKER. If we abolish the hour rule, a member may talk as long as he pleases.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, yeas 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barr, Blair, Bingham, Bunker, Bonham, Barth, Barnett, Case, John C. Clark, Chapman, John Chace, Cocking, Cobb, James Craig, Barr, Crain, Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Reuben Davis, De la Jarrie, Edgerston, Ferry, Fletcher, Garrison, Hutton, Hickman, Hill, Holman, Houston, Jackson, Jenkins, Jones, Keith, William Kilgore, Kilgore, Kunkel, Anderson, Landman, Logan, Love, Marley, Maynard, McFarland, McKee, Miles, Milburn, Milward, Lahan T. Moore, Wyndham Moore, Nelson, Nimitz, North, Olin, Pendleton, Post, Rags, Quaker, Reagan, Ruffin, Steele, William Smith, William N. H. Smith, Simmon, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Stout, Taylor, Underwood, Vallentyne, Vernon, Caldwell, W. Washburn, Winslow, Woodson, and Wright—80.

AYE—Messrs. Green, Adams, Aldrich, Allen, William C. Anderson, Ashley, Ayer, Balliett, Blair, Black, Bonham, Boyce, Bryant, Briggs, Buffum, Burham, Butterfield, Campbell, Carter, Cobb, Collins, Corcoran, Cox, Curran, John D. Davis, De la Jarrie, Dunn, Edgerston, Edwards, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Frank, French, Garrett, Gilmer, Grosch, Graham, Grosch, Gurley, Hardman, Hove, Humes, Hutton, Hiram, Horst, Hurling, Jenkins, John T. Harris, Hall, Hoad, Holman, Howard, Hughes, Humphrey, Jackson, Jenkins, Kilgore, Kunkel, James M. Leach, Logan, Mallory, E. B. Martin, Maynard, McFarland, Milburn, L. T. Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Nelson, Nimitz, North, Olin, Pendleton, Perry, Ripston, Postle, Rayburn, Briggs, Robinson, Thomas, William Smith, William N. H. Smith, Simmon, James A. Stewart, Stokes, Stout, Tappan, Taylor, Theaker, Train, Underwood, Vallentyne, Vernon, Caldwell, W. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Webster, Wilson, Winslow, Woodruff, and Wood—97.

So Mr. VALLANDIGHAM's amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call, Mr. AVERY stated that he had paired off upon this question with Mr. CORWIN, or he would have voted "no."

Mr. ALLEN, when his name was called, said: "I voted in the proceedings of some recent session, as reported in the Globe, it was announced that I had paired off for this week with Mr. ELY. That is an error. I am not paired with any one. I wish further to say, that Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, in the event of Mr. EBERGAST not requiring a pair, was authorized to pair with me last week upon all votes which might involve party interests, but nothing further."

Mr. POTTLE. I announced the pair, and I did it on the strength of a letter sent by Mr. ELY. That is all I know about it.

Mr. FOSTER stated that he had voted in the affirmative inadvertently. If he could reduce the time to half an hour, he would let the vote stand. If he could not do that, he would vote "no."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment, on which separate vote had been called, was reported as follows:

Amend rule 104, by striking out the words "there shall be appointed a standing committee of this House, to consist of thirteen members, to be called by the Committee on Printing, to whom shall be referred by the Clerk, all bills, resolutions, or other matters which may be referred to the members of the House"; so that it will read:

There shall be referred, by the Clerk, to the members of the Committee on Printing on the part of the House, all bills, resolutions, or other papers, which may be referred to the House before the House for engraving, lithographing, or publishing in any way; which committee shall report to the House whether, in the opinion of the majority, it should be published; and if the House order the publication of the same, that said committee shall direct the size and manner of execution of all such bills, resolutions, or other papers, and contract by agreement, in writing, for all such engraving, lithographing, printing, drawing, and coloring, as may be ordered by the House; which agreement, in writing, shall be furnished by said committee to the Committee of Accounts, to be given said committee in all allowances and appropriations to be done for the House; and said committee to report at all times.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to know whether, if this amendment be voted down, there will be left any authority in contract for the engraving and lithographing to be done for the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there will not be.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the committee repealed the rule constituting the Committee on Engraving; and that, if this amendment be rejected, no committee will have power to contract for engraving or lithographing. Now, sir, I do not want to give any committee the power to make these contracts, without first submitting them for the ratification of the House.

Mr. GROW. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I understand this rule simply abolishes the Committee on Engraving.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is simply a substitution of the Committee on Printing for the Committee on Engraving.

Mr. BURNETT. And abolishes the Committee on Engraving.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to suggest an amendment, by which the committee should be required to let their contracts out to the lowest bidder.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state that this leaves the rule precisely where it was before, with the exception that it transfers the duty of making these contracts to the Committee on Engraving, which is the Committee on Engraving.

The SPEAKER. It gives no new power or authority.

Mr. STANTON. My objection is that no requirement is made that these contracts shall be first submitted to the House for its approval before being completed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is all provided for by law.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that this amendment does not make any change in the power of the committee; it simply transfers the power that now exists to the Committee on Printing, and abolishes the Committee on Engraving.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the permission of the gentleman from Maine to move that the committee to which this matter is referred shall be required to let out these contracts to the lowest bidder.

Mr. GROW. I think the House does not understand the effect of this amendment. The rule in reference to the letting of these contracts remains where it was before. All bills, resolutions, or other matters which may be referred to the members of the House for engraving, lithographing, or publishing in any way, shall be referred to the members of the House; and the House shall order the publication of the same, that said committee shall direct the size and manner of execution of all such bills, resolutions, or other papers, and contract by agreement, in writing, for all such engraving, lithographing, printing, drawing, and coloring, as may be ordered by the House; which agreement, in writing, shall be furnished by said committee to the Committee of Accounts, to be given said committee in all allowances and appropriations to be done for the House; and said committee to report at all times.

Mr. HOUSTON. But I understand the object of the action of the House now to be to make the rules better. While we are making changes in the rules, I think we should improve them as far as possible.

Mr. GROW. This is a matter that should be referred to the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. My object is to have incorporated into the rule a provision that, under the law, shall guard against fraud, corruption, and favoritism.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It is not in order to move any amendment at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, then, to offer the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call attention to the fact that the objection comes from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of order. No debate is in order.

Mr. COX. I should have been through while the gentleman was making his question of order. I merely desire to ask whether this matter of contract is not regulated by law?

Mr. STANTON. I understand that this rule proposes to give the Committee on Printing the power to contract.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman is mistaken. The amendment gives no new power. It simply transfers the power now existing in the Committee on Engraving to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the Committee on Engraving has already been abolished by another rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. It is simply a matter of form. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a single remark to this House.

Mr. STANTON. If there is to be debate upon this question, let us have a chance upon both sides. I call for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURNETT and DAWES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, nays 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The following is the next amendment, on which a separate vote was asked:

Strike out of rule 70 the words "for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government; for the Army; for the Navy; and for the Indian department and Indian annuities," and insert in lieu thereof: "for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for military civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post Office Department; and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; and said committee shall have leave to report such bills, for reference only, at anytime," so that it will read:

"It shall also be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, within thirty days after their appointment, at any time, and at any place, to report to the House, on or before December, to report the general appropriation bills—legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for military civil expenses; for consular and diplomatic expenses; for the Army; for the Navy; for the expenses of the Indian department; for the payment of invalid and other pensions; for the support of the Military Academy; for fortifications; for the service of the Post Office Department; and for mail transportation by ocean steamers; and said committee shall have leave to report such bills, for reference only, at any time, or in failure thereof the reason of such failure."

The amendment was concurred in.

The following is the next amendment on which a separate vote was asked:

Amend rule 59 by striking out at the end of the rule the words "or mile," and inserting in lieu thereof, "or each mile necessarily and actually traveled by such officer or other person in the execution of such precept or summons," so that it will read:

"The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be, for every arrest, the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and imprisonment, one dollar; and for traveling expenses for himself or a special messenger, going and returning, one tenth of a dollar; and for each mile necessarily and actually traveled by such officer or other person in the execution of such precept or summons."

The amendment was concurred in.

The following is the next amendment upon which a separate vote was asked:

Add as a new rule:

All elections of officers of the House, including the Speaker, shall be conducted in accordance with these rules; and the same are applicable to the presiding officer of the House, the Clerk, shall preserve order and decorum, and he shall decide all questions of order that may arise, and he shall appeal to the House.

These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congress, unless otherwise ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

Add as a new rule:

The House shall meet at two o'clock, p. m., until otherwise ordered; but this rule may be suspended at any time during the last ten days of the session, by a majority of the members present, who may then sit upon a different hour of the day for the rest of the session.

Mr. STANTON. I want the House to know that that is not an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but that it is an amendment moved in the House by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN].

The SPEAKER. That is so.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were severally adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONDUCT OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Florence] to reconsider the vote by which, on the 16th of February last, the following resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Expenditures in the Navy Department, and I move that it be laid upon the table.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy has, with the assent of the President, abused his discretionary power in the selection of a coal agent, and in the purchase of fuel for the Government.

Resolved, That the contract made by the Secretary of the Navy, under date of September 23, 1859, with William C. N. Swift, for the delivery of live-oak timber, was made in violation of law, and in a manner manifest, improper, and injurious to the public service.

Resolved, That the distribution, by the Secretary of the Navy, of the patronage in the navy, to its discreditable power in Congress, was destructive of discipline, corrupting in its influence, and highly injurious to the public service.

Resolved, That the President and Secretary of the Navy, by receiving and considering the party relations of bidders for contracts with the United States, and the effect in the minds of the public upon pending elections, have acted in a manner dangerous to the public safety, and deserving the reprobation of the House.

Resolved, That the appointment, by the Secretary of the Navy, of Daniel B. Martin, chief engineer, as a member of a board of engineers to report upon proposed machinery for the United States, the said Martin, as the then, being particularly interested in some of said proposals, is hereby disapproved by this House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am willing that that course shall be pursued.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the question in reference to the Military Academy bill be now disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the report from the Committee on Elections, in the case of Williamson against Sickles.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. What becomes of my motion, that the rules be suspended in order that a resolution I have just read at the Clerk's desk be introduced? It is a resolution for a recess in April.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion when made was not in order, and it was not entertained. The reference of the Military Academy bill is the first question now in order.

Mr. DAWES. I believe that my motion has precedence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that the question of reference of the Military Academy bill is the first to be considered.

Mr. DAWES. Do I understand the Chair to decide that any motion made here is of higher privilege than the motion I now make in respect to the right of a member to his seat?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the Military Academy bill, having come in upon a common consent, must be first disposed of, and that it is not in order to interrupt it by other business. A motion was submitted that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and that it was moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion first made was that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs was submitted subsequently.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs was made as an amendment to the motion to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means, and the question must first be taken upon that amendment. Such has been the practice under the rules of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not wish to debate the proposition at this time, but merely to make a statement which I deem it proper should be in the possession of this House before it decides this question of reference. I regret, sir, of course, that the House should be embarrassed by any difference between the chairmen of the respective committees. The amendment of the Senate concerns the military department of this Government. The subject of that amendment has already been under consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee will be better able, from the information it possesses, to report on the amendment, and to report sooner than probably any other committee of this House. I trust sincerely that the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; for that committee, I repeat, have already had the subject under consideration.

Mr. WINSLOW. What is the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. REAGAN. The Senate attached to the Military Academy appropriation bill an amendment making an appropriation to enable the President to call into the service of the United States a regiment of mounted Texas volunteers for the defense of the Texas frontier, if in his discretion their service is required.

Mr. WINSLOW. The whole question, then, is as to the propriety of adding a new regiment to the force for the defense of the Texas frontier.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then, sir, I think it is a matter appropriate to the Committee on Military Affairs—one pertinent to the duties that committee is required under the rules to discharge.

Mr. MORRILL. I have been meeting here a statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Stanton] when this question was before the House before. It will be recollected that he stated upon that occasion that the Senate had referred the Military Academy bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am now glowing at the proceedings of the Senate, though that was the fact, it was a mere inadvertence; and the action was reconsidered, and the bill was referred unanimously to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, that I was surprised that the gentleman from Ohio should make a second onslaught upon this subject. So far as my experience goes, I am perfectly willing that he should have a second overhauling of this question. I believe the action of the House will be to adhere to its previous action.

In reference to this matter particularly, there is no special haste, as I see by a telegraphic report in the Government newspaper, the Constitution, that the war upon the Texan frontier is already settled.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Vermont will allow me to say a word just here. It is a fact that there is such an urgent necessity for speedy action as makes us solicitous that this matter should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will state to the gentleman from Vermont that the dispatch which he refers to does not have reference to the Indian hostilities which have been pending over us for a number of years; but it has reference to the movements of Cortinas, who, the officer sending this dispatch seems to think, has suspended his hostilities.

But in reference to that I would state that Cortinas commenced his operations by committing a number of murders in the city of Brownsville, upon this side of the Rio Grande. He then collected his forces upon this side of that river, and remained there until he was ordered to return to his lost city. He then withdrew his forces to the other side of the Rio Grande, on Mexican territory. His troops were Mexicans, and his banner was Mexican, not American. From that side he attacked an American steamer, passing up the Rio Grande, and some Texas rangers came to the rescue, and fought him upon the opposite side of the river. They then returned to this side of the river upon United States soil. Cortinas continued his depredations by smaller bands, driving the inhabitants from their homes and destroying their property. Recalled to the Senate, the adjournment of the State Legislature, returned to his home upon the Rio Grande, and found his plantation destroyed, his houses burned, and his property all gone. I refer to Senator Hoard.

Mr. Dougherty, one of the representatives from Hidalgo county, also returned home to find all his property gone, and his possessions burned down. This thing has gone on until the question on the Rio Grande has become almost depopulated. No planting will be done this spring upon the Rio Grande, and some Texas rangers came to the rescue, and fought him upon the opposite side of the river. They then returned to this side of the river upon United States soil. Cortinas continued his depredations at an end. They are temporarily suspended, and may be renewed at any time.

I could answer the gentleman's reference to that dispatch, by referring to another, stating that Miramon had dispatched instructions to Cortina to hold out until he could send him succor in April. The dispatch may not be correct, but it is one of the rumors which has received currency in connection with this subject.

But the purpose for which I rose was not particularly to dwell upon our difficulties with Mexico, though I may say the further fact, that ours is a boundary between two nations; a boundary upon which there is hostility of feeling; a boundary upon which adventures of our own countrymen congregate, and upon which Mexican smugglers congregate. So there is sufficient necessity for a force there to overawe these elements upon the Mexican frontier. With proper detachments of artillery and dragoons from the regular Army, these evils might be remedied and the peace preserved. But I believe that unless a sufficient force, under the direction of a discreet officer, is placed upon that frontier, there is imminent danger that the two nations will be involved in war—a thing to be deprecated and avoided by all.

But it seems to be supposed, since there is a great deal of talk about our difficulties with Mexico, that that is the sole or controlling object we have in view in making for the frontier. If that opinion prevails, it is erroneous. It is true, and ought to be known, and doubtless is known to members of the House who were here last session—for I made the best presentation of the subject I could, during that session. There is no continuing state of hostilities upon the borders of Texas for the last four or five years. It is true, though it seems not to be comprehended, that during the last eighteen months we have had two bloody battles with the Indians, in each of which more than seventy Indians fell, and a number of whites.

It is also true—and the fact appears in the documents in the War and Interior Departments—that hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property has been stolen from the people by the Indians; that there is no doubt in which some of the people of that frontier are not killed or carried away into captivity, and their property destroyed or carried away. There is a universal sense of insecurity and danger. Earnest appeals come by every mail to the Senators and Representatives from the State, requiring that the Government will not afford them protection. Why, sir, within the last six weeks, and within one hundred miles of the State capital, four Indians were attacked by Indians, and carried into captivity. Two of them were found by the parents of the Indians dead; the other two have not been heard from. In a neighborhood close by, two other Indians were captured; a portion of their clothes were found, but they themselves were carried into captivity. Now the correspondence in the War Department and Interior Department shows that these are continual occurrences.

It is answered, that we have a regular force upon that frontier; and it may be said that the regular Army is sufficient to afford us protection. Now, I wish to state that when the Mormon difficulty broke out, the military force we had was the cavalry. Those troops were ordered to Utah. My colleague at that time in this House, and the Senators from Texas in the other end of the Capitol, entered a solemn written protest with the Secretary of War against that removal, representing that our people were being murdered, and their property destroyed. And even when they were there, they were inadequate to our protection.

From 1855 up to this time, I wish it understood by the House, the several Governors of Texas, in answer to continued applications for troops upon the frontier for protection, have ordered company after company into the field to protect that exposed and defenseless frontier. Our State incurred hundreds of thousands of dollars' expense. We applied last Congress for a reimbursement of a portion of that expense, and we were paid only $55,000 out of an expenditure of $185,000. The State has had to go on spending additional sums of money in order to give protection to life and property there.

If the murders committed on the frontier of Texas in one single month were committed on the borders of Pennsylvania and Virginia, this whole nation would be horrified at the fact of such murders. Yet because our people are far removed from the Federal capital; because you cannot see their blood flowing on the soil; because it is not your wives and your children that are being murdered or carried into captivity; because it is not your property that is being stolen, you do not seem to realize that there is a necessity for frontier defenses. It is but the cavalry arm of the service that is of any use in defending the people against Indian hostilities. Artillery cannot be brought to operate against the Indians, and the cavalry is the only force that can be brought to bear. The Indians understand that; for they will come into the immediate vicinity of infantry and commit depredations, and murders, and outrages on our women and children. They know that, with the slow movements of infantry, they can commit crimes with impunity.

The Indians must be dealt with in a different manner. The Government has tried treaties with them. It has tried to civilize them. It has furnished them with reserves, in order to encourage them to cultivate land and become civilized. But still these warriors went on. Then the Government made an effort to remove the Indians from the reserves in Texas, to a country secured for that purpose on the north side of the Red River. But this only seemed to exasperate them. They return from there and commit their depredations; and the Government is stated in a paper, that arrived by the last mail from the frontier, that there were one hundred and fifty Indians advancing on the frontier of the Upper Brazos. The people were greatly alarmed at the danger of attack, and were preparing to fight. The people here are hardly being able to get the Government to incur additional expense, are now organizing companies for their defense. But I submit that it is not just to require them to abandon their homes and their crops, and the immediate protection of their families, in order to defend themselves. It is the duty of the Government to give them protection. Humanity and justice demand protection for them.

There is one other point of view, Mr. Speaker, which I must not omit to mention, before closing the few remarks that I am submitting. It is this: In the present emergency, the Government's hostilities must be pressed against the Indians by a force of a character and capacity to pursue them to their haunts upon the plains and rivers north of us, chastise them there, and visit there on them the effects of their continual marauding on our lives and property. That is the only way to find repose. For that purpose, sir, it is necessary, as all men acquainted with the nature and character of military defenses understand, to put in pursuit of them in the spring, or early part of the summer, light, active men; troops, actually, not from frontier life, acquainted with the habits and mode of warfare of the Indians—troops that can pursue them, and that can and will punish them.

It is for this reason that we think and feel satisfied—and in this the experience of all men acquainted with frontier life accords with what I say—that if the Government give the desired regiment, and give it promptly, let it be mustered into service in time, and make a campaign this spring and summer, the Indians can be chastised, and can be driven to the necessity of suspending their hostilities for the time. The President, in signing this bill, disband the troops so soon as the necessity for their services ceases to exist. I think that a single campaign of six months will secure repose on the frontier; but that will not be sufficient time, unless they may, under the bill passed by the last Congress, in his discretion, continue the service for eighteen months. It is for the full period of eighteen months that appropriations are proposed to be made.

I beg gentlemen not to let mere prejudice, in answer to the question, ought we to consider this matter, control their action. I beg them not to consider it in a merely partisan light; but as citizens of this Government, who have high duties to perform as Representatives of the people, and are to be held responsible for the proper performance of those duties. I beg them, in their consideration, to transfer themselves and their families to a frontier attacked by hostile savages. Let them imagine their families stricken down; their wives carried into captivity; their children torn from the arms of their parents, and raised up as captives in Indian barbaries. Let them think of their families lost under such circumstances, and I am persuaded they will consent to have the State of Texas protected. It is to be borne in mind that the frontier extends from Red river of northern Texas, by its meanderings, many hundred miles, till it reaches the Rio Grande; and that, by affording protection in this way to the population of the frontier, the regular forces can be transferred to the Rio Grande country to keep the peace between Mexico and the United States.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that as the Committee on Military Affairs has already before it two propositions for the consideration of the House, it will give attention call to this matter, and will doubtless have to go deeply into its investigation; and as this amendment relates to military defenses, and involves the necessity of investigating the condition of our frontier defenses, the control of the subject will be given to that committee. I trust that the amendment makes an appropriation; but that appropriation is merely incident to the necessity that gives rise to it. I propound the question to the Committee of Ways and Means as to whether that committee can devote sufficient of its time to this matter. That committee has most important duties. It is charged with the most onerous and severe duties of all the other committees of the House. Will it consent to take up the papers in connection with this matter, and consider the necessities of our military defenses, and the military questions involved in this matter, the consideration of which I apprehend the Committee of Ways and Means would find incompatible with their other duties. I have no idea as to what view of this question the Committee of Ways and Means will take. I am sure from any preconceived notion as to whether that committee may report favorably or unfavorably that I ask for the reference of this matter to it. It is because that committee has already the subject before it, and will make the necessary report to the House, that I feel that I am sure it is disposed to rely on that report, going into the facts of the case and showing whether the appropriation ought or ought not to be made.

I trust, therefore, that the matter will be permitted to take that direction, in order that we may have the speedy, prompt action upon it which the emergency requires.

Mr. COX. In speaking to the motion to refer the bill and amendment under consideration, I premise that, before that vote can be intelligently taken, our relations with Mexico must be considered. The military question involved in the bill, and the consideration of which I have the honor to say that the Committee of Ways and Means have not the leisure to devote to this consideration, the Military Committee, which has before it the facts connected with the movements on our Mexican border, should devote its time to a full examination of the subject, and I am sure that this discussion of our relations with Mexico is inappropriate on this motion, I say that the late news from Vera Cruz, before which Miramon is now hovering with his army, and the projected armistice tendered by England to the belligerents, are so important that at no other point of the Mexican boundary should these relations be complicated. Mexicans and Indians are devastating the Rio Grande country. The Governor of Texas asks Federal aid. If it be not granted, he threatens to conquer a peace on Mexican soil. A war between the United States and Mexico would not only embarrass the relations of this country with respect to the late treaty; but it concerns the honor and interests of our citizens commorant in Mexico.

Europe has her continental politics; America has hers. England sends ambassadors, and France armies, to Italy; the one to forestall and foil Austria, the other to fight her; and both to rescue Italy, as well from her invaders as from her own immolation. We have our Italy. Not alone is Mexico our Italy by her natural beauty, her position, soil, and climate, but she is our Mexico by her political Italy. She is torn to shreds by those who are fighting over the parts of her garments.

Such is the present condition of Mexico; and such is our interest in it, that we cannot be careless of her. We are bound to her by the ties of those cases of great public distress which lie at our very doors. We cannot avoid seeing it. It is in our path, as an obstruction to our progress and a menace to our peace. Self-interest, if not republican sympathy, demands from us for Mexico our vigorous help.

Mr. BOYCE. Mexico is our "sick man."

Mr. COX. Yes; she is to America what Turkey is to Europe. If she be not healed of her wounds and set upright on her progressive path, term—Vittoria, her first President, and Herrera, at the close of our war with Mexico. But these happy exceptions can hardly be called such, when we remember their perils and troubles, their antagonists with pronunciamentos, and their wars to put down insurgents.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman is surely not in order in discussing the whole Mexican question on this motion to refer.

Mr. COX. If my colleague will hear me through, he may see the application of what I intend to make to the question before us. I do not intend to obtrude my views. I was advised by the best parliamentarians here that such a discussion was in order. I proceed.

The history of this era is but the placement and displacement of presidents—the match and counter-march of generals. A President who is absent from the capital is compelled to fight his way back to the palace; when once in the palace, he has no rest till he marches forth again against his enemies out of the city. The civilian has continually a sword in his hand and a foot in the stirrup. A junta meets in Puebla or Ayuda, and lo! a new constitution and a new Executive! One day it is "Méjora le General!" the next, if it is not killed, it is "Viva le General!" These vicissitudes continue for more than a century of a century—may, for a half century, be the first struggle, in 1809—with five consecutive years of repose. The fields of Mexico have been fertilized with the blood, bone, and muscle of her children. Intestine feuds, more infuriate than foreign invasions, have done their prey and broken her hopes. During this period, she was twice attacked by Spain, once by France, and once conquered by the United States. Yet, with her marauding Indians, her thieving Iperos, her internal feuds, and her foreign invasions, her energy has been wonderful; her resources and her resources seem inexhaustibly bountiful. What might she not become, under a liberal protection given to her industry, her commerce, and her property!

Our third speech opens on the 5th of February, 1857, when, at an extraordinary Congress called for that purpose—and nomine contraindiente—the present constitution was adopted. Comfort be to its Executive. His policy, which was that of a trimmer between the two parties, led to his quitting the post on the 11th of January, 1858. By the seventy-ninth article of the constitution, the president of the supreme court of justice became the President of the Republic. Benito Juárez then held the presidency of the supreme bench, and became de jure chief Executive of the nation.

Before Juárez could assume his functions at the capital, Félix Zuloaga, under the "plan of Tacubaya," proclaimed by a body of soldiers who had the tenacity, without the dignity of the Roman Pretorians, usurped the office of President. Force drove Juárez from State to State, until he found himself compelled to flee to the United States, where he landed at Panama to Vera Cruz, where he now administers his office with cabinet of unsurpassed intelligence and patriotism. He demanded the allegiance of the various States, and he received it from all, except a few in the valley and neighborhood of Mexico. I do not think he still retains that allegiance; and that notwithstanding all the changes of the contest since the summer of 1858, he is President in fact as well as in form.

In November, 1858, Zuloaga was deposed by the same power which has set him up—a usurpation aided by mercenary troops, mercenary merchants and mercenary ministers. One of his Generals, Miguel Miramón, young, impetuous, successful, and more plant to the purposes of the masters of the capital, supersedes Robles, who had for two days usurped the usurping Zuloaga's power.

For the past year these parties have not changed their relative strength a great deal, either with respect to the various States or their military occupation. The Liberal and Centralist parties are there. Miramón defeats Degollada at Querétaro, but he loses as he leaves this and that city behind him, in his forward march. When Miramón leaves Mexico to threaten Vera Cruz, a half dozen generals march toward Mexico to arrest him. I suppose a year ago, that Juárez had a majority of the States and nine tenths of the people. He had more, and he has retained all that he had. Let me try and give a clear picture of this Mexican "situation" by figures and facts, corrected by close observation. From it, will be seen that Miramón is confined mainly to three central States—Querétaro, Puebla, and Mexico—with a temporary and violent occupation of a few places outside. At the coast and frontier, with the custom-houses and ports, are held by Juárez. From these are the revenues. There are eight of these custom-houses on the Gulf, five on the Pacific, and eight on the frontiers. Merchandise, silver, or bullion can enter or depart from the country, unless by smuggling or by consent of the Juárez government. Miramón is hemmed into a small area, and is supported, willingly, but by a very inconsiderable population. Let me present the condition of things, as they now are, in a tabular form:

States.	Population.		Square leagues.
	Miramón.	Juárez.	Miramón.	Juárez.
Aguascalientes	-	90,000	-	398
Coahuila	-	70,000	-	2,947
Chihuahua	-	100,000	-	5,598
Durango	-	160,000	-	10,000
Guanajuato	600,000	100,000	1,545	6,741
Hidalgo	-	270,000	-	1,302
Jalisco	800,000	100,000	3,721	2,971
Mexico	1,200,000	600,000	8,432	4,318
Nuevo Leon	-	150,000	-	3,918
Oaxaca	-	500,000	-	6,000
Queretaro	600,000	100,000	1,733	609
San Luis Potosi	-	400,000	-	3,914
Sonora	-	100,000	-	10,000
Sonora	-	180,000	-	12,340
Tlaxcala	-	70,000	-	1,719
Tehuacan	-	100,000	-	1,719
Vera Cruz	-	200,000	-	3,501
Yucatan	-	450,000	-	8,601
Zacatecas	-	100,000	-	2,972
Y. California	-	12,000	-	276
Colima	-	70,000	-	677
Guerrero	-	10,000	-	364
Rierra Gorda	-	50,000	-	1,489
Tehuacan	-	30,000	-	364
Tlaxcala	-	100,000	-	1,719
	3,990,000	4,264,000	15,762	99,290

It will be seen that I have given Miramón five States of small area, and of comparatively dense population. I have given Miramón Querétaro, Puebla, and Jalisco, because he holds their capitals, now threatened by his enemies. I have given Miramón Puebla and Querétaro, although Juárez holds some of the towns in each. It would be fair (especially as even one town of Mexico, Tehuacan, is held by Juárez, and as some towns in Vera Cruz are held by Miramón, and as he is besieging its capital by his forces) to divide these first four States between the parties.

This would leave in the hands of Juárez, States having 5,235,000 population, and 1,044.35 square leagues; leaving Miramón 2,708,000 population, and 105.07 square leagues; leaving 2,530,000 of population, and 939.26 of square leagues in favor of Juárez, on a fair computation.

But this geographical and popular element in his favor is utterly useless for government in a country where rapine is the order and the order the exception, unless Juárez is aided by extraneous force and means. I am assured of the fact that he is able to hold his own, including Vera Cruz; while Miramón, since he has left the capital, holds only a few towns, by a precarious tenure. The rumors, that Marquez and Wolf have pronounced against him, and for Santa Anna.

We are apt to draw our analogies from France, and argue that as Paris is held so is France; that the revolution of the capital is that of the empire. The analogy does not hold. France is a centralized Power; Mexico a federative Government. Our own nation will serve as a better illustration. It would hardly follow that a usurper holding Washington city and parts of Maryland and Virginia and Delaware, with no sea-ports, no custom-houses, no revenues, nothing but the soldiers of the District, could be called the Government de facto, while all the rest of the country preserved the form, spirit, and functions of the Federal Government at Cincinnati or New Orleans. Nor would the recognition of such a Government, by France or England, make it, de facto, the Government. In Mexico, France and England have hitherto held the Central junta to be the Government de facto. Their ostensible reason is, that it is at the capital. England, however, is about to withdraw such recognition, inasmuch as she has found it utterly irresponsible, cruel, rapacious, tyrannical, and barbarous towards her own citizens, even as it has been towards American citizens.

But it may be asked, "if the Juárez Government is so strong in area of territory, population, sea-coast and frontier, why does it not vindicate its authority by the capture of the capital, and stopping these depredations on foreign and domestic interests, lives, and liberty?" This question deserves a fair answer. Our answer is, that the minority are richer than the majority. It can buy the Pretorians. The spurious government is enabled to raise money, because it has intrigued with the French Minister, Gashin, and with the former English Minister, Otway, who were the tools of speculators and bankers. Consequently avarice and greed have beaten patriotism and honesty. The national securities of Juárez go unsung in the market, and bring only a nominal per cent; while the Central securities, guaranteed by foreign conventions, enable that faction to borrow at a fair per cent. Thus have the Centralists kept up their army, corrupted leaders and agents, and swept the land, leaving behind them nothing but insecurity, anarchy, and devastation. What towns or cities they hold is by force and fear; not fairly and respect. With all these advantages to the Central government, the nation is not with them. The Constitutional party has risen defeated at the important point, it is true—in April last, before the city of Mexico, and in November last, near Querétaro. But they now hold all of the northern half of Mexico, and more than half of the southern portion. They have made themselves masters of the entire Pacific coast, including Tehuacan, where Miramón held for a while. They have successfully resisted Miramón's attack on Vera Cruz; and will resist successfully his present attack, if they do not also wrest the capital from him, while he is attempting to take Vera Cruz. This rightful government will maintain itself in the field, as it can in the forum of the lex gentium, against the incivism and outrages of its opponents.

Which government is the one for our recognition and support? That is easily determined from the facts I have said. As Mexico, in April last, was thus determined. He has given us a final solution by the treaty now before the Senate.

The present Administration displays a wise, cautious, and just statesmanship, in urging the ratification of the treaty. It has been made with great care and anxiety. The President is reported to have said that the salvation of Mexico depends upon its ratification. I believe it, with all the earnestness of studious conviction.

That treaty concedes to us a safe transit and right of way across Mexico on three lines: one across the Gulf States, one across the States of Sonora and Chihuahua, and one across the States of Sonora and Mazatlan. It authorizes us to lend the naval and military forces of this Government to the Constitutional authorities, at their expense, in order to execute the treaty. Thus we are, in the language of international law, to be considered as allies with the Juárez government, and with power to execute the right. This power, if executed, will end these convulsions of Mexico. By a territorial abrogation, Mexico has given us a foothold upon her soil which cannot be used but for her peace, development, and prosperity.

If this House will observe the articles placed upon the free list by that treaty, they will perceive the ample scope of intercourse which it offers to every part of our country. The Ohio farmer will find a market for his wheat in the Gulf States, as well as the planter of cotton on the Gulf, whose great staple will find a larger market. The iron interest of the Middle States, and the manufacturing interest of New England, are alike the recipients of its results. We may regain the trade with Mexico, which we lost in 1850 to 1851, when $46,000,000 were exported thither, against only $18,000,000 from 1840 to 1850! We will do more. Since then, we have carved out empires on the Pacific; and the far Orient of China and Japan has given us treasures of intercourse. Our commerce from Mexico, being unburdened with transit duties, will go north to our possessions on the Pacific, south along the South American coast, and westward to this Orient—the golden Cathay of Columbus—where our enterprise can play upon every key of traffic, and thus upon every spring of intercourse. Thus will be returned to Mexico, through our Agency, that affluent commerce which, in her early colonial day, made Acapulco the Venice of the New World, and the stately galleons of Cadiz the armada of the world's envy. Our empire's spirit, the world's commerce, the world's peace, or rather the life warrant to Mexico. I trust it may be confirmed by the Senate, as it is by the good sense of the country. I am ready, as one of the Representatives of the people, to vote the $1,000,000 required to give us the foothold at the Gulf, and the economic terms. I look upon that foothold as not only preventive of all European interference, but, if you please, as the thin end of an entering wedge into Mexico. It is the herald to a circuit of empires all round the Gulf by the magic of a steam marine; and in a coronation of the new States to this Federation, whose wealth and brilliancy will far outshine the gold of California and the silver lodes of Washoe!

It was urged as an objection against the acquisition of Texas that the commercial emporium of the New World was to be transferred from New York to New Orleans. How ill-founded are these fears! The freedom and expansion of our commerce, and the acquisition of territory, have only magnified and glorified New York; and a similar enlargement would have the same result to-day. New York is the nature and order, the pulse and heart; and anything that affects her, affects the minutest nerve at the extremity of the Republic. If adversity visits the South or North, East or West, New York feels it. The present treaty would add another element to its wealth, power, and grandeur.

Two millions of the four are to be in trust for the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens against Mexico. These claims can never be adjusted, much less paid, under either of the Mexican Governments, unless Mexico parts with some valuable interest, by which she can raise what ought to be paid to our citizens.

It is a shame upon the American name among the Spanish republics, that our citizens are utterly remediless for all their wrongs, suffered at the hands of a free and irresponsible power. Especially in Mexico have we caused our people for outrages the most atrocious, and butcheries the most bloody and treacherous. In drawing the picture of this mutilated Republic before an American Congress, that part reserved for the American citizen in Mexico, the picture is the blackest and the darkest shadows. These outrages are partly owing to the false and prejudicial statements everywhere circulated against our name, since the Mexican war, by the Monarchical party. Since the McLane treaty, these stories have recovered the ravest tones of Mexican bragado. As a consequence, the wildest denunciations of American citizens are indulged in; so that no respect is shown, or protection given, by any class, even to the official representatives of our country, where the Miramon government presides, even where the Central Government holds away in there that safety and protection to our interests demanded by international law. One year ago I was compelled by the facts to picture Mexico as debilitated, helpless, bleeding, wringing—a land of rapacity, crime, and fraud, licentiousness, and brutality; indolence only active to wrong, and industry quickened only to vice; laws made for their infraction, and order established to be contemned. Mountain then cried out valley for relief; and from hacienda to city the wail was heard. The picture is the same in Mexico, in whose fate no nation can ever have the interest we have till such a nation conquer us. I was compelled then to ask the question, Who shall intervene? And now, with more earnest emphasis, I ask again: if we do not, who will intervene? The picture then, the picture has received added tints of gloom, and more bloody hues of horror. It should be painted by a Rembrandt in chiaroscuro. Let me hold it to the light, if it is not too appalling! Villages deserted; cities in terror and dismay; farms in ruin; the arriero no longer drives loaded mules, the vaquero no longer finds no field safe enough for his lazy life, and his herds and flocks; families in mourning, orphanage and misery; gibbeted at each cross-road; death-crowns lining the highways; a torrent of blood flowing from cowardly assassination; prisons choked with their rotting victims; the lepers prowling for human prey; guerillas scouring the country; and the ruins thereof only hidden by the rank weeds and luxuriant parasites which the rich land has produced as a garment to cover the shame, confusion, neglect, spoliation and decay. Another year, and the skeleton famine will stalk through the streets, and the victims equal in number to the American and foreign residents has been thrown off. The thin guise and specious pretext are no longer exhibited as the apology for crime, rapacity, and wrong. Do you want instances? Read the cruel murder of Chasé, to which the President refused. What enormity can equal this diabolical craft and cruelty! Go to Tacubaya, with that blood-spotted Marquez—the Nena Sahib of Mexico—as its butcher. From that scene of cowardice and carnage, if from no other, rises the cry of vengeance against the blood-hounds who tore from the sick beds of the hospital the humane American and English physicians, and amid horrible execrations, which made hell laugh, took the lives which were dedicated to the sublime and Christ-like duties of healing and kindness. A brilliant young surgeon, my own reason, one of my Democratic predecessors, Dr. Olds—was one of the victims of that Mexican butchery; from which no employment, however benignant, could exempt the American citizen. "Were I a Mexican, as I am an American," I would, as the first act of revenge, take and render, the same retribution for blood at the hands of these butchers of Tacubaya. Degollada, by his orders of the 17th of April, recited these cold-blooded and merciless assassinations, and declared that all officers of the enemy, taken in arms, should be executed immediately. What is a bloody index to the character of the war. The superintendent of that massacre, Daza y Arguelles, happily for even Mexican humanity, was taken prisoner by Carrvajal, in December last, was shot, and his disfigured body hung up for the hoodlums of even a Mexican republic.

Lately, in the palace of Miramon, Marquez, while there as a guest, had the brutality to strike down the old French lady, Madame Gouges, for enacting the part of Florence Nightingale at this hour of our misdeeds. The same Marquez was imprisoned, by the jealousy of Miramon, along with hundreds of other, but better men, who are now dying in the prisons of Mexico, or working in its prisiones with ball and chain. It is to be hoped Marquez will meet with his reward. Recently, when the Central Government, General Wall, has been imitating Coronado and Rojas at Tepic, by filching all the money he could from foreign merchants, and inflicting all the horrors he could upon the English and American victims! After imposing all sorts of new taxes, and making the merchants repay to him all the duties and taxes of the preceding thirteen months, he resorted to imprisonment and death as the means of enforcing his detestable avarice. He even threatened the British Consul for not complying with his demands. He has taken the gold and silver of the British Consul to the Pacific coast from Zacatecas. It has in its care some four million dollars, the hard earnings of English and American residents. It pays the duty on its departures; it reaches Guadalupe; it pays Marquez robe it of $600,000, and justifies this grand larceny by the necessity of his situation and his service to the cause of good government! Meanwhile the other brigand, Miramon, decrees another forced loan—only for this once, to fill the foreigner and the Englishman with horror. The Central Government of six compulsory loans since the third epoch began! Englishmen, Americans, and other foreigners are forced to pay the expenses of the very system of extortion by which they are crucified between these thieves of Mexico. Take the best instance of this extortion, the Central Government's, which even confounded Lord John Russell. Juarez collects the customs duties at Vera Cruz, which Miramon pledges to foreign nations. The export duty on the staple product, silver, is collected by Miramon in the interior, and the duty on goods is collected on the coast. Neither government has the means to support itself without either spoliation or extraordinary exactions, or by the barter of valuable rights and interests.

Would that I could catalogue the crimes of this curled cabal of the capital. But where begin? Where end? Shall I begin with the murder of poor Crabbe and his companion, one of General Chasé, by Marquez? Or of the American officer taken prisoner with Alvarez, at Queretaro? Or the imprisonment and assassination of political offenders, by Corona, at Zacatecas, Cordova, Jalapa, and Orizaba? How can I rehearse the robberies of the bodies of the American soldiers? The violation of flags of truce; the destruction of haciendas; the Indians flying before these rapacious soldiers like a herd of mustangs? Or of Bombastes Cortinas, who derisively and defiantly steals the United States mail, and hangs them, with the riders of the bodies of the American soldiers near his fort, above Brownsville; plays both judge and jury on American citizens, within eight miles of Fort Brown, where he lately made his ranch the nest of his robbers and their plunder?

These are but isolated acts, involving, it is true, loss of life, liberty, and property, by American citizens. But there are more important transactions, showing an overruling necessity for our prompt interference. Let me give you one. Juarez holds Vera Cruz, and receives the revenues. His government is not recognized by the United States Government. He is, however, a Frenchman, and his minister, Gabric, by threatening Vera Cruz with French guns, compelled Juarez to pay off the French debt of $1,000,000. Recently we hear that an addition of $460,000 of this old-paid-off French-convention debt is to be enforced against the revenues of the Vera Cruz Government. The condition is the result of Gabric's reclamation for French moneys stolen from the conducts by this same robber government at the capital, which Gabric smiles upon. Gabric and his bankers are to get their percent, if he can only give the French seat at Vera Cruz while Miramon holds it by land. If, by French aid, Miramon takes Vera Cruz, what then becomes of our American interests and citizens there? Is it Tacubaya over again? Forced loans, pillage, rapine, and murder?

Already our American people have marched to meet Vera Cruz, before he had reached the sierras calcadas, the constitutional bands were prowling through the central States, making reprisals upon the property of wealthy Spaniards, and upon the conducts under the protection of Miramon's government. The Central Government, in 1859, when Miramon threatened Vera Cruz, was again transpiring. Our Rio Grande frontier is desolated with fire and sword, from Tamoules to Chihuahua. Texas, through Governor Houston, is asking the President for his order to protect our citizens. The Central Government is to the frontier, and, by a practical protestation, some repose and security to northern Mexico. Only last month, Chihuahua was overrun by one of Miramon's generals, Cosen, with a band of pardoned felons. The grossest outrages on women and men were perpetrated. The Americans were driven out, and were compelled to leave a million dollars' worth of property at the mercy of the robbers. They sent to vain to Fort Smith for our troops. Their authorities joined in the request for our intervention. The Central Government, with a thousand cut-throats, is marching towards its capital. You can picture the pillage which will result! These are facts just brought to us by Mr. McManus, of my own State, who was compelled to leave his home and interests in Mexico. And now, if Vera Cruz too be endangered, who is there that will not hail the star-spangled banner flying from the battlements of San Juan de Uluca, as a triumphant emblem of the victory of commerce and civilization over craft and barbarism?

Recently I have seen that the Miramon government, in their atreca, have put into the market a new batch of bonds. Mexico is to be added by this Government with $15,000,000 more of debt, which, added to the $20,000,000 created in July last, leaves in Miramon's hands the $35,000,000 of paper debt, foisted on beggared Mexico in five months! Besides this, there are millions of contracts and reclamations unsecured, arising out of spoliations of foreigners. To these is to be added the debt of Mexico, foreign and domestic, amounting in April, 1857, to a total of $10,000,000, which $63,393,165 is secured by a certain percentage on the revenues of Mexico, to the English and other bondholders. Then add the millions on millions of ruin heaped on this country by these ambitious and rapacious chiefs, not alone for arms and equipments, but in the losses to labor and in the idleness consequent upon inactivity and violence. Put these all together, and see the rent land struggling and writhing and wringing its hands in wailing and woe, and you have the poorest of national Samaritans, whom to go over and relieve is the highest duty of a Christian nation.

If our Government fail in its duty now, one thing will happen, and that is, the sudden apparition of Houston, with ten thousand Texans, in northern Mexico. Such movements are as irrepressible as fate. They may even be less responsible than the more reckless than Houston's project. I know that such movements are now in process of organization. They may have a peaceful appearance. They are led by the "Knights of the Golden Circle," whose mystic "K. G. C." has the magic of Prince Arthur's horn, which could not only call his thousand liegemen at the blast, but before whose blast the enemy fell down. Proposals have been made to Juarez, by these adventurous spirits, and among the rest by General Renard & Co., to place him in the capital and loan him $500,000, on condition that the public lands to be granted in the States of Tamaulipas, New Leon, Zacatecas, Coahuila, Durango, Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Michoacan, Guerrero, and Oajaca. This tender includes a further consideration in the form of currying and plugging the pockets of public lands. The gentlemen in this country connected with these movements are men of military tact and approved courage. They profess to obey our neutrality laws; they will not infract them; but if they go into Mexico they will go as emigrants, on invitation, and carry the arms they are to use, to warfare, and agriculture. [Laughter.] Of course, they cannot go unarmed to such a country! They may reverse the millennium, and beat their plowshares into revolvers and their pruning-hooks into plover knives. [Laughter.] Unless we give to France that aid which the treaty provides, he cannot be blamed if he accept the offer of three thousand emigrants for each of the ten States, in consideration of the public lands of those States. It will be the ultima ratio with his Government. He will be driven by our non-action into the arms of his republicans and intervention of this kind.

Can we lie supine while these transactions are transpiring? Can we see these martial elements, which are never wanting where adventure leads the way, combining for this purpose, without some emotion? Better not, if it is to be a mere upbraidings of the pending treaty. But if it is to be rejected, better that our Government should order the regular Army to this post of delicate duty, than that men should go out, even under invitation, in irregular and adventurous bands, without responsibility. But if we fail to do our duty, we cannot reproach either Juarez or our own citizens. He will act on the old Spanish maxim applied to the native Mexican laborers: "Mal con ellos; peor sin ellos"—bad with, worse without them.

Can we see external disaster and internal oppression fall upon this ill-starred sister Republic, and have we no protest to make, no protection to give? France can throw her marine into the gulf of Venice; land her troops at Genoa; dash with her armies down the mountains of Corsica, to aid Sardinia and rescue Lombardy. Half a million men are ready to cross bayonets at Solferino, in this cause of Italy; but our nation—equally martial if organized, equally sympathetic with the right, and having more interest in Mexico by far than France can ever have in Italy—must lie upon its back, and wait and wait for Providence to press between its lips the fruits of our advancing civilization.

When we fail to move, that moment our destiny is closed. When we make no protest, the demands of our contemporary mission, and the opportunity of expansion that moment of half is the moment of retrogression; retrogression is decay; and decay is death.

Show me the code in the law of nations which could strip such an outgrowth of national sympathy and succor. Have the common conscience ceased to be a source of international law? Are the customs of civilized nations no criterion for such enlightened action? Consult your publicists. They will tell you that Mexico, if a nation, is independent and equal to any other nation, and is judge of her own actions. Very true. If she make an ill use of her position, she may be guilty of a breach of duty, but other nations cannot dictate, and must acquiesce in her conduct. True again. Vattel rightly condemns Spain for executing a Peruvian Inca under Spanish laws, because he had oppressed and killed his own subject. But if the threshold of discussion is not inquired might well ask, "Is Mexico a nation now, in the meaning of international law?" Is Mexico "a body-politic, or a society of men, united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by their combined strength?" If that constitutes a State, her condition is a caricature on nationality. Has she the capacity to preserve herself from insult and oppression, either internal or external? If not, how can she perform her obligations to foreign residents and nations? Will the law of nations, founded on the enlightened sense of mankind, permit such a Government, and, à fortiori, two Governments contending for supremacy, to outrage that justice which is the basis of society and the bond of all intercourse? Vattel in his fifth chapter, section 57, severely, and ably, states the relation of such a State with foreign nations. Its rightness to Mexico is plain and emphatic. He says:

"If there were a people who deputed and violated the rights of others wherever they found an opportunity, the interest of human society would authorize all the other nations to unite in order to exterminate such a people as the delinquents. We do not here forget the maxima established in our preliminaries, that it does not belong to nations to employ the power of their judges of each other. In particular cases, where there is room for the smallest doubt, it ought to be supposed that the act of the parties may have been just, and the injustice of the party that committed the injury may proceed from error, and not from a gross design. If that country is a State, and has a government, and by the whole tenor of her conduct, a nation evidently proves herself to be actuated by a mischievous disposition, she is regular in an right to select, the safety of the human race requires that she should be repressed. To form and support an unjust pretension, is only doing an injury to nations; and if the interest of nations is to be preserved, not to despise justice in general, is doing an injury to all nations."

If the Juarez government invite our cooperation, and we intervene, the right to accede to the request is perfectly clear. (Phillimore on International law, volume one, 44th ed.) The duty does it itself say, almost unimpeachable text. But if the treaty fail, does we promulge the doctrine of intervention, irrespective of invitation? To the curious on this point, I refer to the abstruse above cited, where the whole doctrine of intervention is considered, in the first chapter of the second volume of the first volume. Among the causes given, where intervention is justifiable, pertinent to Mexico, are the following: where the peace and safety of the intervening State are endangered; where parties to a civil war invite; where citizens of another State require protection; where intervention will stop the effusion of blood caused by a protracted civil war. The able jurist is reluctant to establish the last instance, as a substantive and solitary, but only as an accessory justification of intervention. The partition of Poland stands as a specimen in his view, and he states blunt in affirm that the abuses so destructive a principle has effected on mankind. But he finds in the case of Greece, in 1827, a justifiable intervention. He displays the long-continued and horrible massacres and anarchy of Greece, and reasons "that when, if ever such reasons could justify the interference of Christendom."

The case of Mexico, however, is not to be determined by that classic law of nations, which has proved so convenient an instrument for the oppression of mankind. In America we have a chapter of our own, written by James Monroe, and fixed as the continental policy of this hemisphere. No international law which omits this chapter, can have application to us or to our own relations with Mexico. But even the maxima of the Old World may be applied to every rising difficulty, and for our prompt intervention by actual possession in Mexico.

Some there are ever ready to oppose every thing which looks even distantly to the aggrandizement of our Republic, and are always ready to say that party which Choate described as "a gay and festive defiance of foreign dictation;" a party which does not go abroad for its rules of conduct. But if there are such who fear our advancement as an unhealthy fever, to fear the authority of foreign journals may be more than to fear our own rights and duties. To such, therefore, I quote the London Times, the thinking head of the English nation. It is as:

"The English residents who have cast their lot with the inhabitants, and the traders who have invested money in enterprises of the country, are in the same position as the Neapolitan residents. How can we or any other interfere but by taking possession of the country? If those who are to be dispossessed are the subjects of a despotic rule, may be fugitive in a war, and if the rule of this power and wreaks vengeance on all the late officials. Suppose we have no other remedy, but to take the things may have been committed by the other party, or by some independent ruffian bands of miles off, or there may be no persons to be punished, and the wrong done is irreparable. In fact, where there is no settled government, the ordinary international remedies fail."

The London Times, in another article upon this subject, used the following significant language: "Mexico has been a long time a party, and any conclusion may improve the prospect of her foreign creditors. In the present state of things they can have no hope, and their great dread, therefore, is not, lest it should be perpetuated. If some new military dictator were to arise, the country were to be absorbed, without more delay, by the United States, their tenures would be secure, and it might, especially in the latter case, be much better."

"Let the United States, when they are finally prepared for the task, assume a position of responsibility of ownership, and their merchants at Liverpool and elsewhere will be quite content with the trade that may spring out of it."

Since then, Mr. Mathew, the English Minister, has been compelled to protest against the government at the capital of Mexico, and he now threatens to leave it to its fate. There is only one remedy, it seems, for Great Britain and her citizens: possession of the country, and the right of doing that we shall do that office. Mr. Whitehead, the agent of the English bondholders, in a letter of the 26th of September, 1859, could see "no pacification, except by the intervention of some powerful nation;" and he said further, that—

"The English press, very generally among the more sensible part of the Mexicans themselves, who, without desiring annexation, would be glad to see something of an armed intervention, is now very much inclined to believe that we shall do that office."

He more than hints that it is the policy of England to promote it.

Lord John Russell, the head of the Foreign Office, in his letter of the 16th December, 1859, to the Rothschilds, seems to be hovering near that idea. He says:

"The English are in Mexico between two parties, who, only intent on destroying their adversaries, have very little respect for the rules of justice or the safety of property."

"Our Government is vain to meddle by the aid of other Powers, to bring about a termination of the present devastating and sanguinary

As we could permit no European nation to take possession of Mexico without dishonor, so we are bound to pursue this policy, by a rule far more authoritative than any international law. Our code is the law of necessity. It is the same law by which we ought to see our neighbor's burning house, when its burning would imperil our safety and destroy our peace. If we do not do it, what reasonable objection can we make if England or France attempt it? We must anticipate the else inevitable interference of these Powers on this continuing ground of intervention, and we have nothing to save but a desolated land, a demoralized citizenry, an empty exchequer, a mortgaged revenue, a banditti of fractious States, and a government only federative in a league with death, murder, and rapine."

There yet something to be saved in Mexico. If we act promptly, we become partners in her resources. What are these resources? What are, and what should be our relations towards them? We have an authentic account of these resources in the valuable compilation of Colonel Balfour, with whose book the intelligence of the country should be familiar. Mexico has now $26,000,000 of foreign imports, and $28,000,000 of exports; making an interchange of $54,000,000. Of this, England has $33,400,000; the United States only $5,700,000; and France only $1,900,000. Of the one half of this commerce. She has had special permits to import at a reduction of twenty-five to fifty per cent. on duties. She is twenty days distant by steam; while on the Pacific and on the Gulf streams at the very rates of Mexico, of $8,700,000, on the one hand, and of $1,900,000, on the other, for our exports for the year ending September 30, 1858, were but $3,315,825, being $2,000,000 less than our imports from Mexico. The above fifty odd millions does not include, of course, the immense cotton and wool trade, which, if fairly estimated, runs Mexican commerce up to $100,000,000.

Thirty millions of this silver, which mostly goes to England. If the produce of our country—the provisions and four of the great West, the varied manufactures of the North in wood and iron, which are finding markets in the West Indies, the shipping of the Gulf and the Pacific, with six thousand miles of Mexican sea-coast, and the mining enterprise of our citizens, had a full range under a good government, with this reciprocal free trade, and this well-ordered treaty, which is a tide of prosperity would flow between us and Mexico! The princely city of London votes Lord Elgin its hospitalities, because he quadrupled the trade between us and Canada by the reciprocity treaty. He becomes, in his response to the gratulation of the merchants of London, that his Chamber, if carried out, would open to high Chilean a treaty, if carried out, would open to high Chilean a treaty with four hundred million people. Yet, at our doors we neglect the rarest clausures of commercial enlargement. There is not a product between our Mexican boundary and Panama which is not wanted by us. There is not a product of our skill and industry that will not find a market in that country. May I not be pardoned for illustrating this view from my own State of Ohio? Its statistics, Mr. Mansfield, in his report for 1859, estimate our great product at an average of one hundred and twelve million eight hundred and eighty-three thousand eight hundred and seventy bushels. Where is the State in the world which can equal this in these elements of life? New York has but twenty-six million six hundred and thirty-nine thousand nine hundred and ten bushels; less acre in cultivation, and a less average to the acre. France, with her ninety-of cultivation, has but an average of thirteen and a half bushels to the acre, while Ohio has twenty-two and a half. Galicia even falls behind this model State of the Mississippi valley, where more people can live well than in any other land on the earth. The value of Ohio live-stock ranges over seventy million dollars, from which are made our smoked and salted meats. These would be free duty under this treaty. Has Ohio any surplus or exportation? no interest in an extended market? If I summoned each Representative to lay before us the specialty of his State, for which free trade is offered in this treaty, what a museum of national exchanges would we not show, to pour into the great current of trade which would follow its ratification?

What can Mexico give us in return? Is it coffee and sugar? Their consumption with us is now almost as general as that of bread. Colima and the other Pacific States offer their rich and sugar lands, unequalled by Cuba, and surpassing Louisiana or Texas. The present supply is inadequate to our demand. We pay too much for both. So with cocoa, cochineal, and the finer qualities of tobacco. So, too, with the tropical fruits. Our iron, in all its shapes of usefulness, would have a fine chance in a country where, at times, it has been of equal value with the precious metals, and where, even yet, wooden plows perform the office in agriculture which we are beginning to perform with iron. And yet you can go to-day in New Orleans thirty thousand Ohio and Pennsylvania plows at thirty-six dollars per dozen! If we could have settled relations with Mexico, and if Mexico herself could be tranquilized, I doubt not that $50,000,000 of silver per annum would be produced. Every dollar of this would come to us. Our mining interests now give us $120,000,000, with only twenty thousand persons employed. Think of such an enterprise applied to the silver mines of Mexico! We need the silver to purify our specie currency of its adulterated coin. We need it to pay for the goods now in our midst to aid this production. We must change, by some new enterprise, the ratio between the production of gold and silver. The leads of the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains have already made that late lonely and the sea of the Pacific waves and remunerative waters. That beautiful plateau, those affluent gulches, those seams of gold-bearing granite, whose amazing extent and richness are described in memorials on our table as lands which have never been equaled or even approached at any time in the history of the earth for their marvellous wealth—those rivers, whose sand is silver, and whose pebbles are gold, are not merely stimuli to our enterprise, but they indicate, by their topographical and geological laws, and by their position as a part of the great range from Chili to Frazer's river, that they are the approach, the vestibule of that immense temple, whose sunless architecture has its endless colonnade and mystic chambers beneath our continental skies! From these sources Spain alone repletes for centuries, and only and deservedly lost them because she lavished them on a corrupt royalty, and to glut a base ambition.

In Mexico alone, where these resources were only "scratched" by the rude science of the time, from the conquest to 1836, [by official data furnished by the Ministerio De Fomento], we find a coinage of $2,366,745,351, figures under which the mind reels in its gaze after the wonders of wealth! Of this amount, $2,534,115,675 were of silver alone! The gold amounted to $86,892,142. What a fruitage from these sterile mountains! What apices of gold in pictures of silver! No Yankee Aladdin had dreamed to rival this arithmetic of dread and coined cash! Quite a lot of loose change to chink in the pantaloons of Young America! [Laughter.] And yet, this land of sterile sierras, with their untold coffers of wealth, has no parallel for the salubrity of its climate, the richness of its soil, and the beauty and fertility of its fields and its sky. Mexico has her Tierras Calientes, her Tierras Frias; but above all, her Tierras Templadas, which combine the virtues of all soils, and the beauties of all heavens. Homer had poetic glimpses of such a land, when he thus depicted:

*Born winter smiles on that auspicious climate,
The fields are droid with undying prime;
From the bleak pole no winds inclement blow,
Nor does the round ball, or flake the dewy snow;
But from the breezy deep the moist balise
The fragrant marmors of the western gale.*

But alas! civil discord is the serpent of this paradise. Anarchy, like the orange, is here in perpetual fruit and bloom. The murdered corpse is found beneath the palm and the cocoa. Here every prospect pleases, and only man is vile. If it be true that the weaker and disorganized nations still have subsided and continued to flourish, and organized nations, and that nationalities of inferior grade must succumb and surrender to those of superior civilization and polity, then there is no power short of the Almighty which can in time prevent the absorption, aggrandizement, and elevation of this rich and fertile land by its union with these States of confederated and constitutional freedom.

Give the United States, with its steam engine, its uncut, its self-government, and its energy, the protective control of these regions, and you doubt that we would outstrip England in commerce? The commodities for interchange are ready. What we want is settled relations with Mexico. We want a steam communication on the Gulf, such as proposed by Colonel Butterfield, which will be, as has been proved by England in her relations with Spanish America, and by us in our relations with Cuba, the open sea to the riches of this heaven-favored and man-cursed country.

Let us expend our money in opening Japan and China to our commerce. We send ships and ambassadors, and cultivate the humanities and amenities of the age, in persuading, astonishing, and interlocking in mutual interest the lands of the far Orient; but at our very threshold we miss our golden opportunities. In the shape of a well-defined intercontinental policy, such as is proposed in the treaty and in the message of President Buchanan, our interests have suffered not less than $30,000,000 per annum. For ten years we have been struggling for a safe and quick passage to the East. In vain. Our efforts are worth to venture, for the reason that no adequate protection has been given in its use. Emigration has been meager and uncertain, because there was no stimulus to labor and no certainty of its results.

I need thus shown the condition of Mexico. I have given the reasons why some intervention should be had. There is no reason in the interest of economy and commerce; indemnity for past wrong and security for future immunity; in the interest of our citizens; in the interest of the international or the forum of conscience; in the decrees of Divine Providence, as He works with man in the order and happiness of His creature, which does not appeal to us for intervention in Mexico.

I proceed to notice some of the objections against the policy enunciated:

1. Is it objected that our intervention, under the fifth and sixth of the conventional articles of the treaty, by force, will involve us in war? I believe their simple ratification would bring England into concert with us, drive Miramón from the country, and, by such a partial intervention now, save war and constant intervention hereafter. We must close our eyes to the fact that England will do this duty. We have the opportunity of giving to Mexico the best liberal government which has yet arisen. It is inclined towards us. Even Miramón, when protesting to us against the treaty, considers our recognition of the establishment, as he calls it, of the Republic of San Francisco Cruz, as a thing inexplicable to him—as utterly impossible but a few years ago, when Mexico lived upon the rant of the soldiery about the Yankees, and before her statesmen had learned to understand our aims and institutions.

2. Is it objected that this treaty will prevent annexation? Why, Fuenté, the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs, refused to sign it because he feared to give away the sovereignty of Mexico. How can these objections be reconciled? By a violation of some of the conventional articles of the treaty without the concomitant power? What the empty crown of royalty, without the head to plan or the arm to execute. Mexico has the right, but not the power; we furnish the last. If, then, it be objected to this treaty that it will prevent our annexation to this country, because it elevates Mexico into the dignity of an assured independent nation, I ask, if this followed, would annexation be less desirable or less probable?

3. Is it objected that we have territory and people enough for our own happiness and contentment? If Mr. Jefferson had so believed, we never should have had our southwestern empire, with the Mississippi holding by its mobile drops of water this Union in its steadfast poise. If John Quincy Adams had so reasoned, would not Florida still have remained as Cuba was forced to be to our peace, and a clog to our progress? Had Robert J. Walker and John C. Calhoun so believed, we never should have had the lone star of Texas on our flag and her territory in our Union. Had James K. Polk so believed, California would not have been as Cuba was a hindrance to our peace, and a clog to our progress? Had Pierce so believed, the Mesilla would still be a terra incognita, and her mineral wealth would have had no chance for development. I have no fear of territorial expansion, with the success to herself and to us to which these acquisitions have witnessed.

4. Is it objected that Mexico has no population suited to our system of self-government? Had not Louisiana her French, Florida and Texas their Spanish, and California and New Mexico a population of that of Mexico? These are becoming homogeneous with the lapse of time. There is no reason why, under our system of local self-government and Federal decentralization, all Mexico should not live and progress under our Government with the same success as herself and to us to which these acquisitions have witnessed.

5. Is it objected that already we have distraction and threats of dissolution? Is it said that more territory would only add to our disquietude? Is the slavery question, as Cuba was, forced to be in the path of empire? Are we to be hemmed in by fear of disunion? If this country, with its present Constitution, reposing on the intelligence of our people and the history of its formation, cannot grow without danger, it cannot live long enough to be a hindrance to our peace and vitality to hold us together, there is vitality with which to expand. Nay, without this expansion, decay is more rapid and disruption more certain. This country has settled one thing, beyond the power of politicians to disturb it; and that is, that the Federal Government shall not intervene in the home affairs of the States; and that when they are in preparation for admission, no power but themselves, guided by their own wants and interests, shall, or of right ought to, prohibit or control, or in any way control, their domestic institutions.

Mr. STANTON. Has the gentleman read the veto messages of Governors Black and McDoy? Perhaps, if he had, he would not regard that doctrine as the fixed policy of the country.

Mr. COX. I do not understand fully the application of my colleague's question to the merits of this doctrine of expansion. This decentralizing doctrine makes expansion safe. If it be accepted as the policy of the country, expansion has no terrors which do not now menace us. May, an active outgroping power would divert attention from internal dissensions. It would pour a vigorous life-blood into the veins of the older States. It would give activity to young and vigorous States, which would hasten under our protecting eyes.

I have no argument to make in the American Congress for or against slavery. Its discussion in an ethical light, was exhausted by Aristotle two thousand years ago. Neither the polemics of New England, nor the responsive big guns of our "Gulf Squadron," do more than echo the words of the Sages. It cannot add anything to this discussion. As an economical question, I remark, that if slavery could be made profitable in Mexico, it would go there. It may, therefore, go to the tierres calientes. Mr. Greeley says that it never went under Spanish rule, and cannot go there now, for physical reasons. He would not say that it should cover it, when its soil and production unfit it for slave labor! He would wonder no more if he understood the Ostend manifesto in its comprehensive sense. It is no matter, in so far as it concerns our Federal Union—how much severer may concern our ethical and political position. We have, so long as they are equal under a sacred organic law. Already the preponderance in favor of free States is declared. Southern statesmen like HAMMOND and STEPHENS acquiesce in it as a part of the law of emigration, locomotion, and population. Mexico would aggrandize our slave States if she would not furnish one from her area. Dissimilarity of States in production and institutions is a part of our system. Out of these brotherly dissimilitudes, as out of the vari-colored stones of the quarry, a nation of growth, strength, and majority of proportion and strength are the wonder of art! With this as our policy, our territorial expansion is as inimitable as the continent and as safe as the stars in their appointed orbits. As safe as the stars; for they, too, the nations, are the effluence of God's power, expanding through the universe by the everlasting law of growth! They obey the same law by which the seed bursts into life, rises above the ground, effloresces and decays with perpetual bloom and seed. The same law of growth applies to physical bodies as well as to the ethereal bodies. Without growth, both body and mind decay and die. Growth is the condition of health. It is so with nations. History writes it on the forefront of time, as its foremost, biggest conception. God writes it in the flower, in the globular water drop and in the star, as well as in Egypt, Rome, and Greece. In the feudal ages of darkness, and the later ages of illumination; in the eras of despotism, as well as of liberty; wherever His finger records his fiat upon the everlasting scroll, there is this law: "Be fruitful, multiply, and increase, and grow, and be glad!"

Is the Anglo-Saxon race an exception? Is this great self-government, whose next census will show under its flag thirty-six million people, and whose advancement greater than ever before in material wealth, to be broken up in the century? Will the next seventy years witness the retrogression of this continent into anarchy and ruin? Is Mexico's past thirty years the index to show how far toward the occultation is the orb of our destiny? Or is Mexico to be invigorated and renewed by a new life from the Anglo-Saxon race of ours? May not the mines of Chihuahua and Guanajuato be made to gladden again under our energy? Will not the valley of the Aztec again blossom as the rose, under a better disposition of civil rights and away from the shadows of mysterious palaces, buried deep in the solitudes of Yucatan, whose sculptured facades Stephens desired to rescue from destruction, again resound with the voice of life and blessing? May not the fisheries of the Gulf, the great fisheries of the coast of a new trade, and its people, deck the diadem of a new empire? These may be dreams, but I have yet to see the American who will not say that at some time and in some emergency the United States will "have to take charge" of Mexico, and necessarily gain an empire, and a new position, and, by the charm of our polity, fit them to each other—amalgamate, tendon, muscle, bone, and sineew—and breathe into the form the soul of an active and benignant juvenescence!

If any Power interfere in Mexico, it must be either France, Spain, England, or the United States. The interference of Spain would only renew, with tenfold force, the antagonisms which have so long existed. Do we think England to make another Canada on our south; to hold us within her iron vice? But England has expressed the wish that we should interfere. The late accomplished colonial Minister, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, gave voice to this sentiment of the British Government, in the consideration of the establishment of the British Columbia government on the 8th of July, 1858, when he said:

"I conclude, sir, with a humble trust, that the Divine Disposer of all human events may afford the aid of His blessing to our attempt to add another community of Christian freemen to those by which Great Britain confides the records of her empire, not to pyramids and obelisks, but to States and Commonwealths, whose history will be written in her language."

Some of England's statesmen have taunted us with having no foreign policy. We deserve the taunt. If rightly understood, England, sir, has nothing but pride in these outgrowths—these blossoms and fruits of her secular greatness and magnificent strength; and she will have no protest to make against the honor and advancement of her own empire. Laying England aside, the United States asks, what would be the result of a French interference? Not very remotely, a war of races for supremacy, not alone in Mexico, but on this continent. The Latin race and the Anglo-Saxon contest would be collision. The Anglo-Saxon, rather the Anglo-American race, which is the best development of the Teutonic and Celtic, for adventure, enterprise, and martial success, has already combined the white races of America north of Mexico into liberal governments. His countrymen have no race but the Anglo-American step in its advancement. It is desirable to array these elements here, in the face of this indomitable race?

An intervention by us, supporting a liberal government like that of Juárez, which offers us the most liberal and generous course of non-interference, with a stipulation by which our arms can be called in to crush anarchy and enforce order, is the only mode by which jealousy can be avoided and order established. A sufrage by which the felon and the inferior races of Mexico are attracted for decay and death, and the United States in an inevitable relapse into barbarism, and, at the same time, by enhancing property and promoting prosperity, reconcile every impatient element in Mexico to our salutary protectorate.

A year ago, when I suggested to the Congress that the juncture was upon us when we should stop marking time, and begin moving forward, and that Congress was not up with the enterprise of the nation, the Madrid and Paris presses did me the honor to translate my speech, and to give me the credit of that which I had said. The Congress of what La Cronica newspaper was pleased to call the impetuosity of La Joven America. It expressed its amazement at the simple remark, "that, if we consider just now the elements of our people—martial, mechanical, intellectual, agricultural, and domestic—who would say that there are a dozen locomotive republics already fired up and ready for movement?" But, Mr. Speaker, I put it to the members of this House, whether there be one here who cannot say that at least one reason for considering such elements as this, mustered in each of the two hundred and thirty-seven districts of the United States? If legal sanction were given, either by the repeal of the neutrality laws or by some other governmental action, quadruple this number could be raised before the telegraphic cables could click; and with this, the vengeance. That this is so, we cannot help. We should not desire to repress, only to restrain it. However much our caution may condemn and guard these elements, there is not an American who does not cherish a lurking, smiling approbation of this element of elastic spirit which springs from the great nation of the New World! Call it what you will—manifest destiny, territorial expansion, star of empire, La Joven America, and even filibusterism—it is here. We must make the best of it. If the current of progress is to be kept in the right channel, we neglect, despise, or unduly repress it, it will only spend its force violently and disastrously, when once it takes its destined way!

Is there any American who wishes to consult European Powers as to the propriety or policy of such an expansion? Is there any one who fears a fatal blow from these Powers? We do not exist by the sufferance of Europe, but by our insuference. We did not spring into a progressive nationality, nor grow to our present greatness by its fostering care; but by its neglect, and in spite of its malevolence. We do not ask its pardon for being born, nor need we apologize for its growing. It has endeavored to prevent even the legitimate extension of our commerce, and to confine us to our own continent. But if we can buy Cuba of Spain, it is our business with Spain. If we have to take it, it is our business with Providence. If we must save Mexico, we must make its weakness our strength, we have no account to render outside Europe or its dynasties. A year ago, in glancing at European politics, I foresaw the portentous storm of the coming war. Scarcely had my language been translated into La Presse, before the lightning of power quivered over Europe, and snipped like brittle glass at an imperial new year's greeting in the Tuilleries to the Austrian Minister. Soon the sword of Napoleon was thrown into the scales for Italian independence! The treaties of 1814 fell. The alliances of one year ago were null and void. The cannon of Solferino. As a consequence of this condition, not yet settled, all such alliances cannot be relied on to pursue us to any fatal end on this continent.

If European Powers choose to expand their empire, to energize their people, we have no protests, no arms to prevent them. England may push from India through the Himalayas to sell her calicoes to the numberless people of China, and divide with France the empires of India, Burma, and Ceylon. Russia may push her empire by their expansion. Russia may push her diplomacy upon Peking, and her armies through the Caucasus, and upon Persia and Tartary; she may even plant her Greek cross again on the mosque of St. Sophia, and take the Grecian Levant into her keeping. France may plant her forts and arms upon the shores of the Red sea; complete the canalization of Suez; erect another Carthage on the shores of the Mediterranean; bind her natural limits from front Blanc, in Savoy, to Nice, upon the sea. Sardania might become a province, and give us a new step to Italy a name and a nationality. Even Spain, proud and poor, may fight over again in Africa the romantic wars with the Moroccans, by which she educated that chivalry and adventure which three centuries ago made her the mistress of the New World. She may demand territory of Morocco, as she has, as indemnity for the war. America has no inquiry to make, no protocol to sign. These are the movements of an active age. They indicate health, not disease—growth, not decay. They are the signs of the chain of Providence. They prove the mutability of the most imperial of human institutions; but, to the philosophic observer, they move by a law as fixed as that which makes the decay of autumn the herald of spring. They obey the same law which makes the seed burst into life, and the seedling rise to the sky. Astronomers tell us that the "southern cross," which guided the adventurer upon the Spanish main four centuries ago, and which now can be seen, the most faithful emblem of our salvation, shining down through the Christian and Mexican night—was before the Christian era, a constellation in our northern heavens! The same GREAT will, which knows no North and no South, and which is sending again, by an irreversible law, the southern cross to our northern skies, on its elevating outflow cannot be expected to withhold the institutions of nations, and the vicissitudes of empires? The very stars in their courses are "Knights of the Golden Circle," and illustrate the record of human advancement. They are the type of that territorial expansion from which this American continent cannot be excepted. They are the type of the finger of Providence points to our nation as the guiding star of this progress. Let him who would elude dusk its radiance, or make it the portion of a moment, cast again with nice heed on the main of his people.

In conclusion, then, I favor the proposition to have the fullest and fairest investigation, by the Military Committee, of all our relations with Mexico; so that those relations shall not be disturbed—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL demanded the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I ask a division on that. This is tolerably short notice.

Mr. REAGAN. I appeal to the gentleman from Vermont to let me say a word.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BINGHAM, and ROBINSON, of Illinois, were appointed.

Tell. The House divided; and the tellers reported twenty-nine in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER inquired if a further count was demanded, and several members having responded "No!" and "Give it up!" declared that the previous question was seconded.

Mr. STANTON. Stop! I did not understand that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it very well. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. I asked for a count on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand, and thinks it is now too late.

Mr. WINSLOW. If the House adjourns now, will not this come up the first thing to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WINSLOW. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are two privileged questions for to-morrow. I hope this question will be disposed of to-day. Let the bill go to the Committee of Ways and Means, as is usual, and we shall have no further trouble.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order.

The demand for a further count upon seconding the previous question was made by the gentleman from Ohio and myself.

Mr. STANTON. And not abandoned.

Mr. BURNETT. It is not too late now. We never abandoned it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harvey] said out that he gave it up, but the gentleman from Ohio and myself called for it, and did not give it up.

Mr. COLFAX. I was near the gentleman from Kentucky, and he sat in perfect silence while the demand was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late now. The Chair understood the objection of the gentleman from Ohio to be that the question was not understood, and answered that the Chair understood it. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as insisting on a count.

Mr. STANTON. I certainly did.

Mr. HOUSTON. I gave it up as one of the negative voters. I had a right to give up my share, and I did so. [A laugh.] I hope the gentleman from Kentucky does not question my right to do so.

Mr. STANTON. I was standing in the area. The Chair called upon the "noes" to pass between the tellers, and then some one inquired whether the negative side was to be counted, and the Chair said "no." The count was not abandoned. I was there ready to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard it stated that no count was demanded on the other side.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the tellers got lost, for some one said, "Pass between the tellers," and some one else asked, "Where are the tellers?" and I looked over and saw no tellers.

Mr. CURTIS. Just as I was about to pass between the tellers they ran away. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late to have a count now. The main question has been ordered, and is first on referring the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STANTON. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, (at twenty-five minutes after four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 30, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GRELEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SLAVERY.

Mr. SUMNER. I hold in my hand a memorial praying Congress to repeal the fugitive slave law of 1850; to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and in United States Territories; to prohibit the inter-State slave trade; and to pass a resolution, binding Congress against the admission of any slave State into the Union, the acquisition of any slave territory, and the employment of any slave by any agent, contractor, officer, or Department of the Federal Government. This memorial is signed by Samuel May, a distinguished venerable merchant of Boston, and four hundred and eleven others, citizens of Boston. I now present it, and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the reference. I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved that the memorial lie on the table. On this question the yeas and nays are asked.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Chas. C. Chapman, Claiborne, Foster, Giddens, Hale, Harris, King, Humphill, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kearney, Lane, Latham, Mallory, Mason, Nicholas, Potter, Sewell, Rice, Seabury, Sill, Smith, Thompson, and Toombs—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bingham, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Dodge, Edwards, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harris, King, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

So the memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

WASHINGTON MARKET-HOUSE.

Mr. BROWN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 192) relative to a market-house in this city, have directed me to report it back, with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House, with sundry amendments which the committee recommended as amendments to the House amendment. I ask that the matter be now disposed of. It will take but a little time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 192) to authorize the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $300,000, for building a market-house.

Mr. MALLORY. I trust that if the bill shall interfere with the unfinished business, at one o'clock, it will then give way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will, of course, call up the unfinished business at the hour appointed for its consideration. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendments to this bill?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to present a petition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amounts to an objection.

PETITION.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of Hannah M. King, widow of Jeremiah E. King, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted in withdrawal from the files of the Senate the memorial of Harvey S. Wyman, widow of Captain Thomas W. Wyman, of the Navy, praying a pension.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 296) for the construction of five steam sloops-of-war, for service on the African coast; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 20) to secure the right of search on the coast of Africa, for the more effectual suppression of the African slave trade; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 287) to incorporate the National Gallery and School of Arts in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 304) providing for carrying the entire mail between the Atlantic and Pacific States on one line, reported it with an amendment, and notified the Senate that he would ask for its consideration in a few days, after the bill and amendment should be printed.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1861, reported it with amendments.

CAPTAIN RINGGOLD'S SURVEYS.

Mr. FITCH. A memorial from certain insurance companies of New York has been referred to the Committee on Printing, asking for the printing of Captain Ringgold's surveys and the passages through the coral archipelago of the Pacific ocean. The document is not before the committee. For the purpose of having it before the Senate, so that the question of printing may be properly taken on, I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to transmit to the Senate the report of the surveys made by Captain Ringgold, of the Navy, of the passages through the coral archipelago of the Pacific ocean.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States in relation to the suppression of the African slave trade, as to provide a period of imprisonment for life for a participation in such trade, instead of the penalty of forfeiture of life, as now provided; and also an amendment of such laws as will include in the punishment for said offenses all persons who fit out, or are in any way connected with or interested in fitting out, expeditions or vessels for the purpose of engaging in such slave trade.

MORTALITY IN THE ARMY.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of "the statistical report on the sickness and mortality of the Army of the United States," embracing the period of five years, from 1855 to 1860, in continuation of the report of the Surgeon General, communicated to the Senate in 1856.

INDIAN NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be requested to make an estimate of the amount that will be required to make a treaty of peace, amity, &c., with the Kioways, Comanches, and other Indians, who roam near the Arkansas river, west of the one hundredth meridian longitude; with the Arapahoes and Cheyennes, located below the north fork of the Platte river; with the Sioux and other Indians of the plains; to be concentrated at the junction of Deer creek, a tributary of the Platte river; and also for a treaty with the Red Lake Chippewas and the Indians of the Red river, in the State of Minnesota, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in that State.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the Senator from Arkansas, the gentleman who presides the Committee on Indian Affairs, if he does not deem it more proper to substitute for the words "treaty of peace and amity," wherever they occur, the word "council." I think it has been a misnomer at all times to call a council with Indians a treaty.

With these inroads upon the rights of Indians, without a home, without any of those fixed habits which render it possible to enforce upon them a treaty, I think should be treated as wards and pupils, not fit to govern themselves, of whom we take care, and with whom we may hold councils.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If the Department from Mississippi will indicate the amendment which will accomplish his purpose, I will not object to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Strike out the words "treaty of peace, amity, &c.," and insert the word "council."

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That will accomplish my purpose. The object is to get at the expense of holding a council.

Mr. FITCH. I apprehend that the amendment will fall in the object desired by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in one instance; the instance of the Chippewas of Red Lake. They are different altogether from these nomadic tribes. Many of them, particularly their half-breeds, are an agricultural people. There are whites largely intermingled with them from across the line in the British Settlement, cultivating land to which they have no title. They are a semi-intelligent people, at least, and a treaty may properly be made with them; but I grant that a treaty with wild tribes of the West would be a farce.

Mr. GREEN. I think the Senator from Mississippi is entirely at fault. A council is an interview; it is conferring together. A treaty is an agreement, a conclusion. The object of the Senator from Arkansas is to arrive at an agreement.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The Senator from Missouri will allow me to ask only a question, a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Interior to make an estimate of the expense for this purpose. I imagine that the expense of one procedure is about the same as of the other. The answer to this resolution by the Department will not conclude the Senate at all. It does not follow, as a matter of course, that we shall make the appropriation. That is a subject for future consideration. I suppose it may as well go as it is.

Mr. GREEN. If it be a mere interview for the purpose of understanding each other, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi move the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; I move the amendment. I will not press the argument on the Senate, as I suppose it is understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi—in line three strike out the words "make a treaty of peace, amity, &c.," and insert the words "hold a council;" and in line nine strike out the word "treaty," and insert the word "council."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I should like to know how the resolution reads now, with the amendment.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be requested to make an estimate of the amount that will be required to hold a council with the Kiowas, Comanches, and other Indians to reside on the Red River, west of the one hundredth degree of west longitude; and with the Arapahos and Cheyennes, located below the South Fork of the Platte river; with the other tribes of the Great Plains, to be concentrated for the occasion at Deer Creek, a tributary of the Platte river; and also for a council with the Red Lake Chippewas, and the Indians of the Red river, in the State of Minnesota, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in that State.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I shall make no proposition to amend; but I think the Senate has been entirely satisfied for years past that we have been proceeding with but little policy in making these continued purchases from the Indian tribes. We have, for the purchase of lands which we did not want, involved ourselves in a debt to the Indians in one way or another, which constitutes a very considerable figure in our financial affairs and in our annual bills of appropriation. I think myself we should stop this in career. We do not want the land, and surely it is not our policy to purchase land which we do not want. I believe that we may pay interest on the purchase money. I do not know what the object of these councils is; but I am very much afraid they will eventuate in treaties for extinguishing Indian titles, to which I should be opposed. I believe the Senate will reflect on this subject whether it is their wish or purpose to proceed to the continual acquisition of Indian lands.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I concur in the views expressed by the Senator from Kentucky as to the acquisition of more territory from the Indians at this time. The Senator, however, I am sure, misunderstands the object of this resolution. It is not contemplated by the Department to make these treaties for the purpose of acquiring territory. They are to be made with those wild and nomadic tribes who range over the vast plains and mountains in the vicinity of the new territory of Pike's Peak. I suppose it would be very difficult to say that these Indian tribes have any title to the soil right to the soil within any particular limit; but it is necessary for the protection of emigrants that we should have some friendly understanding or accommodation with them, the amount of which is left to the Department to make on their side; not to molest our emigrants, we should pay them a small annuity in goods or money. If the Senator remembers anything about the main features of the stipulations of the treaty of Fort Laramie, that I think is what is in contemplation by the Department—small annual present in goods, as a real or nominal compensation for those advantages which they suppose they do surrender in giving up their country to the free and unmolested intercourse of the whites.

These treaties have been found to be a pretty good thing for the Department, for they cost the Government but little; they cost no land; they are very plain and simple in their provisions. I think we may well venture in this case to continue a little further the policy which has operated very well heretofore. It is not in contemplation, so far as the treaties with the tribes around the Blue Hills of the Stony mountains and of the plains between Missouri and Pike's Peak are concerned, to ask for, or treat for, any cession of territory. What may be precisely in contemplation with the tribes around the Red River, I do not know, but the Senator from Indiana is probably better advised than I am.

Under these circumstances, inasmuch as the Senate does not conclude itself at all by passing this resolution, which only provides for obtaining information, which may be used at a certain contingency, I think it may well be allowed to pass without any further question. The real point will come up afterwards on the propriety of an appropriation for this purpose after we obtain the information.

Mr. MASON. I have looked at the resolution, and I see that the latter clause contemplates a treaty for the acquisition of land and the extinguishment of Indian title.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. What Indians does the Senator mean?

Mr. MASON. The latter clause of the resolution; I do not remember the name of the Indians.

Mr. RICE. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. In 1854 Congress passed a law authorizing the President to make treaties with certain Indian tribes in the then Territory of Minnesota; and there was an appropriation of $10,000 made at that time. Negotiations were entered into with the northern tribes in Minnesota, and the treaties were concluded; and there are now some 150,000 Indians there. They never had any definite line of boundary between those different bands. The treaties were concluded with all, except one band at Red Lake, and one upon the Red River of the North. Those two bands own a small tract of country, and they have never concluded any treaty with the United States. One, I believe, was negotiated in 1852, but it was not ratified. A dispute has arisen between those two bands and the other bands that did cede, in regard to the boundary. These Indians are very much dissatisfied, and are giving the people of the State of Minnesota a great deal of trouble. Upon the Red river there is a steamboat; and upon the border of the river the Indian title to the land is held by these two bands. I received letters yesterday which state that the owners of the steamboat are resolved to go on there to prevent the Indians from destroying it. There is a large amount of goods taken to the Hudson's Bay Company through that river annually. The Hudson's Bay Company send two hundred men to guard the goods.

The object now is to make a treaty with these Indians, either for the purpose of extinguishing the title to the small strip they own, or to so much of it as will permit the free navigation of the river, or to enter into some negotiations with them which will satisfy them in regard to the treaties that were made with the adjoining bands. It is the only strip of country within the boundaries of our State that belongs to the Indians, excepting such as has been specially reserved under former treaties. These two small bands of Indians live upon the extreme northern line of our State. They are very poor. Their game, in consequence of the whites being numerous to the westward, has become scarce. They are without implements, even for the purpose of tilting the soil. They have never received a dollar from the Government. They are not only starving, but are nearly naked.

There are two purposes in view: one is to permit the whites to navigate the river; and the other is to provide for these Indians, so that they may be comfortable—I think they number about three hundred in all—and to carry out an existing law.

Mr. MASON. I remember that, some year or two ago—two years ago, possibly—when there was a proposition here to ratify certain Indian treaties which had provided for the extinguishment of Indian titles, I think on the Pacific slope, and the treaties were not ratified, it was said that in consequence Indian wars would arise out of it; that the treaties having been made by the Indians being of course an ignorant, unenlightened people, would not know anything about the restraints or limitations of our Government; and the failure to confirm the treaties, thus disappointing the whites, would lead to some mischief. There was a good deal in the argument; but it went to allow the imprudence of making such treaties. Now, sir, I have been driven, as far as I am concerned, to the fixed and settled policy of acquiring no further land from the Indian tribes, if it can be avoided. It is not a question of the Indians in the intercourse with the whites who go amongst them, do it, if you please, by soldiery—by force; but the acquisition of Indian territory enlarges the public domain, ennobles the Government, demoralizes it, and leads to the spectacle which we witness here from session to session, of an attempt to bribe the popular mind by largesses of the public lands. Within the last few years, we have passed laws giving a bounty in land to the soldiers of the last war with Great Britain, and so on.

Mr. MASON. I think there is a bill pending before the Senate, which has already passed the other House, for giving gratuities in the public lands to the people—a course of policy that I should think would tend more to demoralize the country, to say nothing of the other objections to a point of property, than any that could be devised.

I cannot look, therefore, on this further acquisition of public lands, other than as one that would tend to increase that growing evil arising out of the public domain. I have no reluctance in the world to exercise the Federal power as far as may be necessary for the protection of our people who go amongst the Indians, if they go there pursuant to law, or for the protection of any course of trade that may grow up with them; but I would not do it with a military force, and I would make no further acquisition of public lands, unless I could certainly not until we get rid of the present burden upon the country in relation to the public lands. I move, therefore, to strike out that clause of the resolution—the last clause—which proposes negotiations to treat for the extinguishment of Indian title.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the avowal of a purpose on the part of two or more Senators not to extinguish any more Indian titles, brings a very grave and serious question before us. I have no idea how we are to avoid making further Indian treaties. It seems to me that it is indispensable, and particularly in the very country referred to by this resolution. The chief part of this resolution relates to the Indians and about Pike's Peak—the gold mines of the Rocky Mountains. We have a large class of people engaged in mining, from twenty to thirty thousand people; and they are men, for there are scarcely any women, and probably no children—men enough to constitute a State—men who, if the Government interfered with them, would give the full population of public lands. I believe that those men are all trespassers upon the public lands. They are there not only without the sanction of law, but in violation of law. I believe they are there in violation of the Indian intercourse law. I may not be accurate, but my rebellion is that that law imposes a penalty—perhaps six months' imprisonment, and a fine not exceeding $1,000, for every man that goes there. Still they are there. The laws have not been enforced, preventing those people from trespassing on the Indian lands. You stand by until you have got twenty thousand men there at work, and until millions of dollars' worth of property has been taken there for the purpose of engaging in mining; and then, when it is proposed to treat with the Indians for the purpose of extinguishing their title, and legalizing this possession, which you have stood by and permitted to take place, we are told that we are to extinguish no more Indian title.

You find a curious state of things in the very country to which this resolution refers. Most of the gold miners at Pike's Peak are within the organized Territory of Kansas—within the jurisdiction of the territorial government created by Congress. These twenty thousand men have been there and taken possession of the Indian country, in violation of your Indian intercourse law. They have taken possession of your public lands, and opened gold mines, without any authority of law. They have gone further: they have organized a government of their own, and have taken the government established by Congress. They have erected a squatter government, in virtue of no other title than squatter sovereignty, on this public domain, where they are trespassers; where they have gone in violation of law. Having established a government in derogation of the government which Congress established; having elected a Legislature, denying the authority of the Legislature of the organized Territory created by Congress; having elected a Governor to supercede the functions of Governor Medary, whom the President appointed and the Senate confirmed, they are proceeding to make laws in that country subversive of the authority of Congress; organizing counties, laying out and chartering towns, levying taxes upon property to which they have no title, giving out titles and patents, and doing many things different from those of the Territorial Legislature which you have established.

Are we to stand by and allow this state of things to go on, refuse to enforce the laws by which these people could be kept off the Indian lands, at the same time, refuse to recognize the Indian title and thereby to legalize the settlement? Are we to refuse to sanction what has been done, and yet refuse to break up the settlement, and leave these people with an irregular, unlawful government, in rebellion against the authority of the United States? Will you permit me to bring in a bill to organize a territorial government there and legalize the settlement? Sir, we cannot stand still. We must either retreat or advance. We must either enforce the Indian intercourse law, and drive these people off these lands and away from these mines and protect the Indians, or we must extinguish the Indian title and organize a territorial government, and convert this squatter sovereignty into popular sovereignty, according to the law and the Constitution. That is the only way. For if we refuse to recognize and extinguish the Indian title, we are bound to remove the penalties that hang over these settlers; we are bound to organize a government for them. I will not now go into an argument showing the necessity of doing so. I should not have said as much as I have said, but for the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, who says he is opposed to the extinguishment of any more Indian title, and particularly at the place referred to by this resolution; to wit, the gold region about Pike's Peak.

Mr. MASON. The Senator misunderstands me. I did not say a word of that, at all. I am averse to extinguishing it anywhere. If they have gone there, let them work out their own salvation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So much the worse. I said "particularly around Pike's Peak," because the resolution referred particularly and specially to that country. The Senator is opposed to extinguishing the Indian title anywhere; and he says, if these people have gone there, let them work out their own salvation. How? They have broken the Indian land, got up an Indian war, running up a debt of five or six million dollars, as was done in Washington Territory, and then come to the Congress of the United States to get us to foot the bill?

That is the way they will work out their salvation. If you do not protect them against the Indians, they will protect themselves. If you do not give them law for the punishment of crime, they will make their own laws. If you do not establish a government for them, they will establish their own government. If you do not extinguish the Indian title, they will take possession, as they have done; the Indians will resist; bloodshed will follow; and so do with what we are the consequence of, it will rage up and down the whole length of your border settlements, not only on this side of the mountains, but on the other; and you will have a war threatening the border of California and Oregon on the west, and of Minnesota and Iowa, and Kansas and Nebraska, and Arkansas and Texas, on the east. The Senator's policy is for us to fold our arms and let them work out their own salvation!

Sir, I am opposed to allowing these people to work out their own salvation, politically, by that way. Let us prescribe by law what country is open to settlement, and what country is not. That which is closed, let it be kept closed. Let the laws against intrusion be firmly, vigorously enforced; let trespassers be kept off Indian reservations, and if the lands, but if the Indians refuse to settlement, give them government, give them law, and do not leave them to work out their own salvation through blood and violence. I repeat, therefore, that we must do one of two things with reference to Pike's Peak and the country surrounding it, including all that gold region, either extinguish the Indian title, or we must enforce the Indian intercourse law, by driving off the settlers and punishing them for having invaded the country.

The same remarks are true in reference to the Territory of Nevada. The Pacific coast now is in a blaze of excitement about the grand discoveries of silver at Washoe, on the east side of the Sierra Nevada mountains, in Carson's Valley, in the Territory of Utah. So far as I know, you have never driven an Indian treaty, and you have begun; they have organized a government at Carson's Valley, which they call the Territory of Nevada. Two thirds of it is within the organized Territory of Utah, and one third within the State of California. A government thus covered with the States of the Union, and yet outside of the States of the Union, has been organized, with a Legislature of its own creation, with a Governor of its own election, and two Delegates have been sent here to Congress to represent the Territory of Nevada—a territory not marked on our maps, a territory unknown to your statute-book; a territory filled with settlers who are trespassers on the Indian lands, trespassers on the public lands. You will not legalize their going, and you will not enforce the laws against them. You will not permit them to submit to the law, and your government you have established, and you will not give them a new one; but you will let them work out their own salvation, through blood, revolution, and violence. That seems to be the policy of the Senator from Virginia.

Sir, the resolution policy will not do in this age of government and of law. You will have more Indian wars on your borders than you contract for, unless you do make Indian treaties; unless you keep your treaties; unless you enforce your Indian intercourse law; unless you give the people of that country an open government, and such a one is not; and unless you organize Territories for the people, instead of leaving them to protect themselves with the rifle and the bow-knife as best they can. Sir, I will not take up the matter, not to say so, but I cannot help but feel compelled to protest against the policy of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Illinois may be very appropriate for or against—and I am not sure which—the resolution, but I cannot act; but I cannot let the resolution they have to the pending resolution. The resolution which is before us, and to which I offered an amendment, is for no such purpose as he supposes. The amendment which I offered does not at all affect the power of the United States to limit the Indians to certain districts of country in which they shall reside, or to open districts of country to settlement hereafter. To hold a council with them seemed to me appropriate to their dependent condition—following on the great decree that the sons of Japhet should dwell in the tents of Shem. I admit the law; it is not in our power to control it. But what has the resolution to do with that? It has no connection with that, and what Indians would you treat for the country on which these miners have settled in the neighborhood of Pike's Peak?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must ask the Senator to pause. It is the duty of the Chair to call up the special order at this hour.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move to postpone the special order, as I shall not occupy the time of the Senate long.

Mr. MALLORY. What is the special order? The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday—the bill in relation to the Florida claims.

Mr. MALLORY. I dislike very much to see that postponed. I fear this will run into a discussion; and if we pass over the Florida cases now, there will be no time to discuss them before us again. I trust their friends will not pass them over. They are now fairly before the Senate.

The motion to postpone was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about to ask, Mr. President, with whom would a treaty be made to permit white men to occupy the country about Pike's Peak? It can scarcely be said to be possessed by Indians. Having hands, they are in plain language the long-haired Indians, who creep over it as the tide which ebb and flows, following the buffalo from north to south, and tracking the herd in one direction or the other. Indians coming out of the mountain fastnesses in particular seasons of the year enter upon their migrations. They cannot be said to occupy it. They have no metes and bounds prescribed for particular tribes. They mingle with each other; they are cognate tribes, hunting equally together. I know of no tribe with which you would treat to extinguish a title such as that place; and the resolution of the Committee on Indian Affairs did not direct his resolution to that. The only portion of it relating to the extinguishment of Indian title refers to the country on the Red River of the North, where the Indians, having more of a local habitation, do possess a country, and there he desired to extinguish the Indian title.

The argument of the Senator from Illinois, therefore, was directed to something not contained in the resolution; was outside of anything which the Senate is now considering. Indian wars to occur at Pike's Peak, or excursions against trespassers under the Indian intercourse act, are matters entirely outside of the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is to hold a council with these nomadic people, to secure persons passing over the prairies; not to extinguish the so-called title, but to restrain them from committing depredations upon persons who, for any reason, may wish to cross the intermediate country lying between our settlements on the Rio Grande and the Missouri.

As to the Indian intercourse act, certainly under its terms these people may be said to be trespassers, because the country has not been thrown open to settlement. If a proposition be made to throw that country open to settlement, the act is now occupied, or occupied, or about to be occupied, so that it will be a question for consideration when it arises; and I do not concur with the Senator from Virginia. I do not choose that a hunting race shall hold a large district of country, when an agricultural people require it for their use. They must give way. The very law of nature requires them to recede when pressed by the stronger race. Our own policy has been to retain them within fixed limits. It is the means by which we seek to make them an agricultural people. I consider it a sound policy, and one to be pursued hereafter.

As to the Indians on the Red River of the North, they are the most formidable Indians with whom we shall probably ever have to deal. They are

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 21, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 79.

to come in immediately before the commencement of the clause that I proposed to strike out.

Provided, That no proposals be made at such councils for the extinguishment of title to Indian lands.

The previous part of the resolution, I understand, authorizes councils to be held with certain Indian tribes for the reasons set forth in the resolution. This is to provide only for the United States, at those councils, shall make no proposals for the extinguishment of Indian title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do hope that amendment will prevail. I do not propose to discuss it, but simply to state my opinion that I hope it will not prevail. I am willing to take the sense of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I think the effect of the amendment will be to test the sense of the Senate as to the acquisition of Indian title generally, and I hope the years and days will be given upon it.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Virginia, that I think he will attain his purpose in another way, without consuming time now, which I know many Senators are anxious to have appropriated to another subject. This resolution scarcely amounts even to the dignity of a preliminary question. It is a mere resolution of inquiry, asking of the Department for certain information, which, of course when it is obtained, will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and we have no certainty that they will ever even report a bill on the subject. I may undertake to say—I think I feel warranted in doing so—that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will not undertake to make a treaty, as indicated in this resolution of inquiry, unless Congress make a preliminary appropriation, for the very purpose of testing the question which the Senator from Virginia wishes to see tested. I think it would be more appropriate to ascertain the sense of the Senate on a question of that kind.

Mr. MASON. If Mr. Sebastian will allow me, I will withdraw the amendment; for I find, by examining the resolution, that it only asks for an estimate for an appropriation. I misinterpreted its effect.

The resolution was agreed to.

RELATIONS OF THE STATES.

Mr. MALLORY. I call for the special order. Mr. KENNEDY. With the consent of the Senate from Florida, I ask that the special order be postponed for a few minutes, in order to take up informally the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis], with a view to offer an amendment, and ask that it be printed. It will tend to no debate.

Mr. VICE PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent the special order may be laid aside informally, to take up the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis], that the Senator from Maryland may offer an amendment, to be printed. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolutions of the Senator from Mississippi be read.

Mr. KENNEDY. I offer as an amendment, to come in at the end of the seventh resolution:

Resolved, That as the unity of government, ordained and established by the Constitution of the United States, is the basis of the rights of our nation, and the source of support of our tranquility at home, our peace abroad; of our safety, of our prosperity, and of that liberty we so justly prize; all should properly estimate the value of our constitutional Union to our collective and individual happiness; and that all obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations of individuals, whether voluntary or involuntary, which are calculated to obstruct the execution of the laws, and the administration of justice, and the authority of our Government, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of civil liberty.

Resolved, That the principles and purposes of the great northern party, which has so lately authoritatively announced in this place "its only one accepted and adopted principle" is there based upon a denial of the right of the Union to the continued agitation of the slavery question, to the neglect and detriment of the real and material interests of the country, and the sacrifice of the rights that more perfect union, to subvert that justice, to destroy that domestic tranquility, to weaken that common defense, to retard the general welfare, and to deprive the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity, which the Constitution of the United States of America was ordained and established to secure.

Resolved, That in respect to the Territories, the common property of the United States, it is the right of the citizens of the United States, lawfully and permanently residing in any Territory thereof, to frame their constitution and laws and to regulate their domestic and social affairs in their own way, subject to the provisions of the Federal Constitution, with the privilege of admission into the Union whenever they have the requisite population for one Representative Congress. Provided, always, That none of those who are citizens of the United States under the Constitution and laws thereof, and who have a fixed residence in any Territory, shall be permitted to participate in the framing of the constitution, or in the enactment of laws for said Territory or State.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

RECESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. GREEN. I offer the following resolution: Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the two Houses of Congress do adjourn on the 20th of April next, until the 20th of May next, 1860.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to that.

Mr. VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

MILEAGE OF EX-SENATOR LINN.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mr. E. A. Linn, widow of the Hon. Lewis F. Linn, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, the mileage at the special sessions in 1857 and 1861, not reserved by the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. It appropriates money out of the contingent fund, and must go through the same proceedings as a bill. If there be no objection, the resolution will be read a second time.

The resolution was read a second time, and ordered to a third reading. It was read the third time.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me the resolution ought to go to some committee, to examine it.

Mr. GREEN. There is no necessity for a reference to any committee. It is a mere matter of account. The Senator himself, I believe, received the same mileage. Nine tenths of the Senators died. Doctor Linn, out of extreme excitement, nearly lost it remain until he died. Now, I think, his poor widow ought to have it.

The resolution was passed.

BILL BECOME A LAW.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. ECHMAN, his Secretary, announced that the President had signed and approved, on the 19th instant, an act (S. No. 329) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Pearson, deceased.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 10) declaratory of the acts for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] well remarked that the bill before the Senate is one of considerable importance. If I understand its effect, it involves an appropriation of a sum for the payment of certain claimants, not far, if anything, short of two million dollars. The claim is one of long standing, and although the amount involved is large, if it be right and just that these parties should receive the amount, it is proper that this bill should pass without any further delay; but if it is not right, if the claim is not founded in justice, then it is equally important that the Government should be relieved from the payment of so large a sum.

Now, sir, if what has been said by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] and the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] be true; if this whole case has passed into judgment; if by the action of the legislative as well as the judicial department of the Government we are concluded in not taking any action upon this matter at all, except to pay the demand, all debate and all examination of the case is perfectly idle. If it be true, as they have stated here, that all the departments of the Government have sanctioned this claim, it is a little remarkable, if it at least argues nothing for the justice of this Government, that for more than forty years they have withheld the payment of a just claim. Can it then be true? For one, I do not believe it. As one of the Committee on Claims, it became my duty somewhat to examine into this matter, and having satisfied myself that the gentlemen are mistaken in the representations they make here, and that in point of fact these claimants have no just right to ask of the Government this very large sum of money, I shall undertake, on the present occasion, to give some of the reasons that influenced me in coming to that conclusion; and, in doing so, I shall address myself to the following propositions:

First. That the claims now the subject of discussion are not in fact and in truth within the provisions of the treaty made in the year 1819 with Spain.

Second. That there is nothing in this past legislation of Congress, or in the acts of this Government in any of its departments, to conclude Congress from now passing on the merits of this question.

Third. That even assuming that the claimants were provided for by the treaty, or, if not by the treaty, that they were provided for by the act of 1834, and thus became entitled to satisfaction for injuries to their property, they have now no just claim upon this Government, having already been paid more than they were entitled in justice to receive.

Mr. President, as the Senate was somewhat this yesterday when it was addressed at much length by the Senator from Georgia and I have said, I shall be excused for repeating somewhat at large the history of these claims. What is that history? It appears that in the year 1811, in the month of January, a joint resolution was passed by Congress, authorizing the President, in the event of two contingencies, to take possession of the Florida. The first was, in case it could be done with the sanction of the local Spanish government; and the other contingency was, in case the territory should be seized upon by some foreign Government. The sum of $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of enabling the President to carry into effect the resolution of Congress. Soon after the passage of that joint resolution, and in the same month of January, 1811, General Matthews, of Georgia, was appointed by the President to carry out these two contingencies, in case either of these contingencies should arise. The resolution was a secret one; it was not made public. From that time until the year following there was no invasion of Florida whatever; but in the month of March, and I believe about the 15th of March, 1812, General Matthews, with a small force of United States troops, and a portion of the militia of Georgia, crossed the St. Mary's river, and entered Florida. The instructions of General Matthews, given to him by the Secretary of State, on the 26th of January, 1811, were precisely in conformity to the resolution, which passed Congress, and the contents of which I have already stated. He was instructed not to enter the territory, except upon the happening of one or the other of these two contingencies. Having entered the territory in March, 1812, there being then no objection on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of that territory, called patriots, he rapidly proceeded to take possession of Amelia Island, and the town or city of Fernandina, passed over the country lying upon the St. John's river, and on the 25th of March entered the city of St. Augustine, and as soon as the Government ascertained what he had done, they disapproved of his acts, and on the 4th of April, 1812, he was notified of that fact, and was recalled.

I am giving the dates in relation to this invasion, because I think they will be found to be material in some of the views which I shall present hereafter. On the 10th of April, 1812, Governor Mitchell, of Georgia, was appointed in his stead to carry out the views of the Government with instructions—I have all these instructions here, though I cannot read them now—to remove the troops from Florida as soon as practicable, but not to remove them finally and entirely until some arrangement was made by which an amnesty should be declared on the part of the Spanish Government to the patriot inhabitants of Florida who had joined the American forces in making this incursion. That final arrangement was not made until the month of May, 1812, or thereabouts, when the troops were withdrawn; but I think it must be apparent to any one who will examine into the facts and history of this matter, that active operations in East Florida ceased on the part of the American forces, as well as of the patriots, soon after the displacement of General Matthews, which, as I have already stated, was done by a letter from the Secretary of State, dated April 4, 1812. A portion of the troops were there after withdrawal; but a portion of them, together with the gun-boats in the St. John's, were retained there for the purpose of bringing about this amnesty. They ceased, however, to carry on active operations against the Spanish authorities or the Spanish people.

While this state of things was going on, it seems that the Spanish Government called on the Indians to take part in these difficulties, and it is stated that they were not very particular as to the property they destroyed, or whose it was; whether it belonged to the loyal Spanish subjects, to the patriots, or to others; and to some extent, perhaps, the destruction of property by such a force as that was indiscriminate. I have stated that the American troops were finally withdrawn in the month of May, 1812. They occupy a portion of East Florida from early in the month of March, 1812, until May, 1812; but active operations ceased in April, 1812, or soon thereafter.

Then, Mr. President, there was another branch of the case, relative to the claims of 1814. They arose out of an invasion of the western portion of the Territory of Florida by General Jackson, who crossed over the line and displaced the British, who had taken possession of Pensacola, and were aiding and assisting, and inciting the Indians to cross our frontier. The troops were shortly after withdrawn. Again, in the summer of the Creek war, General Jackson again crossed the Florida line, went as far as Pensacola and St. Mark's, with a view of breaking up the Indians and negroes who were congregated there, and who were producing difficulties and getting up incursions across the line into the United States territory.

There, then, sir, are the three classes of claimants who have, from time to time, sought relief from this Government on account of these invasions, and the alleged destruction of property by them and by the United States troops—known as the claims of 1812, those of 1814, and those of 1818. Before the last invasion, that of 1818, there had been much correspondence, and many proposals submitted between the two Governments for a treaty of amity and commerce, and for the settlement of these various claims; and claims which citizens of the United States had against Spain, as well as claims which Spanish subjects had against the United States. A treaty was finally made on the 24th of February, 1819, by which the claims were ceded to the United States, and by which the United States, in consideration of that cession, agreed to settle the Spanish boundary on the south, leaving to Spain the whole of Texas, and assumed to pay to citizens of the United States the sum of $5,000,000, for which a loan was to be raised, and the claimants were allowed to go before that board, and have their claims, whatever they might be, examined and settled.

It is under the ninth article of this treaty that the present claimants come before Congress, and ask to be allowed the same relief as is proposed to appropriate by this bill. In 1823, after the treaty was ratified, Congress passed an act for the purpose of carrying this treaty into effect, and by it the judges of the superior courts of the Territory of Florida were authorized to take evidence upon the subject, and to hear the parties, and to report a statement of what they ascertained or found to be due, with the evidence, to the Secretary of the Treasury; and, if he found that the claims were just and equitable under the treaty, he was authorized to settle them, and pay the amount so ascertained out of any money in the Treasury. The first claims reported were those of 1814, by Jonathan Blackford, Judge of the District Court, I think, it seems, whether the claims of 1814 were within the treaty. He did not report them absolutely due; but they were sent to the Treasury Department. The matter was submitted to Mr. Crawford, who was the Secretary of the Treasury at that time, and he reported that the claims of 1814 were not within the provisions of the treaty. Subsequently to that time, Judge Smith, the judge in East Florida, reported a number of claims for damages by the invasion of 1812, amounting to some forty-one thousand dollars. This, I think, was in the year 1824 or 1825. Mr. Rush being then Secretary of the Treasury, the claims were presented to him for settlement. They were, likewise, held by Mr. Rush and the then Administrator of the land office, under the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819.

Such being held to be the construction of the treaty by the administrations of Mr. Monroe and of Mr. Adams, these parties came before Congress a second time, and induced Congress to pass an act, in 1826, under which the claims of 1812 set up their claim to damages, and under which they now claim that we are concluded from investigating their claim as to the interest. I shall have more to say of that act hereafter; I am now merely giving a narrative of the facts, in order to present to you the whole of the subject.

When the judge of East Florida came to act on these matters a second time, under the law of 1824, he reported a number of claims to Mr. Woodbury, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, allowing damages for the property which it was said he had destroyed, and for the interest on the value of the property, as ascertained by him, from the time of its destruction. When the cases were presented to Mr. Woodbury, he disallowed the interest, and, in some instances, he disallowed the principal of the claims. He settled the claims in the manner he supposed to be just and right, according to the evidence—for the judge was required to report the evidence to him—and there was supposed to be an end of the matter. However, sir, these parties were not satisfied with the result, and they presented the matter to the Senator from Georgia, telling us that they have made continual claim; and I believe such is the fact. They have never ceased to clamor for the payment of these claims. There is here a very large amount in controversy, so as to justify the employment of the very first and ablest counsel in the land; and I admit they have made continual claim; they make claim now, and they have always done so, and probably will do, until Congress either pays the amount or gets rid of it by some other means.

Failing before Mr. Woodbury, they went before Congress a third time. They asked for further legislation on the subject. The matter was referred to a committee of this body, and the committee reported that no further legislation was necessary, and that for as Congress was concerned the matter was dropped for the time. What next? They went to Mr. Corwin, when he was Secretary of the Treasury; they induced him to reopen these claims—rather an extraordinary proceeding, I think. In one of the cases now presented to us, in the report which is on my table, he requested the matter and undertook to readjust it to the principal which had been allowed by one of his predecessors, and increased the amount; and he not only did that, but, with a view of enabling the claimants to get a better price, he caused the Court of the United States, he sent all the claims back to Florida, submitted them there to the district judge of the United States for the State of Florida, as some of the claimants were authorized to do by a subsequent act, and invited his decision and report, and the district judge was required to appear before the judge on behalf of the United States. That was done, and that case, which was referred to yesterday between the honorable Senator from Louisiana and the honorable Senator from Georgia, the case of Ferreira, administrator of the estate of Ferreira, was brought before the Court of the United States. The judge in Florida reaffirmed the decision which had been made by his predecessor, and then, on behalf of the United States, an appeal was taken.

After the case reached the Supreme Court of the United States, it was insisted, on the part of the claimants, that the court had no jurisdiction of the matter; and that, says the Senator from Georgia, is all that the Supreme Court of the United States decided in the case. Well, sir, we shall see something about that before I get through. I think the court decided, and decided fully and emphatically, that the idea advanced by these claimants, that the mere award of the judges in Florida entitled the men to payment of the amount awarded, was unfounded; but that the award of the judges in Florida was not of itself binding on the Government, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had a supervisory power, and was made the final arbiter; and that his decision, whatever it was, was final and conclusive under the treaty and under the law. Such was the decision of the court in the case of Ferreira, as reported in 13 Howard.

What did these parties do then? Not satisfied with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on that point, they went before the Court of Claims, and made the same point before that court, that the awards of the Florida judges were final and conclusive, that they were judgments or decrees, and that the claimants had a right to rely on them. I think the court in Florida had been reported by the Florida judges. What did the Court of Claims decide? Upon the case, as originally presented, Judge Blackford delivered the opinion of a majority of the court. The case was brought before the court a second time on a review, and the chief justice delivered the opinion. It is intimated here, if I understand gentlemen, that a majority of the court, that all the judges who gave an opinion, said that interest ought to be paid; that it was due; that it was conferred under the treaty, and under the law of 1824. Confessing that, I think I can find nothing of that kind in the decision of the Court of Claims. On the contrary, a majority of the court sustained in so many words, referring to it, the decision made by the Supreme Court, and held that these parties had no right to rely on the interest reported by the Government, and that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury was final and conclusive of the whole matter. After this decision, having failed in every respect to get the interest, either from Congress or from the Departments or from the Court of Claims, they now ask that interest be paid, and they now ask that this bill may be passed for that benefit, involving the amount which I have stated.

Mr. TOOMBS. Did I understand the Senator to say that the Court of Claims decided that they were not entitled to interest by the treaty and the law?

Mr. BRAGG. I undertake to say this: The Court of Claims were asked to decide that they were entitled to the interest, and the Court of Claims refused to do so. The Secretary of the Treasury was final and conclusive.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is a mistake. My statement was, that two of the judges had declared emphatically that they were entitled to interest under the treaty. That is the record. I read their opinions, and I think they are correct. The decision is before me, and can be read. It is a very important legal fact.

Mr. BRAGG. I think Judge Scarburgh did express that opinion.

Mr. TOOMBS. And so did Judge Gilchrist.

Mr. BRAGG. I think so.

Mr. TOOMBS. Judge Scarburgh held with the claimants on both points. He held that the court had jurisdiction, and that the claim was just. Judge Gilchrist held that interest was due, and that the court had no jurisdiction. The other judge said he could not claim, and he said whether they were entitled to interest, but simply decided that the court had no jurisdiction. That is the way I stated it. That is their decision; and it is before me now.

Mr. BRAGG. The decision will show. Perhaps I have said something to say on that matter before I get through.

I have said, Mr. President, that in my humble opinion these claims are not within the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819. We were told by the honorable Senator from Florida yesterday, that by reference to the fourth volume of American State Papers, it would appear that even before General Jackson made the invasion of 1818 it had been agreed to on the part of Mr. Adams the American negotiator, and the Spanish negotiator, Don Onís, that damages for all the various matters then pending between the two Governments—I have not been able to find anything of the kind. I can find propositions to that effect. I can find that, at one time, some of them were accepted and some of them were objected to. But looking through the whole correspondence, up to the ultimatum of Mr. Adams, which was delivered in the latter part of the year 1818, I can find nothing like an agreement between them that anything of the kind was to be done. I admit that it was insisted upon by the Spanish Minister; but many things were insisted upon on both sides. There were propositions and counterpropositions. Some were agreed to for the time being; others were rejected; but, of course, unless all the propositions were agreed to, no one of them was binding. They were put forward and counter propositions, as I have already stated.

Finally, in the month of February, 1819, this treaty came to be made, and upon the basis, as I think the correspondence will show, that there was to be a mutual renunciation by both parties of all claims which either one had against the other. This being the case, they proceeded to draw up the treaty; and when we come to see how the ninth article got into the treaty, we find that, at the eleventh hour, as it were—at the last moment—the proposition came from Mr. De Onís, which was made known to by the honorable Senator from Florida yesterday, and which was read by him, and of which I have a copy before me. This proposition was on the 16th of February, 1819, and the treaty was concluded on the 22d of February:

"The above-mentioned articles of the treaty, which was the claim of the American Minister—

"Mr. De Onís adds that the United States will satisfy all the just claims which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Florida may have upon them, in consequence of the invasion of 1818, and that they may be satisfied by the proceedings of the American Army, as is customary with the citizens of the United States under similar circumstances."

It is in this grave omission in that part of the ninth article of the treaty, which has been the cause of so much difficulty as to its construction, and it is insisted that this proposition on the part of Mr. De Onís covers all the claims which any of these parties might have on account of the three invasions of Florida by the United States; but I deny it, sir. I say the honorable Senator is loose out in no such construction, in my humble opinion. "All the just claims," it is said, "which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Florida may have upon them, in consequence of the invasion of 1818, and that they may be satisfied by the proceedings of the American Army." What all claims? Claims for damages occasioned "by the operations and proceedings of the American army"—not of the American army, but of the American army in the singular. In the margin it is said that there was written, in the hands of Mr. De Onís, opposite this proposition, the word "agreed." Then follows the treaty itself, as finally agreed upon and signed by the respective plenipotentiaries. As a part of article nine of the treaty, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the last two clauses:

"And the high contracting parties, respectively, renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the United States."

"The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be found to have been suffered by the Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida."

I know it is said that the word "late" is not to be found in the Spanish version of the treaty; but the clause immediately above that, in which there is a mutual renunciation of "all claims to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders," is to be read in the identical same words in both the Spanish and English versions. Here, then, was a full renunciation of all claims. I know it is insisted that the indemnity intended to be stipulated for, and in fact stipulated for, was as large as the renunciation; but that by no means follows. The parties might have renounced without any stipulation for indemnity. There were a great many propositions for indemnity, and for the payment of claims on both sides. The Spanish government, if some were insisted upon; and it does not follow that because there was a renunciation broad enough to carry all these claims, therefore all were to be paid by the American Government, to Spanish subjects. But the clause which I first read goes to show that the word "late" is to be read "recent events;" and the clause which follows it uses in substance the same language when it speaks of "the late operations of the American army in Florida;" again using the singular, showing that the operations of one army were intended to be provided for, and not of the several armies which had invaded Florida.

Such, Mr. President, in brief, is my construction of that part of the treaty. What was the construction of it at the time, and shortly after it was made? We are told now, forty years after the treaty was made, that that is not the true construction. Let us see what was the construction put upon it by the administration of Mr. Monroe, under whom this treaty was negotiated? I have already stated what the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Crawford, has been. It is doubted that he submitted the whole matter to the Cabinet and to the President of that day? What was the construction subsequently put upon it during the administration of Mr. Adams, who himself negotiated the treaty, when Mr. Rush, as his Secretary, refused to pay the claims of 1812 as being outside the ninth article of the treaty? Undoubtedly, the whole Administration sanctioned such a construction; there can be no question about that. I am aware that it is said—it has been said here, it is said in the report which was made yesterday—that in coming to this conclusion Mr. Rush merely applied the decision of Mr. Crawford to the claims of 1812, the former decision as to the claims of 1814 being a precedent; and the honorable Senator from Florida told us that the decision of the Government had been called to the language of the Spanish version of the treaty; but in that it is totally mistaken.

Mr. MALLORY. Of what time is the Senator now speaking?

Mr. BRAGG. Before Mr. Rush made his decision.

Mr. MALLORY. The first time the discrepancy in the two versions of the treaty was noticed, was in the argument of the Delegate from Florida, (Mr. White,) I think.

Mr. BRAGG. When was that?

Mr. MALLORY. In 1832 or 1833.

Mr. BRAGG. I am sure the honorable Senator has not examined the matter with his usual industry. He is incorrect about that.

Mr. MALLORY. I do not look out that fact as a defect; in all, one way or the other. That was my own impression, however.

Mr. BRAGG. It may not be important; but let us see how the fact was. What does the report of the Committee on Claims say? It declares:

"When the decision of the judges of East Florida, in the case of the United States vs. the Spanish Officers, in the years 1812 and 1813, were reported to the Treasury, Mr. Secretary Bland, the successor of Mr. Crawford, applied the same decision to those claims; and the honorable States had never attempted to justify that invasion as authorized by the law of nations, as they did the invasions of the 18th of West Florida, by rejecting."

Thus the report declares that Mr. Crawford's decision was applied to the case merely because it had furnished a precedent, leaving the inference that that decision was not right in itself. Well now, sir, what does Mr. Rush say in relation to this? He says that he has already stated that the honorable Senator from Florida said in relation to the Spanish version of the treaty and the attention of our Government had been called to it. I have before me an elaborate argument submitted by the Delegate from Florida (Mr. White) to Mr. Rush, in which all these points are specifically raised for the consideration of the Secretary of the Treasury, before his decision was made. I cannot take time to read that argument in full, but it can be found in the volume which I hold in my hand, entitled Report of Mr. Forsyth, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, to which report it was appended. The letter in reply of Mr. Rush, however, on this particular point, is very short, and I will read it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 16, 1863.

Sir: I received, and have not failed to lay before the President, your communication of the 30th of last month, relative to the construction of the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, of the 22d of February, 1819.

I am directed to state to you, in reply, that the President's opinion is, that the article in question does not embrace claims for injuries suffered prior to the conclusion of the treaty; and that it was the opinion of the President, by the Government during the late Administration, at which time the question was fully considered.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

RICHARD RUSH.

Hon. JOSEPH M. WHITE, Delegate from Florida.

How, then, did Mr. Rush apply the decision of Mr. Crawford to this matter? According to this letter of Mr. Rush, the whole matter was fully considered by both Administrations, and they came to the conclusion that these claims were not within the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty, and therefore disallowed them.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will ask the Senator if the President then was not Mr. Adams, who negotiated the treaty?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly; Mr. Adams, who negotiated the treaty, and who was Secretary of State under Mr. Monroe, was then President. I say this letter was sent to Mr. Adams, and that this matter was considered, and fully considered; and upon full argument, by the Delegate from Florida, who followed it up with great zeal and great ability, and who took all the grounds that are now presented here in relation to the Spanish version of this treaty, and its construction in the English version. He presented all the grounds that have been presented since; and, notwithstanding that, both these Administrations decided that these claims were not within the treaty. Perhaps it may be among other things very grave about the matter; it may be thought by some that we are wiser in this day and generation of ours than they were; but for one, I am unwilling, unless for very good reasons, better than I have heard here, to depart from the decisions which were then made, first by the Administration that negotiated the treaty, and immediately following it by the Administration of which the man who negotiated the treaty was the head, and who decided, upon solemn consideration of the whole question, that these claims were not within it.

Now, sir, we come to the other. It was said by both the Senators who addressed the Senate yesterday, that after these decisions on the part of Mr. Crawford and Mr. Rush, the parties went before Congress, and Congress passed an act in 1834, after full consideration, overruling the decision of the Secretaries, and its differing from the claims of 1812 were within the treaty, and should be paid. There is another great mistake. In my humble judgment, Congress intended to do such thing. We were told by the honorable Senator from Georgia, among other things, that a great number of reports had been made in favor of these claims, and of their being within the treaty, in the opinion of several committees. He named particularly Mr. Everett, who he said made a report of that kind as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the other House. In making that statement, the honorable Senator was entirely mistaken. Mr. Everett made no such report.

Mr. TOOMBS. He reported in favor of the claims.

Mr. BRAGG. But not because they were within the treaty. Immediately after the decision of Mr. Rush, they went before the House of Representatives, and from year to year the matter was pending, and several reports were made. What were they? In the first place, I have a report made by Mr. Forsyth, which I have already read, because I have already taken up too much of the time of the body in this discussion; but the report of Mr. Forsyth, as chairman of the committee, enters into a discussion of the very question as to the construction of the treaty, both in the English and in the Spanish version, and he concludes that these claims are not within the provisions of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819. That report was made in 1826. In 1827 Mr. Wickliffe, the chairman of the same committee in the House, submitted another report, not so lengthy, but containing the report of Mr. Forsyth, which he submitted at the previous Congress. Then, in 1829, we have the report of Mr. Everett, from the same committee. What does Mr. Everett say? That these claims were within the treaty? That they were provided for by the ninth article? No, sir; nothing of the kind. He mentions what had been the dispute in relation to it, and he says it would be useless to enter into a criticism about the words contained in the English version of the treaty and not contained in the Spanish version. He expresses no opinion whatever, as to whether the claims were within the treaty or not, but what does he do? He records, and, inasmuch as the claims were not large, that the Government, in its liberality, should allow their payment, and should appropriate money for that purpose. Why? Because the acquisition of Florida was a matter of great importance to us, and the inhabitants there, who were formerly Spanish subjects, had now become a part of our own people; and hence he thought it was better for the Government to act liberally towards these claimants, and pay them; and one of the reasons stated was, because the amount was not large. They then amounted, I think, to only some forty-one thousand dollars. That is what Mr. Everett's report said. I have here the very language which he uses; and I will read it:

"The committee forbear to pursue a verbal discussion of this question, necessarily involving the merits of the claims."

That was in relation to the language used in the two versions of the treaty. Mr. Everett says further in his report:

"The committee are disposed strongly to recommend a liberal course, and this they do with more confidence, as the amount involved does not appear to involve individuals, in its importance to the United States bears no comparison with the beneficial consequences of the cession of Florida. The whole amount of claims awarded provisionally by the judge of the superior court of East Florida was $41,864. Claims to a much larger amount were presented, but rejected for various causes set forth in the record."

Again, speaking of the importance of the acquisition of Florida and the troubles which had grown out of its possession by a foreign Government, he says:

"A final termination has been pursued to these embarrassments, the inhabitants of Florida have been declared citizens of the United States; and the committee think it just and expedient, by the adoption of a liberal policy, to remove from any remaining ground of complaint the people of Florida. To effect this object, they have reported a bill making provision for the payment of acts of the claims awarded by the judge of the East Florida court, and the committee think it just and expedient for the Secretary of the Treasury, and affording an opportunity to those who have claims to present their claims to the same judges for examination."

The bill then reported, in 1829, was the one that was passed in 1834, I believe. No further action, however, seems to have taken place at that session; but in 1830 Mr. Archer, from the same committee, made a report; he again made a report in 1832; and again in 1834. On examination, it will be found that these reports are all identical. And what was the report which was made by the committee at the head of which was Mr. Archer, in 1830, 1832, and 1834? Does that report say that these claims were within the treaty of 1819? It is very easy to see how it was that this legislation took place. He says this:

"An attempt has been made by the Delegate from Florida, before the committee all present, and in a former year, to show that the construction of the treaty was erroneous, and that the cases under review are comprehended in the provision for relief stipulated by the treaty. The committee, without going into a verbal discussion of this opinion, esteem it only necessary to express their dissent from it, concerning in that which has been adopted at the Treasury."

Mr. Archer's report then proceeds:

"In this view they would have to pronounce unfavorably on both clauses of the claims under examination."

For at that time the claims of 1814 were under examination as well as those of 1812.

"In relation to those deriving from the transactions of 1812 and 1813, however, a further view suggests itself. The United States, at that period, were at peace with Spain. Neither of the consequences mentioned in the treaty was warranting invasion into Florida, and in the contemplation of the act or the other of which the act of Congress authorizing the occupation has been passed, no injury occurred. The intrusion stands, therefore, on no ground to exempt the participants, either by action or inaction, from responsibility for injuries sustained. It is a plain case of invasion. It is true that the Government of the United States disavowed the proceeding of General Matthews, and disavowed him from command. It is also true that he was the commissioner of the Government, in command of its troops, acting in its name, and understood by the inhabitants of the province to be its agent. It is true that, although this officer was displaced, another was substituted to the command, the forces of the United States retained for a considerable time in the province, and only withdrawn eventually in virtue of terms of compact directed and sanctioned by the Government, providing indemnities for the portion of the population which had been in association with the Government. The committee cannot be responsible for injuries sustained from the operations of this force, by the population which, taking no part in the public disturbances, preserved fidelity to the Spanish authorities."

They do so extend this opinion, however, to the cases growing out of the transactions in 1812 in West Florida, placed, as they conceive, in a very different predicament."

They go on then, and give their reasons for that opinion, the principal one being that the invasion proceeded from the United States, and they reported a bill in accordance with those views.

Thus it will be seen, Mr. President, that in all these reports, with the exception of that of Mr. Everett, in which he leaves it an open question, before the passage of the act of 1834, the ground was distinctly taken that these claims were not within the provisions of the treaty of 1819. As to the position taken by Mr. Archer and others, that the Government was responsible for the damages to which the inhabitants of Florida were subjected by the invasion of 1812, it seems to me that, although Congress appears to have acted on that suggestion, the parties had no claim to it whatever; because, by the express provision of the treaty, there was a renunciation on both sides of all claims whatever by any acts of the kind, and the law of nations, which is the foundation of all liability, must undertake to pay the claimants, they had no just claim against the Government, either under the treaty or outside of it. But, however that may be, these committees reported a bill. What was the bill? It is said here now that that bill was passed upon full consideration, and for the very purpose of overruling the decision which had been made by the Secretary of the Treasury. I think that is a total mistake. It will be remembered that the title of the act of 1823 was: "An act to settle the claims of the United States and Spain on the 23d day of February, 1819."

Pray, sir, what was the title of the act of 1834, reported by Mr. Archer, not to carry out the treaty, but to pay these parties, because the United States, under the law of nations, had no claim to it, and had done them this damage? The title of the act is, "An act for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida." I have had the curiosity to look up the original bill, as reported by the committee, and I say now that the act as reported, although the title was changed by the committee, saving and excepting, that there was another section in the bill reported by the committee, providing that five dollars a day should be paid to the judge for his services when acting upon these claims, and that the salary of the United States should receive a full amount, and should be required to appear before the judge, and defend the interests of the United States. Unfortunately, as it has turned out, that section seems to have been dropped, and what has occurred since, goes to show the impolicy of having such an ex parte examination of claims, which take into consideration the fact that what was thought then to be a small claim, and a very small matter, has swelled up to be an enormously great claim, and, in fact, and in truth, instead of $41,000 being all that was then considered, it has swelled up to be the principal about one million one hundred thousand dollars of these claims, and the parties are now asking for interest. I say it was unfortunate that that provision was stricken out; but, with that exception, the bill as reported—reported not to carry out the treaty, but for the purpose of paying these claimants, on the ground I have stated—was identical with the act that was passed by the Congress of 1834.

I know it is said that this act was intended to carry out the treaty and overrule the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have shown what the report was, and what was the purpose for which the bill was drawn. What is there in the act itself that goes to show that it was to carry out the provisions of the treaty? Nothing at all. The act then provided that the claims which had been passed upon—and which, I have already stated, amounted to about forty-one thousand dollars—should be paid; and the next section merely provided the means of ascertaining what these damages were. It did not undertake to declare that these claims were within the treaty; but it said that they should be ascertained as if they were in the treaty, for that is the effect of it. This judge in Florida were required to examine into the matter, as they were required to do by the act of 1823. It was merely, therefore, to ascertain what persons were to receive, and what amount they ought to receive, on the basis reported for by the committee, and on the basis of the act, and the act was intended for no other purpose. It is said that this act was passed after full deliberation, and for the purpose of overruling Mr. Rush's decision. The same thing is stated in this report, and that is a good many things are assumed, and which are mistakes. It is declared in the present report:

"The claims for injuries in 1819 and 1812 therefore petitioned Congress for relief against this erroneous construction of the treaty, and Congress, by the act of March 2d, 1834, overruled the decision of Mr. Secretary Rush, that the injuries of 1812 and 1813 were not within the provisions of the treaty of 1819, by the passage of the act of June 26, 1834."

It is said that Congress by that act overruled the decision of the Secretary. I think I have shown that such was not the intention of the reporters of the act. The act is just as it came from the committee, with the exception I have already stated. When gentlemen say such was the intent, I ask for the evidence. I say the act itself does not furnish it—neither its provisions, nor its title, nor anything in connection with it. As to the matter having received free consideration, I think it is needless to say anything more. The facts, they will find that it received very little consideration. In this body, not a word was said on the subject, as far as I can find by examining the debates. In the other House, very little was said upon the subject. It seemed to have been passed as an act of courtesy to these parties, if I must say so, who had been very troublesome, as an act of liberality to get rid of them. And pray, sir, what were the inducements to the passage of the act? The honorable Senator from Georgia said yesterday, and it has been said by Colonel White declared that the amount involved was only some forty-one thousand dollars, but that Colonel White never said so. Now, sir, what did Colonel White say; for that is about all that can be found in the debates? Here is what he did say: "I do not doubt that the amount of claims in the other House in the passage of the bill. I read from the Congressional Globe of the Twenty-third Congress, volumes one and two, page 428:

"On motion of Mr. Warr, the bill for the relief of certain inhabitants of East Florida was read."

"Mr. Warr moved that the amount of the claims provided for by this bill."

"Mr. Warr said they would not exceed $40,000. He then called for the read of the report of the committee, relative to these claims."

"Mr. Warr said he could explain these claims in less time than the reading of the report would require."

"Mr. W. went into a statement of the occupation of East Florida by the United States in 1811, and the nature of the claims arising out of this occupation."

"After a few remarks between Messrs. McKay and Warr, the bill was laid aside."

There are some of us here who knew Mr. McKay; and he was pretty sharp upon claimants, I admit. He was chairman at that time, I believe, of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House—a just man, though a strict one."

Mr. TOMBS. It was afterwards that Mr. Warr was chairman."

Mr. BRAGG. But at all events, he was a member of the House. Perhaps it was subsequently that he was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The question was put, what is the amount of claims provided for by the bill? How much money is to be appropriated now? But what is the amount of all the claims that are to be provided for by the bill, not only in the first section, which, as I have stated, provided for the payment of the actual amount which had been reported by the judge of East Florida? He also in the second section, such provided for the payment of such amounts as might be ascertained thereafter, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury? And to that question Mr. White said they would not exceed $40,000.

There are some circumstances under which that bill passed the other House; yet it is said that we are concluded now by that act of 1834. Can it be said that Congress, after solemn consideration, overruled the decisions of the two administrations of Monroe and Adams? Why, sir, everything that was said in the other House, as I have stated, was passed; the act itself shows that such was not the intention of Congress; but it was merely in their liberality to pay a class of men whom it was thought the United States had improperly injured, illegally injured—if the Senator will have it so—and not because they had any legal claim on the Government after the renunciation of all claims whatever in the treaty of 1819.

But, there is one fact connected with that view of the case which I wish to present, and which I think will have an important bearing on the intent of Congress in this legislation of 1834. If Congress intended by that act to declare solemnly, upon consideration, that the claims of 1812 were within the treaty, how does it happen that the Senator be so good enough to explain hereafter how it happens—that the claims of 1814 never have been paid by Congress, and no law has ever been passed for their payment? If the intention of the act was to hold that the claims of 1812 were within the treaty, why not the claims of 1814? They had been reported upon, had been urged at this very time, and the decision of Mr. Crawford was applied to them, that the invasion of 1814 was just, under the circumstances, and could be justified under the laws of nations, and therefore that was one reason why they were not within the treaty. How did it happen, if Congress intended to overturn all these decisions of the Secretaries and to overrule them, that the claims of 1814 have not been paid, as well as those of 1812?

Mr. TOOMBS. If the Senator will allow me, I will answer that. Congress did not overrule the decision as to the claims of 1814; but if you read the second section of the act of 1834, you will find that they did expressly do so as to the claims of 1812. The reason was, that one was within the law of nations, and the other against it. Congress provided for those damages suffered by an invasion that was against the law of nations, and not for those which were in accordance with the law of nations; and did right in both cases. That is my reply.

Mr. BRAGG. The honorable Senator does not seem to take my point. Here in a treaty which, it is insisted, bound the United States to pay damages for all these invasions. Do I understand that the Senator now says that the claims of 1814 have no claim on the Government under the treaty?

Mr. TOOMBS. I have not argued that. Mr. BRAGG. I know the Senator has not argued it; but I put that point. I understand him to insist that they are all entitled—the claimants of 1812, 1814, and 1815. I understand him to say that he decided, by the act of 1834, that the claims of 1812 were within the treaty; not that they were to be paid merely because the invasion was wrongful, or because they had just claim on the Government without regard to the treaty; but that they were paid, he says, under the act, because Congress chose to consider them as within the treaty. According to that view, how does it happen that Congress has never considered the claims of 1814 as within the treaty? How can it be consistent? Mr. TOOMBS. Congress considered the claims of 1812 within the treaty, and that the other was not.

Mr. BRAGG. You can only reconcile the two positions by saying that, in point of fact, Congress, in 1834, by its legislation did not intend to allow the claims under the treaty, but intended to allow them on the ground I have stated, as a piece of liberality on the part of the Government, as stated by Mr. Everett and by Mr. Archer, on the ground that the invasion of 1812 was a mere trespass on the part of the Government, and that they had nothing to do with it. You cannot reconcile the action of Congress in any other way. The legislation of 1834 was not passed because these claims were within the treaty, for if they were within the treaty, then all were under the treaty; and that is what the Government has done, against the claims of 1814, and from that day to this, although there have been attempts as late as 1852, by reports from Mr. Westcott and others, to get in the claims of 1814, Congress has applied to them the decision which Mr. Crawford first made the year 1824. I should not consider it a compliment that Congress has solemnly decided the matter, and that we are concluded by it, and that we cannot go behind the act of 1834. Congress decided nothing of the kind. Even if they had decided an act for that purpose appropriate to the part of the claim, it should not constitute a binding on me, for, if I thought the claim unjust, when the balance was sought to be paid.

Well, sir, if these claims are not within the treaty—and that I have endeavored to show—what pretense is there now that Congress, after having passed an act of that kind, in 1834, out of its liberality, should be called on to pay interest in the time these awards were made? None whatever. But, Mr. President, I will not labor that point any longer; I will hasten on with what I have to say.

The last point which I make is this: even supposing these claims to be within the treaty, or to have been provided for by the legislation of 1834, precisely in the same manner as if they were within the treaty, then, in my opinion, nothing ought to be appropriated for them now, for the reason that I believe, and hope to be able to show, that the claimants have already received more than they were entitled to receive for the damages which they sustained. I shall not go into a discussion of the question of interest, which was very much mooted before the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court, as a question under the laws of nations. I shall not discuss the question whether full satisfaction meant the value of the property destroyed with interest on it, or not. I am willing to concede that; to admit that where full satisfaction has not been obtained by allowing a sum in the aggregate which would compensate the party, then interest may be allowed. It may be allowed at common law, but it does not necessarily follow; the amount does not necessarily draw interest; and it may be allowed under the laws of nations. I am free to confess, too, that there are many instances in which our Government has claimed and received interest. But nevertheless, if these claimants have already received an amount which, at the time they received it was as large as they ought to have received, if it covered the amount of the damages which they actually sustained, without interest, then it cannot be very material to determine here whether, under the laws of nations, the parties are entitled to interest or not.

I have already referred to what Mr. White, the Delegate from Florida, said as to the amount of the damages. We were the persons who were to receive this compensation? They were Spanish officers and subjects. Who did receive it? The probability is, as I shall endeavor to show, from the number of claimants who presented claims, and the amount claimed, that everybody who was injured in that patriotic and loyal invasion, and all, have come to the Treasury and have received from it very liberal and very large amounts. The Senator from Georgia read the other day a highly-wrought picture drawn by one of the judges who sat upon these claims—Judge Bronson, the last who was there. It sounded to me more like the rhetorical flourish of an advocate than the opinion of a judge. There are three specimens of that kind here from three different judges; one which compared the destruction in the invasion of 1812 to the destruction of the city of Hyder Ali. I will read what the first one said—Judge Smith, who was the earliest judge that sat upon these claims that are now in controversy; the judge in East Florida, who was succeeded by Mr. Rice, who decided a great many of them. Judge Smith was a pretty statesman, a lover of the state of things there, but not quite equal to that which was read by the Senator. He says:

"It has been fully proved by the testimony which, in various cases, has been adduced before me, that in the year 1812, the United States, by the aid of the citizens of the United States, despoiled patriots."

I call the attention of the Senate to that. It was invaded from the United States by persons denominated patriots—

"principally from Georgia, and also by the regular troops which formed the army of the United States; that these troops, in the year 1812, invaded the State of Florida, north and west of Augustine, and on the banks of the St. Johns, and committed to take part therein, or to abandon their plantations."

"It has been further proved that the cattle, horses, swine, and other property of the plantations of the patriots, were, during this invasion, almost without exception, destroyed, dispersed, and lost to the owners; that the property of the patriots, consisting of many plantations, was wholly destroyed, sometimes having been previously abandoned by their owners, and at others the owners having retained their plantations, and then abandoned them."

One purpose I had in view in reading this, was to show that the judge who first sat upon these claims states that these patriots, who were spoken of here, were from across the line; they were persons from the State of Georgia. I have before me a letter from John H. McIntosh, the patriot leader, bearing date July 30, 1812, addressed to Mr. Monroe, and protesting against the removal of the troops from Florida, pursuant to the instructions which had been given by Governor Mitchell, until some arrangement was made by which these same patriots could receive protection. I will read a portion of it:

"By being elected to the office of director by the freemen of East Florida who engaged in the revolution, it becomes my duty to address you, Sir, as the President of the United States, upon the subject of our situation. After suffering for some time the oppression of a government, corrupt in itself, and free from the control of its parent country, we saw the correspondence between yourself and Mr. Under Secretary of the Treasury. Your letter refrained from noticing that part of Mr. Foster's communication relating to General Matthews. When General Matthews came forward respecting instructions of a date prior to that of the correspondence, we immediately concluded that the United States would receive our country as a component part of their territory, as soon as we should desire our determination to shake off the shackles with which we were overladen."

I beg to direct the attention of the Senate to the next clause:

"Under this impression, the whole planting interest declared themselves free, took possession of all the country, and held it until they surrendered it by consent of their commissioners."

The whole planting interest of Florida engaged in this patriot war, declared themselves free, and joined the United States troops. The judge says that these patriots were citizens of Georgia who came across the line. The leader of the patriots says that the whole planting interest upon the State of John's, and between the St. Johns and the Augustine, had risen and joined the force of the United States; and he goes on and urges the Government not to withdraw these troops; that the Indians would be upon them; that a negro regiment was about to be raised, and that they were to go to Cuba; and that the dangers and hardships to which they would be subjected were imminent and great. It was in consideration of this that the Government did not finally withdraw the troops from Florida, though active military operations had been commenced by the patriots in the month of April, 1812. They did not eventually withdraw the troops until May, 1813, and until this amnesty had been made which Mr. McIntosh writes to the Government he desired to have made, and which the Government thought that in good faith they ought to have made, for they owed these people some protection.

I introduce that letter for another purpose. I notice it to show that the whole of the planting interest in that region were of this patriot force, and engaged in the revolution. I notice it for the purpose of showing that these persons afterwards came before the judge there, and by ex parte testimony made out cases for each other, and by that means the Government has already been subjected to the payment of $1,100,000. Hence it is that we are now paying out money for the decimation. It is very natural that these judges should speak as they did. These persons were their neighbors and friends. What was the character of the proceedings before the judges? Ex parte entirely. How could a judge undertake to take testimony from the case of Mr. McIntosh's writing, taken at a distance from him. It is true, in some of the cases, ex parte interrogatories were put; but by whom? They were sent in writing, by the judge himself. How could the facts be made to appear? Every man within the hearing of my voice, especially every lawyer, knows that if left to a judge to have the testimony taken, and especially if the testimony was not taken before him, the Government would be imposed upon; testimony would be fabricated; large amounts would be paid to the supporters of the Government; claims allowed; and such, I think, has been the result in this whole matter, if we take into consideration the amount which was stated by Mr. Everett and by Mr. White to be due, and the amount to which these claims have subsequently been added, because they have already stated the Government has paid $1,100,000, and some two million seven hundred thousand dollars of claims were presented, and those only of principal. Where did these claims come from? Who were the persons that could have suffered all these losses? We are told by Mr. McIntosh, that the Government, the whole planting interest belonged to this patriot force. We did not stipulate to pay them either by the treaty or by the act of 1834, which was passed out of the great liberality of Congress towards these persons. All they asked of us, all they had a right to ask, was that the forces of the United States should not be withdrawn until some arrangement was made with the Government of Spain by which they should not be maltreated. That was all that was extended to them.

I say, sir, that such was likely the case. Why do I say so in addition to what I have already said? Let any one examine some of these cases, and see the nature of the claims. Something was said about the price of cotton. I never understood that Sea Island cotton was raised throughout the whole of that country.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator will allow me to say that that was the great staple of that whole region of country at that time.

Mr. BRAGG. Sea Island cotton?

Mr. YULEE. Nothing else.

Mr. BRAGG. Well, sir, that is information that I have not received before. I shall not dispute as to the value of the cotton. The Senator from Georgia may be right, but the matter or he may be wrong. I had my doubts about it exceedingly, from the amount charged; but in some cases there are as much as three or four dollars a bushel allowed for sweet potatoes. I hope they are the sweet potatoes of Florida.

Mr. YULEE. I am not interfering in these cases, for a reason which I stated last year, I will say that I happened to be counsel in 1835, when the court in Florida, in the record of which is printed before us, and I think it proper to mention to the Senate that no such allowance was ever made, or dreamed of, or heard of, as the Senator now states.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I have not got my facts correctly, but I believe I have. There is another fact, sir, about which I think there can be no dispute. If we may dispute about the price charged for cotton and potatoes, there can be no dispute that many of these claimants, after having been allowed the full value of the property which was claimed had been destroyed, and not only allowed for the crop of 1812, in which year it appeared this damage was done, but they were also allowed the full estimated amount of the crops which they might have made in the year 1813, though the army was withdrawn by the middle of May, 1813. I want to know upon what rule of damages that estimated amount for the crop of 1813 would have been brought by the judge or anybody else within the provisions of the act of 1834. Here, for instance, is a man's crop, his house, his plantation, and everything destroyed in 1812—burnt, ruined, all gone, stock and everything—desolation, like that of the Carnatic, as my friend says, when it was passed over by Hyder Ali.

Mr. TOOMBS. The judge said so.

Mr. BRAGG. Well, the Senator quotes it, and denys it, and sends it to the authority. That was done in 1812. I think I have shown the Senate that the army was withdrawn from active operations as early as April or May, 1812. The judges allowed full payment for the crops of 1812; and then, immediately after the army was withdrawn from Florida until about the middle of May, 1813, they allowed the same persons the full value of the crops which they said they could have made in 1813 but for the previous destruction of their property in 1812. If such a case as that was presented by my friend in a court, what would the answer be to him? If you can go for the year 1813, after you have received pay for the damages done to you in 1812, you can go for the year 1814, for 1815, for 1816; yea, sir, by continuing to claim, they could go forever up to the present time.

But again, as to the number of these claimants, how many were there? I have before me the report made by Mr. Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury in 1854. It says that the Secretaries and all the Attorneys General have been of opinion that the claimants ought to be paid. I think the Secretary from Georgia was very much wiser of the mark. I have before me the report of Mr. Guthrie, made to this body in 1854. What does he say in relation to the matter? He was governed by the opinion of Mr. Attorney General Cass, who was the latest opinion, I believe, that has been had in relation to the subject. Mr. Cushing did not recommend the Secretary to pay them; Mr. Cushing did not think they ought to be paid; but what says Mr. Guthrie? He had the whole of these cases before him; he had all the evidence before him, which we have not; he examined into the whole matter; he saw the reports of the Attorney General, and no man, it must be conceded, was more capable of making a report upon the subject than he was. What does he estimate the population of Florida? In 1820, at the time it was ceded to the United States—mind you, these injuries had occurred in an earlier period, when the population could not have been greater—but in 1820, when Florida was ceded, he says, exclusive of Indians, the population, white and black, in the whole of Florida—East and West Florida—did not exceed ten thousand people. He estimates one half of that population to have been blacks—slaves; the other half whites. He gives the number of claims that had been presented—those under the invasion of 1818 and those of 1812. How many were they? Three hundred and seventy claimants in all previous claims, which were made before 1812, and there had been paid $224,992 68. That embraced all the claims which were made before the Treasury and which had been paid.

Mr. Guthrie makes another estimate as to the number of families. Allowing eight to a family, he says that there were about three hundred and thirty there could not have exceeded six hundred and twenty-five families. It will be remembered that there were only forty or fifty belonging to West Florida, out of the whole three hundred and seventy claimants. Nearly all of them, therefore, belonged to East Florida, and there could be only a thousand white population in the whole of the two Territories in 1820, and, allowing eight to a family, only six hundred and twenty-five families in both the Territories; and in East Florida alone there were claims presented and allowed to about three hundred and forty heads of families—fifty more, of course, than half of all the families that could have resided in that part of East Florida, a narrow strip of country, from St. John's to St. Augustine, hardly one hundred miles in extent. Yet it is said that about thirty or thirty-five hundred claimants residing in that country who had received this amount of damage—received $1,100,000; and McIntosh tells you that the whole of the planters in that region were patriots who had joined the American forces. Where did the money come from, if the country was so small?

In fact and in truth, notwithstanding what the honorable Senator said here, that all the Secretaries thought this money ought to have been paid, Mr. Guthrie says they have already been paid more than double what they were entitled to, and that, for one, he was opposed to paying another cent. Such was his language, and you cannot get on with all the facts in this case on any supposition. These very men who had risen before the United States Treasury and the militia from Georgia to the Territory, the same men of whom Mr. McIntosh was the leader, composing, as he says, all or nearly all the planters of that section of the province, were engaged in this revolution; and if they suffered in the melée, if their property was destroyed by the Indians or by Spanish troops, or the same men who claim have they now to come back on the Government of the United States, and not only ask them to pay the value twice over, as Mr. Guthrie said, of the property which they lost, but to pay interest upon the amount which was proposed to be allowed by the judges of Florida from the time they made their award up to the present date!

For one, Mr. President, if I believed this claim to be a just and fair one, I would vote for it; I would pay no regard to the amount involved; but believing, as I said before, that this claim was not supported by the evidence, by the testimony furnished by Congress, in the legislation of 1834, to admit that it was within the treaty; believing that we are not concluded at all by this legislation, or by the action of Congress, or of any Department of Government, believing further that these claimants, all of us are justly entitled to claim under the act of 1834, have been paid, and more than paid, and that thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid to others, who had no claim upon the Government, either under the treaty or the act of 1834, I, for one, cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, having myself reported this bill from the Committee on Claims, it was—

Mr. MASON. I take it for granted that at this late hour, and considering the importance of the question, the Senator from Vermont does not desire to go on now. If we make any disposition of the question before the Senate, I want an executive session.

Mr. FOOT. I was about to remark, Mr. President, that having myself reported this bill from the Committee on Claims, it was my purpose, as it would be, to be present, and assume the responsibilities which attach to the position I occupy in relation to the bill, to have expressed my views upon it and, upon some of the important material questions it involves, some what in detail and in some considerable length, and upon the opening of the debate upon the bill, I was prevented from doing so by unavoidable detention from the Senate Chamber when yesterday this bill was taken up for consideration. I desire still that opportunity to express the views I entertain upon some of the material questions; and, what I shall do later in the afternoon, I understand from the honorable Senator from Virginia that he desires an executive session on important business, I will move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, it would be better, I think, to have the special order of the day that time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the Senator that there is one special order for to-morrow at one o'clock. I wish he would name some other day.

Mr. FOOT. I will say further, Mr. President, that it will suit my personal convenience entirely to have this bill fixed for some early day, either to-morrow or any other day during the present week.

Mr. TOOMBS. To-morrow.

Mr. FOOT. But I shall desire the opportunity at an early day to speak at length on this question.

Mr. IVESON. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that if he will not move to postpone it and make it the special order, we may go into executive session to-morrow, or it will come to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. FOOT. I understand that is so.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 20, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, n. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Thomas H. Swagwell. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MORITZ SCHUEFFLER.

Mr. POTTER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, respectfully requested to communicate to this House copies of all papers and letters, so far as the Department pertaining to the removal of Moritz Schueffler, late collector at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and copies of all papers showing his name in relation to the consideration of himself in said office, together with copies of such evidence as may be on file in the Treasury Department showing for or against his removal, and if such a public document at the time of his removal as said collector; and also, the date and amount of said debt.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT OF ILLAH.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a Territorial Government in Utah," approved September 9, 1850, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. NOELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was so referred.

The motion was entered, and passed over for the present.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask leave to have the joint resolution from the Senate in relation to the Louisville and Portland canal, taken from the way, or conduct their investigation in a particular manner. They believed—and such was the debate on the bill—that in order to judge they must have the full and free scope of investigation; that to determine implied the authority to inquire and investigate as they saw fit, else they were not left free to judge of the election and qualification of their own members. But still they thought that a law might be made which would prescribe a wholesome rule—a rule that would and should be adopted, so far as it was practicable, and which would enable parties contesting a seat here to be prepared before the meeting of Congress to lay before Congress at the beginning of the session the proofs—as that would be required—before the commencement of the session but for the House; to decide upon those proofs. They passed the act of 1851, the main feature of which, or all of which that has any bearing upon this case, I will read to the House. It provides:

"Sec. 1. Whenever any person shall pretend to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the inspectors or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice, in writing, to the member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and, in such notice, shall state particularly the grounds upon which he relies to the contest."

"Sec. 2. Any member upon whom the notice mentioned in the first section of this act is served, shall, within thirty days after the service thereof, answer such notice, admitting or denying the facts alleged therein, and stating specifically any other grounds upon which he relies to the validity of his election, and shall serve a copy of his answer upon the contestant."

"Sec. 3. The testimony taken by the parties to the contest, or either of them, shall be confined to the proof or disproof of the facts alleged or denied in the notice and answer mentioned in the first and second sections of this act; and no testimony shall be taken after the expiration of sixty days from the day when the notice mentioned in the first section shall be served upon the contestant; and a copy of the notice of contest, and of the answer of the returned member, shall be prima facie the declaration of the facts stated therein to the Clerk of the House of Representatives: Provided, That the House may, at their discretion, allow supplementary evidence to be taken after the expiration of said sixty days."

The statute, you perceive, prescribes that, within thirty days after the result of any election shall be determined by the canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, the contestant shall give notice of his contest to the member returned, and that the member returned shall, within thirty days, make his answer, and then that both parties should take their proofs in support of their allegations and denials within sixty days thereafter, with the provision that the House may, at their discretion, allow supplementary evidence to be taken after the expiration of the said sixty days.

It was the design, Mr. Speaker, I have said, of the Congress that passed that law, to prescribe a wholesome rule. A recurrence to the debates will show that it was the opinion of the Congress who passed it that this was only to be a matter voluntary upon the part of every contestant, that he might avail himself of the provisions of this act or not, as he pleased; but that, if he did avail himself of it, he was bound by the provisions of the act, and must conform himself to it; that he must serve his notice, and close his case, within the time prescribed in that act. Such, in a lengthy argument in favor of the bill, was the view taken by a experienced member of this House—Mr. George W. Jones, of Tennessee. He said substantially that no other construction of the law could, for a moment, be allowed, in consistency with the provision of the Constitution which left each House perfectly free to judge of the election and qualification of its own members. This construction, whether correct or not, is not necessary for a just decision of this question; but the much may be considered as true: that he who avails himself, whether necessarily or voluntarily, of the provisions of this act, must bring himself within it, or he cannot have its benefits; for the first and by far the more important of these benefits is that it elects a magistrate with the right to take the testimony of such witnesses as he shall send forth his subpoena and to bring before him; and it provides that a witness thus brought before the court shall be compelled to testify, under the pains and penalty of perjury. To lack, therefore, a case is made which comes within the provisions of the act, no man can avail himself of its benefits.

The first section, upon which is based the jurisdiction of the case, provides that it shall only apply to cases where there has been a determination by the canvassers or persons authorized by law to determine the result. Unless there has been a determination of the result by the authorities of the State, whose duty, by the law, is to determine, this law cannot apply to the case. The law—I see intimated in the papers in this case—was one which was well considered in its passage. I have to say, that I think the experience of all the States, and of the elections held under the law has shown that it is extremely defective; and from this very case, it can be seen that there may arise very many cases that cannot be brought within the provisions of this statute. There may be cases where the canvassers are divided in opinion, and they are unable to determine the result. There may be cases where the canvassers are corrupt, and refuse to determine the result. There may be cases where the result may depend altogether upon nice and delicate questions, which they must determine beforehand, before they can come to a conclusion as to what the final result is, and what the canvass has determined. In all and any of these cases, when a man undertakes to contest a seat in this House, and goes before a magistrate for the process which the statute authorizes, he finds himself at once without a case, and without jurisdiction to contest, because the very ground of his presentation to the court—that there was a canvass, and that it has been determined by the proper authorities—is wanting.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the case now before the House. The canvass of the election for the State of New York was so peculiar, and, I may be permitted to say, so strange, that it left the contestant and the contestant without the ability to avail themselves of the provisions of this statute. It is the duty of the inspectors of elections in the State of New York to certify to the board of State canvassers the result, as it is termed in the statute, of the election in their several precincts, and to attach to that return a specimen ballot of each ballot cast in their precincts. It is the duty of the county canvassers to certify, as to all elections for Congress, to the board of State canvassers, to the board of State canvassers the result, as certified to them by the inspectors of elections in the several districts. Then it is the duty of the State canvassers, a board provided for law in the State of New York, to perform two or three distinct functions, to each of which I will now direct your attention.

The board, when thus formed, shall, upon the certified copies of the statements made to the county canvassers, proceed to make a statement of the whole number of votes given at each election, to the committee in Congress, and to the board cast for each person or candidate. That is their first duty.

Then they shall certify said statement to be correct, and subscribe the same with their names. Then, upon such statement, they shall proceed to determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices, or either of them. They shall then make and subscribe upon the proper statement a certificate of such determination, and shall deliver the same to the Secretary of State of the State of New York.

They are first to make a "statement" and certify it to be true, and subscribe it, and then upon that statement they are to act judicially. They are to "determine" upon that statement who are duly elected according to those votes, and they are to certify that judgment, and adjudication upon that statement, and send it to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State is to enter that upon the records, and to send one certificate of such "determination" to each of the persons so elected, declaring them to be elected, another to the Governor of the State, and a third addressed to the House of Representatives, declaring such men to be elected.

Now, it came to pass, in the election of 1858, that in the city of New York the county canvassers, in order to come to a result, sent to the several precincts which had been certified to them, up to the State canvassers, certified the votes to have been cast for "members of Congress," instead of Representatives in Congress. And it came very strangely to pass, that the State canvassers, in order to come to a result, sent the votes to have been cast for members of Congress, rather than for Representatives in Congress, they could not be counted. There were two or three other counties in the State in which the votes had been returned in the same way. They went on to canvass the State, and threw out all such votes. It so happened that the result was the same, and did not affect the result in any other district than those in the city of New York. When they came to make the canvass for that city, they found all the votes certified in the manner I have stated. They therefore adhered to the words of the statute, and made out their certificate of election for the members of New York county, in the mean time, sending them a new statement that the specimen ballots returned to them by the inspectors were for Representatives in Congress. The board made out a statement of these facts, and of those votes which were certified to the members of Congress, and concluded in these words:

"We further certify, that no votes are returned from the said county of New York for the office of Representative in Congress; and we further certify that a certificate of the county clerk has been presented to us, stating that all the ballots returned to and filed in his office as used as said election for the aforesaid precincts were for Representatives in Congress; and that no 'members of Congress' and we further certify that, inasmuch as said office was not legally designated in the returns of the county canvassers of the said county of New York made to this board, we cannot certify to the election of any persons to the office of Representative in Congress."

Having made the statement required by law, and having come in obedience to the statute to determine who was elected on that statement, they declined to do so, and said that for these reasons they could not determine and certify that anyone was elected to the office of Representative in Congress, sufficient to enable us to determine. They showed sufficient to make us conclude that they ought to have determined. At the same time, they show that although they could have determined, and although they ought to have determined, they nevertheless declined to determine. They sent to all the members elected from the other districts, except these six, certificates of election. A copy of that certificate will be found on the 22d page. They say:

"We, the Secretary of State, Comptroller, Attorney General, State and Board of State canvassers, and having canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes given for Representatives in Congress, and having determined that the said State on the 3d day of November, 1858, according to certified statements of the said votes, received by the Secretary of State, and the Board of State canvassers, and the State canvassers, and certify that the following persons, respectively, by the greatest number of votes given in the several congressional districts of the State, were elected to represent the State of New York in the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, to wit:

Then they give the names of the several persons elected, and stand in regard to this thing formed a board of State canvassers, and having canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes given for Representatives in Congress, and having determined that the said State on the 3d day of November, 1858, according to certified statements of the said votes, received by the Secretary of State, and the Board of State canvassers, and the State canvassers, and certify that the following persons, respectively, by the greatest number of votes given in the several congressional districts of the State, were elected to represent the State of New York in the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, to wit:

Then they give the names of the several persons elected, and stand in regard to this thing formed a board of State canvassers, and having canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes given for Representatives in Congress, and having determined that the said State on the 3d day of November, 1858, according to certified statements of the said votes, received by the Secretary of State, and the Board of State canvassers, and the State canvassers, and certify that the following persons, respectively, by the greatest number of votes given in the several congressional districts of the State, were elected to represent the State of New York in the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, to wit:

Now, sir, it is claimed by Mr. Sickles, and by the minority of the committee, that Mr. Williamson was called upon, by the statute of 1851, to take the oath, and to certify to the result of the test his right to the seat to which nobody had determined that he had any right. It was the opinion of the majority of the committee that, as the case thus stood, Mr. Williamson was no longer upon to serve notice of contest on Mr. Sickles, that Mr. Sickles was called upon to serve such notice on Mr. Williamson. True it is, that there existed a statement from which anybody could make up his mind how the proper authorities ought to have determined this question. But it is also true that, notwithstanding that, these canvassers, for some strange reason, never made this determination.

When these votes were before the State canvassers, Mr. Williamson took preliminary measures to contest the seat, according to the law of 1851, and prepared his notice of contest; but when this action of the State canvassers came to be known, legal advice was taken on it, and Mr. Williamson was advised that he could not avail himself of the provisions of that law; could not serve notice on Mr. Sickles, and bring him before the authorities named in the statute, and obtain the testimony of persons who would not voluntarily give their testimony in the case. He therefore abandoned his effort to proceed according to the statute of 1851, and applied to Congress. He presented his memorial here on the seventh day after the House had organized; and at the first meeting of the Committee of Elections he presented his application for leave to take testimony according to the forms and usages prescribed by committees of Congress before the passage of the law of 1851.

It is true that I have stated the case of Mr. Williamson and of Mr. Sickles as it has been presented to the committee. The objections to giving the authority proposed in the resolution are manifold. Without desiring to prejudice at all the case of the sitting member, I must say that, if a man has a right to be heard at all in Congress before his allegations are considered in the memorial of the contestant, and in the affidavit of his attorney, I would not raise technical objections to the form and manner in which the allegations are made. If allegations of fraud were laid at my feet, if I were charged with corrupt voters, or stuffing ballot-boxes, I would not care in what form the charge were made, or on what day it was made, I would offer no objection to the fullest and amplest and largest investigation that the power of Congress could have made or could bring to bear on my right to be heard.

The minority of the committee, which was unable to agree with the majority in reporting the resolution, have various objections to it, to which, perhaps, it is proper to allude at this time. The first of them is, that the certificate from the county canvassers, in which they are cast for "member of Congress," is not for "Representative in Congress," is a mere quibble, not worthy of the attention of the House for a moment; and in that I agree with them. But they will permit me to say that, while I think they have argued as well as I do, I see how the State canvassers ought to have determined the case; they have not been successful in showing that the State canvassers have determined it, while they expressly say, in so many words, that they will not determine it. Such an argument is like that of those who, when judgment of court is rendered against them, sit down and recount all the facts and the law in the case, say that it is incomprehensible that a judge could have come to such a judgment, and then jump to the conclusion that the judge did not come to such a conclusion and that they are entitled to a new trial. I think they ought to have come to. Now, I agree with them. I should be—I do not know that it would be respectful to the authorities of New York to say it—but I should be almost ashamed to put my name to any such sort of argument, and when any I could not determine it. But it is just as true that they have not determined, because they say they have not. They refused to give a certificate or to determine it; and the first determination that Mr. Sickles had a prima facie right to the seat was the action of the House, when they permitted him to take the oath of office, and to be qualified as a member. The House is presumed to have looked at that paper and that statement, and to have come to the conclusion that it showed him to have a prima facie title to the seat; and that the first determination had been made when they had no more right to that seat than I had; and that was but seven days before this memorial was presented. That is the first objection raised by the minority of the committee.

The second objection is this: that suppose Mr. Williamson was correct in his belief, and that the advice of his counsel was correct, in the first place, that he could not bring himself within that law; yet he acquiesced for fifteen months—he has laid the matter sleep for fifteen months. Now, if there was any reason at all for acquiescing at first, that reason continued up to the time that this House was organized. If there was no determination in the beginning, the determination did not grow like a crop of corn. The determination lacked existence just as much when Mr. Sickles and Mr. Williamson came here as it did when these State canvassers refused to make it; that the waiting for fifteen months was a necessity, and was compelled on them by the law of their own, but by the course which the State canvassers brought upon him, and the position in which they put him in relation to the law.

But the minority say further, that Mr. Williamson, by permitting Mr. Sickles to remain in the seat without objection, is estopped from raising the question now. Because Mr. Williamson did not happen to be here in time, did not happen to be inside these walls when we were visited with that sudden dispensation of Providence—the election of a Speaker—why, therefore, he is estopped? Why, sir, Lord Coke says an estoppel is the stopping a man from telling the truth; and he declares it to be very odious. But still, our friends here are disposed to avail themselves of the fact that Mr. Williamson did not object at that time, and to hold him estopped. I should like to know that no other member objected; as if the right of the people of the third congressional district of New York to be represented according to their own choice was to depend upon what other members believed or upon the chance of Mr. Williamson being able to get here and claim the seat as soon as Mr. Sickles did. They propose, if I understand this argument aright, to reduce the contesting of a seat here to a race between two men, to see which will get into it first; and the man who gets in first may say to the other, "You are estopped because you did not say as soon as I did that you are the true member; if I get here and take the seat and the oath of office without your being here to claim it, you are estopped."

The next point made by the minority of the committee is, that since Mr. Sickles has been here and taken the seat, Mr. Williamson has permitted him to rest in the seat so long a time as—I do not know that they any exactly to contend it; but that, by some process, or other like adverse possession, Mr. Sickles has the best right to the seat, and this is the only way to get out from the contest. I wish to say, that the man claiming to have been duly elected, and who may have been elected to the seat, if he permits another to occupy it thus long, loses it by adverse possession. Well, let us see how long Mr. Sickles has occupied the seat. He came here, this House was organized on the 24 day of February, and this memorial was presented on the 9th day of February. Seven days—six working days and a Sabbath—had been the whole adverse possession of this seat which Mr. Sickles enjoys, before this memorial was presented.

There is one other objection, and it is this: they say that this House has no power to travel out of the statute of 1851, and prescribe another rule. They have come to the conclusion that the Congress has no right and power to prescribe a rule just how far, just when, and before what tribunal, all evidence of the right to our seats should be taken, and then leave us perfectly free to pass upon what that Congress had prescribed as the mode of determining. Now, I have no objection to that, but I have no objection to the Congress of 1851, as I gather from the debates of that Congress, the law itself never would have passed. It cannot be true that a man has a right to judge, or can be called upon to judge, who has not also the means and the right to investigate, and to investigate when and how he pleases. How the gentlemen of the minority could have come to that conclusion, I do not know; for, during the last Congress, in a contested case from Nebraska, the committee came unanimously to a contrary conclusion. In that case the first determination of the contest was formed to the law of 1851; had served his notice upon the sitting member; and, after the notice had been served upon the sitting member, the sitting member took his family and left the Territory, and went off into the State of Pennsylvania, and stayed there until the session of Congress had commenced—abandoning the contest to the contestant from the beginning to the end. The Committee of Elections, in that case, were unanimously of the opinion that the contestant had conformed to the law. The sitting member had left the Territory, and kept out of it from the day the notice of contest was served upon him until Congress came into session; and yet he was before the committee and asked that they would report to the House a resolution to give him time after that to take testimony, and the committee unanimously determined to give him time to take testimony, and sent the matter over to the short session. They put it off, and they were not here, and there was no other ground, that the sitting member had made affidavit that he had acted in good faith, and had mistaken the law.

Now, sir, suppose this contestant had mistaken the law; suppose that the legal counsel whom he employed was mistaken in the law, yet, sir, the law of 1851 expressly provides that the House may, in its discretion, give time to obtain supplemental testimony. Under that provision of the law of 1851, the Committee of Elections came to the conclusion, under the circumstances of this case, believing as they did that this man was in good faith—resorted to all the methods which he believed were in his power—to report the resolution which we have done, that he should have time to support the serious allegations in his petition, supported by the affidavits of the witnesses, of any that he knew the men who used the money to obtain illegal votes; and that he believed he could prove the allegations made in the petition, if he could have an opportunity.

The committee took into consideration the fact that this House was not asked by the sitting member, who would thus, in asking time to take testimony and prepare his case, gain time, and thus, it may be, prolong his right to sit here; but the delay is asked for by the outside contestant, under circumstances which could have no possible burden upon the sitting member; because, if it imposed upon him now the necessity of leaving his duties here in Congress to go to New York to take testimony, it would have imposed upon him the same necessity to leave his seat in the House during a session of Congress, in like manner, had the testimony been taken within the ninety days prescribed in the law of 1851. It therefore imposes no additional burden upon him. And, sir, if there is more difficulty in sustaining allegations of the serious character presented in the memorial of the contestant, of time, the fading of memory in reference to the events in question, or the absence of the witnesses, the difficulty rests not upon the sitting member, but upon the contestant; because the sitting member has had the advantage of the law, while he is prima facie entitled to his seat, and until the contestant can make good his allegations, will continue to occupy it.

Then, sir, anxious as the Committee of Elections were to establish the rule that as many of these cases as possible should be prepared before the meeting of Congress, in order to hasten their adjudication and to determine whether the electors of the several congressional districts contested were rightly represented on this floor or not, they could not, under these circumstances, involving a difference of no less importance than the rights of a member, beyond what would have been if the seat had been contested within the ninety days specified in the law of 1851; they could not say they would close the doors against this contestant and refuse him the right to be heard, and the law, as he has in his memorial, supported by the affidavit of his attorney, he can make good his charges, provided he can have the process of law to bring unwilling witnesses into court and compel them to testify under the legal sanction of an oath.

Sir, I do not desire, without good reason, to depart from the rule laid down in the act of 1851. But I find, upon an examination of the cases, transpiring since the passage of that law, that all committees have been governed by the same rule; and that is, to recommend a departure from the requirements of that statute, when the taking of testimony within sixty days is concerned, whenever, in their judgment, the merits of the case cannot be fully presented without.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said by the sitting member, in his brief, which is contained in his report, and is embodied in the statement presented by the minority of the committee, that, laying aside the requirements of the law of 1851, still it was his duty to have served the sitting member with notice of his intention to contest, within a reasonable time; so as to have given him an opportunity usual proceedings taken by contestants under the act of 1851, or under rules established or practiced upon previous to the passage of that act. And however much our friends may be astonished at the action of this board of canvassers in New York refusing to give a certificate, because the clerk certified that the sitting member had a majority or plurality as member of Congress, yet it is shown that the election was held on the right day and at the right place, as required and established by law, for Representatives in Congress, and that board could not see that the contestant was entitled to a certificate of election. It is for us to determine whether the result of that election was declared by what was done. The board of canvassers declared the result of the voting. If it did, then the contestant ought to be allowed the rules prescribed by the act of 1851, unless he can show some very extraordinary reason why he should be permitted to depart from them, which he has not done.

But even suppose there is error in this. Before the act of 1851, Congress had established certain rules to be obligatory upon parties in contested-election cases; and the act of 1851 but substantially embodied the usages which had been practiced by Congress anterior to that time. It merely substituted a statutory form which had become settled by precedent by the Congress anterior to that. And what were they? Why, in substance, that the party who determined to contest the seat of the person receiving the majority or plurality of votes, should give him reasonable notice of his intention to contest the seat; and also to specify upon what ground he intends to contest it. Now, it only requires a little reflection to see the good sense of the rule. It would never do to allow one candidate to keep to himself for fifteen months the knowledge of the ground upon which he intends to contest the seat of another man.

The contest is entered in all fairness to reasonable notice of the contest, and of the ground upon which the contest is founded. He who has the certificate has the prima facie right to the seat, and it is afterwards ascertained within a reasonable time that such a fraud has been committed as to nullify the election, the party should have reasonable time to inquire into the facts, and defend himself by controverting the facts, or by showing that counter frauds were committed, and so forth. But this gives a party a right to sit upon his oars, without giving any notice formal or informal, from November, 1858 to February, 1860, and to say that the case falls within the usages of the Congress of the United States or of Parliament, or of any other legislative body, is preposterous, and I challenge any man to show that it does. There cannot be found such a precedent either in this country or England. Why, sir, the contestant knew that Mr. Sickles was going to claim his seat, and he admits it. It is so stated in the report of the majority. It is stated that he had as soon count thirty as he could count one, and, from November, 1858, up to 9th February, 1860, he makes no movement in the case, and gives no notice.

I repeat, he made no move whatever in the case up to February, 1860. In addition to this, he has given him, by the publication of this certificate in the papers of New York, as required by the law of that State, the very findings and declarations of the board, as already read, were spread on the records in Albany. Further, he waits till the meeting of Congress in July only so. He sees the sitting member coming here and voting on the question of Speaker from the first week in December till the first week in February; saw him recognized as the sitting member; and never notified him, during those sixty days, a letter or a notice of any kind, or of any intention to contest the right of Mr. Sickles to a seat in the House. He files or makes no objection to his being sworn in.

If the case did not fall within the act of 1851, it is idle to say full witness that he waited before the passage of that act, and that he intended that the contestant ever attempted to conform, in any degree, to the usages established anterior to the act of 1851? Was not the certificate, which was spread on the records in Albany, and which was published in the papers of New York, enough to put the contestant under notice? Was not the fact that the sitting member came here and voted from December to February sufficient ground to put him under notice?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I promised to be brief. I do not pretend to say that there might not exist some circumstances under which this House might feel bound to disregard the provisions of the law of 1851, and the usages established anterior to that time. The House might be induced to move in behalf of an extraordinary commission in favor of disfranchised citizens. Every man in Congress would desire to have the United States has a right to come before Congress and show that his district had been unfairly dealt with, and that the person holding the certificate had, in truth and in fact, obtained it by fraud, corruption, force, or some malpractice. A citizen might make such a showing at any time as to induce the House to send a commission to inquire into the facts, in behalf of the country and for the purity of the elective franchise. But in this such a case as that? Does any citizen here complain? Do we hear anything from any person in the district, except from the man who was defeated in the election, and from his attorney? Do we hear a murmur from a solitary citizen of the city of New York? Not a voter in that third district has ever been heard to complain of the manner in which the election was conducted, except from the man who stands at least in the questionable position of having a self-interest in the matter, and from his attorney.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the affidavit of the contestant's attorney. I desire to have it read, and I ask the attention of the House to every word and line of it. I ask gentlemen on all sides of the House to tell me, when they hear it, what it proves? It proves nothing in the world, except hearsay—except what was heard from some parties in New York as to have been particeps criminis in the election.

The affidavit is as follows:

City and county of New York, ss:

Alfred McIntire, of said city, being duly sworn, says that he is employed by Amos J. Williamson, shortly after the congressional election held in the State of New York, in the month of November, 1858, as a canvasser said Williamson directed him to go to the third congressional district of the State of New York, and endeavor to procure signatures of persons, and obtain such proofs, as would enable said Williamson to establish his election as Representative in Congress.

That in consequence of the omission of the board of State canvassers to determine and declare who, if any one, was elected in the said district, at the said election, said Williamson was unable to give the notice and proceed to take the testimony in the manner prescribed by the act of 1851; and that he therefore had no way to compel the attendance of witnesses, or of securing their testimony, unless it could be obtained from him voluntarily.

That in pursuance of such employment, this deponent has seen and conversed with a great number of persons, residents of the said district, who look an honest part in the said election, and that he is informed by a number of persons who were active supporters of Daniel E. Sickles at the said election, and who participated in the fraudulent voting of said district, that there were illegal votes cast for said Sickles to their knowledge, and that the aggregate number of such illegal votes received by said Sickles, according to the statements of such persons, was this number, viz: more than three hundred; and deponent further says that from the statements of such persons, he ascertained that a number who participated in such illegal voting, and from other sources, the number of illegal votes received by said Sickles at the said election would exceed three hundred.

Deponent further says that he has been informed by several persons that said Sickles furnished them money to pay the expenses of the canvassers who were sent to the said district, and instructed them to procure such illegal votes, and that he also furnished large sums of money to other persons to procure such illegal votes.

That he knows the persons from whom he obtained such information to have been the active supporters and agents of said Sickles in the canvass, and that they very much stated so that the said Sickles was not legally elected, but they declined to make any further statement, or to furnish any other evidence to the deponent, and the deponent ground that it would implicate themselves or their friends, and involve them in difficulty.

Deponent further says that the said parties are all in the city of New York or vicinity, and that their attendance can be secured before a committee of the House of Representatives, and that their testimony would establish the fact that at least three hundred illegal votes were given for said Sickles at said election.

ALFRED MCINTIRE.

Sworn before me this 29th day of November, 1859.

MATHIAS BANTA, Commissioner of Deeds.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the honorable gentleman from New York to the statement made in the affidavit of Mr. McIntire, for the purpose of bearing from him how the contestant could have acted otherwise than as he did. Mr. McIntire says:

"That he, therefore, had no way to compel the attendance of witnesses, or of securing their testimony, unless it could be obtained from him voluntarily."

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of the act of 1851 are based upon certain action on the part of the canvassers previously had. What I want to know is, how witnesses could be compelled to testify in the absence of that action? How could they be brought here by any judicial tribunal, and compelled, against their will, to testify? How, in case they had testified falsely, could they have been punished? I should like to know whether, in point of fact, that difficulty does not lie at the foundation of this case, and at the foundation of any action which could have been taken on the part of Mr. Williamson?

Mr. GILMER. My friend has gone off here without examining the force and effect of the very statement that he calls my attention to. Had I been the adviser of Mr. Williamson, at any day after the 21st day of December, 1858, I should have told him to issue his notice and get his subpenas from the officers pointed out in the act of Congress; and if the officers had hesitated about granting the process, I would have sent to Albany, and I would have got a writ of habeas corpus, and I would have made there, and before any sensible judge I would have got the process; and if any corrupt judge could not grant me the process, in a State where we have honest jurors and judges, I would have convicted him for corruption in his office.

Mr. ELIOT. The honorable gentleman does not yet meet the point. How could Mr. Williamson have gone before any magistrate and laid a foundation for a process? He must have said that certain action had been had; and the difficulty is, that that action had not been had. How, then, could he have proceeded? How could he have taken the first step?

Mr. GILMER. I have already shown how he could have proceeded. All he would have to do would be to show that declaration and that finding, as forth in the certificate, and the case would already be decided, and that certificate he could easily have got. It is begging this question. There is nothing in it. When the county canvassers declared, by their comparing or by their poll-books, that this man was elected Representative, and they issued his certificate, and that certificate, as that result, and he sent it up precisely in conformity to law in every particular, except the mere clerical error of "member of Congress" instead of "Representative in Congress," which made so sort of difference, when taken in connection with the other part of the certificate, showing the character of the tickets used; and the State canvassers declared, as their certificate shows, it was a legal declaration of the results of that election; and it is nothing but mere quibbling to undertake to insist upon any other conclusion. And if the result was declared, the act of Congress does not require you to wait until the certificate is furnished or refused. It is when the result is made known that the party who is going to contest is permitted, under the act of Congress, to move for his certificate. As to a case as was taken in Georgia, North Carolina, or any of our southern States. When the sheriffs of the several counties come together to make up their certificates, the party who is going to contest does not wait until the Governor issues the certificate. The officers who have the votes, in an election, ascertain the number given to each by the poll-books, and publish the result of the vote; and when that is done, the party wanting to contest is required, under the act of 1851, to move according to the provisions of that act.

Mr. CONKLING. With the permission of the gentleman from North Carolina, I desire to ask him one or two questions. I ask him first, which board of canvassers he says was bound to make the legal determination contemplated by that act? His answer to that question will enable me to put another.

Mr. GILMER. I should say that either might declare it, and that the first declaration would stand, unless reversed by any other.

Mr. CONKLING. Either of which? I desire to move for his certificate.

Mr. GILMER. I think if it is declared by the county canvassers, that is sufficient.

Mr. SICKLES. Being somewhat familiar with the election laws of New York, I should like to say a word to the gentleman from North Carolina who will allow me.

Mr. GILMER. The gentleman will have an opportunity of being heard hereafter.

Mr. CONKLING. If I am to understand that this case goes upon the theory that the inspectors of election, or some other body, are to determine the State canvassers, could make this determination, why, it is one thing; and that is a theory which has not been advanced yet, unless it is advanced now by the answer which the gentleman from North Carolina makes to me. If, on the contrary, I am to understand that the gentleman to this time, that the legal determination on which this act is predicated is the determination of the board of State canvassers, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to put his finger on the page or part of a page in this document which shows any such "legal determination," to use the words embodied in this statute, has taken place; and I ask him whether it is not true that the only statement with regard to a determination embodied in this certificate is the statement that the yeas and nays, that they do, that they do not, do, not, decide, determine, or certify, that any matter whatever is entitled to a seat from this district? Now, I want to see where it is that the determination is made by the board of State canvassers.

Mr. GILMER. I have not examined and traced my attention particularly to the New York statutes in relation to the county canvassers; but if it be as I would suppose it to be, I would take it that their having counted up the votes and declared the result would enable the party wanting to contest to proceed under the act of Congress. But all this is no purpose. I look to the facts found and declared by the State canvassers. They made a declaration and a finding of facts. Their declaration and finding of facts is like the verdict of a jury; the judgment of the court is another thing. So the granting or refusal of a certificate of election—that is of any requiring the finding and declaring of the result of the voting. This act says nothing of a certificate of election. There may be a declaration—a finding of facts, and these facts recorded upon the records of the court; and yet there may be no judgment. So they may be finding as to the result of an election, and it may be of record; and it is upon that that the party has a right to move, under the act of 1851. Suppose the canvassers certify to you that this man has received a plurality of votes for member of Congress, and that he is entitled to be Representative in Congress, and then he asks you for a judgment or certificate: I should like to see the member of this House who would risk his reputation by saying: "Sir, upon that special finding I cannot give you a certificate."

I venture to say there is not a gentleman upon this floor who will risk his reputation by sustaining any such quibble. My friend says that if he and this imputation made against him for fraud and bribery, and made by the counsel upon the other side, he would not hesitate to demand an investigation. He would open the door wide; he would not shrink from any investigation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I rather think that if the tables were turned upon my friend from Massachusetts, and a contestant came here fifteen months after his election, having given him as previous notice, and presented an allegation sustained by an affidavit to no fact whatever, stating only what he had heard from parties who were particeps criminis, who named none specially that had been bribed, giving no names of persons implicated, or of respectable witnesses by whom he had intended to prove the allegation, I say I doubt whether my friend would, under such circumstances, voluntarily yield to go home, incur costs, and try the case. Yet that is no stronger a case than the one now before us, which is a case of a man who is a member from New York home in this district, leaving his duties here in this Congress, to try the contest in respect to the charges that are brought, or rather suggested, in this memorial.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I shall defend the House a few moments, and then shall endeavor to speak to the point in the contested matter before us. It is distinctly understood that we have a preliminary matter before the House. There is nothing in this controversy which can have any influence upon the merits of the case. If the resolution reported by the majority of the committee shall be adopted by the House, the merits may be brought into the matter, and will come up for the action of this body in due time. The question now before us is, whether the contestant shall have an opportunity of inquiring into the fraud, bribery, and corruption alleged in his memorial and in the affidavits. Sir, I claim that this contestant could not have made the charge of illegal voting more distinctly than he has made it in his memorial; and that a more distinct affidavit of facts than that of Mr. McIntire was never made before a chancellor, or before a court of common law jurisdiction for their action; and further, that to make the charge more directly would be impossible, unless the parties to the fraud themselves voluntarily came forward and made affidavit to the facts within their knowledge.

Now, sir, before I dismiss the manner in which these charges of fraud, bribery, and corruption are set out in the petition and affidavit, I desire to call attention to the memorial of the contestant. My friend from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] has not referred to that memorial at all. He has contented himself with a significant allusion. The contestant charges bribery and corruption upon the sitting member in his memorial as well as in the affidavit, and this is the charge which is submitted to the consideration of the House. Now, what is contained, first, in the memorial? I call the attention of the members to it. They read, it is in part before them. Mr. Williamson goes on to say:

"That he has been informed by various persons, and verily believes, that a large number of the votes which were cast in the district for the seat of Daniel S. Sickles, and which were officially returned and counted for him, and allotted to him by the said board of county canvassers, were in each case a purchase for a vote of 3,750 votes or ballots, were illegal votes introduced into the ballot boxes surreptitiously and fraudulently by the said House, and in each case with his knowledge and by the force of their own accord, and with the intent of, and for the purpose of, obtaining the true representation of the intention of the electors of the district, and of securing, or appearing to secure, the return of the said S. Sickles to his honorable body fraudulently and corruptly."

Now, here is a distinct charge that there was illegal voting procured and countenanced by the sitting member. Does he say he knows it himself? How could he know it of his own knowledge, unless he had participated in the fraudulent transactions? How could he bring the charge before the House unless upon information derived from parties who had participated in the illegal voting? Suppose a certain number of voters upon the poll-list came forward and stated before this House that they voted for the sitting member and voted illegally and fraudulently; the House would act upon that information. The contestant comes into the House and makes affidavit that these parties informed him of the fact, and that he verily believes he can prove it. Are you not compelled, or are you not authorized, to open up the matter?

Why, sir, when you go before a court of equity jurisdiction, and ask for a bill of discovery to inquire into certain alleged frauds, if you make affidavit that you have been informed and verily believe on the ground of your belief, that A, B, C, D, E, F, have done certain acts, it is necessary to bring the affidavits of the parties to the fraudulent transaction before the court will grant you the relief prayed for? No, sir; in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred you merely state, and rely upon the affidavits of the parties, and you have been informed by third persons, and verily believe that you will be able to prove the truth of the matters and things set out in your petition.

But this memorial goes on to set out, with great distinctness, what the contestant complains of. He says:

"That in the five election districts of the first ward of the city of New York, which is a portion of the said third congressional district, ballots or votes were surreptitiously and fraudulently introduced into the ballot boxes, and the said ballots had on them the name of the said S. Sickles as such Representative as aforesaid, such ballots being in the hands of the said S. Sickles in each district, and were not and officially allowed by the inspectors of election having charge and issued count of said ballot-boxes, for and on behalf of said Sickles, and that such ballots were made to form a part of the whole number of votes returned, and purporting to have been cast for him."

There, sir, in a distinct allegation of fraud made by the memorialist, from his own knowledge. He further states that a large number of soldiers in the service of the United States, from various parts of the country, were collected in the district; that they had no legal right to vote, but did vote for the sitting member. His further alleges:

"That a large number of persons, not residents of said congressional district, and who resided without the city, and persons who temporarily and otherwise lived on board vessels about at various docks, and who were not legal voters of said district, were collected and paid by the said Sickles or his agents to cast ballots or votes on one or more occasions for the said Sickles in said district, and that there were over one hundred illegal votes cast by such persons for the said Sickles."

It is true that the memorialist derives his information in some instances from other persons, but he makes his allegations so distinctly and alleges that he is able to prove them. He says further:

"That large sums of money were expended by the said Sickles and his agents for the purpose of bribery and corruption, and that the said money was used to induce the said voters to vote for him; and that he furnished large sums of money to other persons to be used and paid on by them for the purpose of bribery and corruption, and to vote for said ballots for the said Sickles."

And there are other charges of the same nefarious purport, yet we are told by gentlemen on the other side that the memorialist is basing his case upon the names of the persons who polled these illegal votes, nor has the memorialist named the parties who made use of this moneyed influence referred to in the petition of the contestant. I answer, it is not necessary to set out the names of the illegal voters in the memorial. It is not necessary in a bill of information or indictment to set out the evidence necessary to support it; nor is it necessary to give the items of evidence by which the general charges of bribery and corruption contained in the petition are supported. The charge is perfect, when the offense is sufficiently and legally described, without the evidence which supports it. The evidence is for the jury, the sufficiency of the charge for the court. To bring the case within the statute, it is only necessary to give the essential facts of the character and extent of the charge with reasonable certainty, and that is done in this memorial. Then take into consideration that the memorial is supported by the affidavit of a respectable witness, so far as we know, stating that he has conversed with a great number of persons of the name of Daniel S. Sickles, who took an active part in the election, and that he has been informed by those persons, who were the active supporters of Daniel E. Sickles in said election, that they participated in the fraudulent voting, and that there were a large number of illegal votes cast for said Sickles to their knowledge, they being particeps criminis in the transaction. How could it be more direct than the witness makes it? I contend that these charges of fraudulent voting, proved by the statements of the respectable witness, and sustained by the sitting member by competent proof, would be evidence against him. It is the only preliminary information you can have to ground action upon. You cannot compel them to testify until process has been issued by competent authority for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, how could this contestant proceed further, or bring stronger ground for the proceeding asked for, or more explicitly than he has done?

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Will the gentleman please to support his case for more than a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I must decline. The gentleman will have an opportunity to be heard after I conclude. I wish to be brief, and to the point.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I only wished to put the case of the illegal voting before you.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Here, Mr. Speaker, is a charge of fraud, of illegal voting, extending to more votes than the sitting member had majority in that election. Here are charges of ballot-box stuffing, and we are asked to suffer investigation and countenance upon the same. We are asked that we have no power to inquire into these transactions. With this charge, broad and plainly stated, staring us in the face, we are asked to hide it away, and to crush it out. We are asked to deny person was returned duly elected for the six districts in the city of New York. That matter was dismissed under the jurisdiction of the board of State canvassers; and so far this question is concerned, they have determined it.

I will not consume the time of the House by an inquiry into what they ought to have done, or what you or I would have done. They had jurisdiction, and they refused to grant such a certificate. Then, I say, they have determined it. I have no determination, that the hands of Mr. Williamson were tied, and he could not give the notice required in the act of Congress of 1851. It would have been an idle ceremony, there having been no determination as to the sitting member. No judge in the State of New York or any other officers under a fair construction of that act of Congress, could have issued a process to compel the attendance of witnesses. It would have been a perfect farce for the defendant to have given notice, or for a judge to have issued process for the attendance of witnesses. Had witnesses been compelled to attend under such a process, they would have had a remedy against the party who compelled their attendance by attachment. The act of Congress of 1851 is based upon the fact that there must first be a determination of the election. That is the ground work of the subsequent proceedings—the basis and superstructure of the whole thing. There can be no proceedings without that legal determination; in the first instance, had by the proper authority—the board of State canvassers; and that determination is called upon to give notice within a certain time, is based upon that legal determination. The right of a judge to issue process for the attendance of witnesses is a power conferred upon the judge only of cases enumerated in the statute—that is, where there is a legal determination and result. And I ask gentlemen who are lawyers to meet this issue fairly upon the act of Congress. It is a question of power under that act. There is no use of avoiding it in any other way. And I say that the gentleman, the member of New York, who advised Mr. Williamson that he could not legally proceed under the circumstances, gave the opinion of a lawyer; that he was right, and ought to be sustained by every one who has given this case any proper attention. It would be an odd case, indeed, if the gentleman, the contestant that the right was in Mr. Sickles prime facie.

But we have been told that Mr. Williamson is guilty of lack in not proceeding to bring this case to the attention of the House; that he ought to have objected before the board of State canvassers. I have shown that he had no power to contest the election, and that he was not within the purview of the statute of 1851. Where could he object? How could he object? Until the election of Speaker of this House we had no power to transact business of any character. The House could not have received his memorial. After the lapse of but a few days, when the organization of the House took place—either five or six days, if my recollection serves me right—you find the contestant at the bar of this tribunal, presenting his memorial, and calling on you for an investigation of the facts of the case. Until that moment his hands were tied. And now we are to be told that he has forfeited his right, and that this House has forfeited its right, because he, the contestant, did not do that which he had no power to do. I say that it is simply an absurdity. The contestant has done all that could be done under the facts and circumstances of the case.

But, says the gentleman from North Carolina, the contestant has not followed the legal mode and practice that existed prior to the passage of the act of 1851. I meet the gentleman from North Carolina fairly on that issue; and I say that the cases referred to in the printed report show that the practice has been variable and is not of binding force. In some instances, both in this country and in England, notice was given prior to the presentation of the memorial at the bar of the House; in other cases, notice was not given prior to that time. The practice was conflicting. I refer to the authorities collated on page 19 of the report.

In the contrary, numerous cases appear in which no notice was given, and in which the testimony was taken under the direction of the Committee of Elections, to which petition was referred. (See the cases of C. and H., 69; Rutherford vs. Morgan, C. and H., 118; Kelly vs. Har- ris, C. and H., 269; case of John Bailey, C. and H., 411; case of John Ferguson, C. and H., 419.)

By the practice of England, no notice is required to be given until after the petition is presented and referred.

If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the case referred to they will find that the practice was not uniform, but that both this House and the British House of Commons have frequently, without preliminary notice, and on the mere presentation of the petition at the bar of the House, inquired into the merits of the case. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is nothing in the case which should prevent us from inquiring into the alleged fraud, corruption, and bribery. It is due to the contestant, who has not forfeited his right by any want of duty on his part. It is due to the House, and to the third party, the State of New York, who should be fairly, if they are not now fairly, represented on this floor. It is emphatically due the sitting member, that the truthfulness of these charges should be shown. It is due to the dignity of this House and to the people of the country that we should make this charge of corruption and fraud as becomes men who have regard for the dignity of the House and the rights of all parties.

Mr. Speaker, I pronounce no judgment on the facts of the case. I could not do so. The facts are not before us in any shape or form. But I never will, while I have a seat on this floor, or remain a member of the Committee of Elections, refuse, in a fair and proper case, to give all parties a right to inquire into a charge so distinctly made as this.

Mr. GARTRELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire, as a member of the Committee of Elections, to present very briefly a few considerations to the House on the point (for there is really but one point and one question) involved in this controversy. I do not follow in the very wide range that has been given to this debate, nor consume the time of the House in discussing, on this question of a preliminary investigation, general principles of fraud and of election. I may suggest, however, that the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections adopted by the House and established as a precedent, you will thereby completely destroy and nullify the act of 1851, providing for the course of procedure in all cases of contested elections. The gentleman who opened this discussion reported to the majority of the committee referred to that clause of the Constitution which declares that each House shall judge of the election, qualification, and return of its members. I hold that the act of 1851 cannot be construed as violating that clause of the Constitution, because, under that act, each House has reserved to itself the right to determine the legal question of the qualification of its members.

Mr. DAWES. I perceive that I did not make myself understood by the gentleman. I did not question the constitutionality of the law of 1851. My only question of the construction put upon that law by the minority of the committee, namely, that no House of Representatives can depart from the provisions of that law, in itself investigating and judging of the election of its own members.

Mr. GARTRELL. I do not think, Mr. Dawes, I will permit that portion of the gentleman's remarks farther. But, as I stated before, there is only one question before the House, and that is, whether this case comes within the provisions of the act of 1851? If it does, then the contestant here is without remedy by his own delay and neglect, and by the mistake of low mode, if you please, by him and his counsel, he has no remedy; and this House cannot be expected virtually to repeal the act of 1851, in order to open up the merits of this case.

Now, I maintain that the contestant is within the provisions of the act of 1851; and that the board of State canvassers at Albany, when they made out and signed the certificate that has been twice read from the Clerk's desk, determined this case under the law, they had the power to do; and that their certificate, and the determination—not a legal determination—of this controversy. It was not a determination as to whether Mr. Sickles was entitled to the seat or whether Mr. Williamson was entitled to the seat, and that is determined. With a mere majority, it is the fact that a plurality of the voters of the third congressional district of the State of New York had cast their votes for Daniel E. Sickles, and that he is legally elected by a plurality of one hundred and sixty-one votes. That was the only fact required or authorized to be settled by the board of State canvassers, either under the statute of New York or under the act of Congress of 1851.

Mr. ELIOT. By the laws of New York, I understand that it is necessary that the State canvassers should make a statement of the whole number of votes given in the election for Representatives in Congress; and that that statement be a statement contained upon page 24. I understand, further, that the laws of New York require that upon such statement they shall then proceed to determine and declare what person has been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to Congress.

I would ask the honorable gentleman from Georgia whether he considers that when they say they "cannot certify to the election of any persons to the office of Representative in Congress in the said and respective districts," he considers that to be a determination and declaration what persons have been duly elected?

Mr. GARTRELL. I will answer the honorable gentleman, and remark that he has fallen into the same error into which other gentlemen have fallen, and that is, that he has taken the wrong side of this question confound the statute of New York with the act of Congress of 1851. The latter act should be conclusive upon this point, and it provides, not that the canvassers must declare who has been legally elected—that is not the question; the question is to be decided by the House of Representatives. The act of 1851 simply provides that they shall declare the result; not the person legally entitled to the seat; but the result ascertained from counting up the ballots; and that result is to be declared by the House of Representatives, definitely, and unmistakably determined by the board of State canvassers of New York. Why do I say so? What did they determine in other cases? Here is the general certificate by which all the other members from the large State of New York have taken their seats upon this floor, in which it is stated:

"According to certified statements of the said voters, received by the Secretary of State, in the manner directed by law, the following persons have been determined, elected, and certified—"

Determine what? —"that the following persons respectively, by the greatest number of votes given in the several congressional districts of the State, were elected Representatives of the United States in the Twenty-third Congress of the United States."

Do they there declare who was legally elected? The word "legal" is not to be found in the general certificate filed by every member from the State of New York upon this floor, except by the six members from the city; but they declare, simply, the result; and what is that result? Why, they say that these gentlemen have a majority of votes in the respective districts, and that they maintain that from the returns made to them by the county canvassers of the several congressional districts.

Now, let us come back to this case—the elections in the six districts in the city of New York. I shall not respect the error, the mere clerical omission, confounding "member of Congress" with the proper term, "Representative in Congress." That is a mere quibble. Gentlemen talk about fraud, and the equity of this case. They ask, why not open this case, and let us have it settled? They say, let us get all the votes. Why, sir, there is no evidence of fraud in this case—not a particle in these several allegations made by the petitioner. He charges no specific acts, either of fraud or illegal voting.

But we must come to their certificate. They certify that Daniel E. Sickles had a plurality of the votes in the third congressional district; and that of itself determines the result. Under the laws of New York, the person having a plurality of all the votes cast is duly elected. These State canvassers—who are the officers of the State, possessing under the statutes and laws of New York nothing but the powers of ministerial officers, simply to declare what others have done; to register the vote of the people—declare further, in addition to the fact that Mr. Sickles had a plurality of the votes, as follows:

"We further certify that no votes are returned from the said county of New York for the office of Representative in Congress, and the further certify that a certificate of the county clerk has been presented to us, stating that all the ballots returned to and filed in his office as used at said election of the fifteen persons, were in fact returned in Congress, and not for 'number of Congressmen.'"

You talk about quibbles. Why, these men were truly and legally elected. Every single ballot cast for them was as 'Representative in Congress' and the further certified by the board of State canvassers. They do not certify that they will not and do not declare Mr. Sickles legally elected, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] seemed to imagine. There is no such word as "legal." This certificate made by the board of State canvassers. You cannot find it there. What is the language?

"And we further certify that, inasmuch as said office was not legally designated in the returns of the county canvassers, said county of New York under the laws, we cannot certify to the election of any persons to the office of Representative in Congress in the said respective districts."

They do not pretend to say that the sitting members were not legally elected, because they have no such power; and it is for this House to determine whether such election was legal or not.

But, sir, I desire to cite one or two authorities in support of the position I have taken, and which I believe to be the controlling one in this case—that this was a determination within the meaning and spirit and letter and intent of the act of Congress. In Cushing's Law and Practice of Parliamentary Assemblies, section 174, the following language is employed:

"As it is the duty of returning officers, in the first instance, to decide upon the result of an election, and, in their judgment, an election has taken place, to make a return of the person who is elected, they are under the obligation to do so, whether or not they are satisfied with the result of the election—that is, by stating certain facts, and referring the question of their legal position to the judgment of the House to which the return is made. The return will be received as an unconditional one."

I hold, sir, that authority—and no authority has been produced in conflict with it—is conclusive upon this question. Notwithstanding the facts to the facts in the case. What are they? The board of State canvassers refused to give a general certificate declaring that the six members from the city of New York were elected Representatives in Congress. They gave a special certificate, in which facts are stated, showing that the canvassers had not only received the largest number of votes, but was legally elected. They give a certain state of facts. This authority says, that if persons authorized to declare the result in unconditional terms make their declaration in conditional, it shall be received as unconditional. And hence the special certificate of election in this case, and in the other congressional districts in the city of New York, must be received, considered, and acted on by the House, in the same manner as if it had been an unconditional declaration of the result of that election. If that position be conceded, then I respectfully submit that this controversy is at an end. But if, as argued by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], it is not the case within the purview of the law of 1851, then I want, and might even wish, to see my hour in reading authorities to show, that, with the statute of 1851 out of the way, and conceding for the sake of the argument that this is not a case within the meaning of that statute, then it becomes a novelty in our legislative history, without a parallel, for which no precedent can be found.

What is the allegation of the petitioner? What is his request? It is that the contestant may be allowed to take testimony—original testimony, where no evidence has been taken, no notice been given to witnesses, and no deposition taken. No case has been applied for, but this party comes here, with the law staring him in the face, having remained silent for fifteen long months, and asks this House to grant him an extraordinary concession to take original testimony, upon general, loose, and indefinite statements of facts. Now mark the distinction. The act of Congress applies to taking "supplemental testimony." There is not a word, line, or letter in the act, that authorizes the House of Representatives, in any case whatever, to allow the party making the application; nor any case is found in which any such authority has been given. I call upon gentlemen, and I will give them until the vote is taken upon this resolution to-morrow, to produce one single instance where any such indulgence has been granted by the House of Representatives. And if no case can be found, I ask how we can with any consistency adopt the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections.

There is no authority, even by analogy, in the act of 1851. That act provides that the House, exercising a wide discretion—even then it is a matter purely discretionary, not obligatory—may grant time to take supplemental testimony. The special certificate of the board of State canvassers being, in my judgment, in accordance with the authority which I have read, a final and unconditional certificate, settling a result, brings this contestant strictly within the provisions of the act of 1851, and must be admitted, or else you will nullify and repeal, by mere resolution, a law of Congress; for within the provisions of that act you cannot give time to take original testimony, to serve notice, and to open the merits of the case, without a violation of the spirit, intent, and letter of the statute. Sir, I hold that law as binding upon the Committee of Elections in their action, and especially binding upon this House. While it is upon the statute-book it must be observed. If it is a bad law, repeal it, but while suffered to remain upon the statute-book, having been already argued by the House of Congress and acquiesced in by the country, it should now, as heretofore, be held binding and obligatory upon the parties in this case.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, thus hastily presented, not intending to regard the casual remarks of the gentleman already argued by the chairman of the Committee of Elections, and fully reviewed in the reports of the majority and minority, which, I presume, every gentleman has read or will read before giving his vote—I am constrained to give my opinion that this House ought not to give the time asked for by the petitioner in his motion, and that such a precedent would be contrary to law and contrary to fair dealing, after this party has allowed himself to sleep upon his rights for fifteen months.

Gentlemen talk about fraud. Sir, I think you would open wide the door for the perpetration of fraud and perjury by allowing this testimony to be taken after the lapse of so much time, from which the sitting member may find difficulty in refuting charges which would have been easy of refutation if the witnesses were fresh from the mouths of witnesses. I repeat that, if this dangerous precedent is adopted, it will throw wide open the doors for fraud; and I submit to the House: that it is better to adhere to a law that is certain, even if it is difficult to many of its provisions, than to nullify it thus summarily and by indirection. I think, therefore, this application ought to be rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. Upon looking at this report just now, for the first time, I supposed the question presented was a narrow one. It was not so narrow to call upon me to go into any vindication of the Democratic board of State canvassers of the State of New York. And yet, as an act of justice to the gentlemen composing it, I feel inclined to say a word in reply to what has been said by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER], and repeated in various forms by other gentlemen during the progress of this debate.

The allegation is, that this board of canvassers was "corrupt and dishonest." It is charged by one gentleman as disgraced themselves, "as is said by another," because, when certificate or an affidavit of the county clerk of New York had been transmitted to them along with the returns of the board of county canvassers, they did not predicate their belief in the extra-judicial manner of doing what the law required them to do.

Mr. GILMER. I ask my friend where he gets his authority for their action?

Mr. CONKLING. I will tell the gentleman where I get it. We have heard read here an act of Congress passed in 1851, and we have heard read—or we might have heard—a statute of the State of New York, and there being no conflict between these statutes, but one being in assistance of the other, I believe we want no doubtful instruction to read them in pari materia. Under the last-mentioned statute it was the duty of these canvassers to act simply upon the returns sent to them by the board of county canvassers.

I mean it was their duty to act in making their "statement," and also in "determining" and "declaring" the election.

Mr. GILMER stated that the gentleman from New York misunderstood him, and made an additional remark, which the reporter was unable to hear.

Mr. CONKLING. If my distinguished friend will bear with me a moment, I design to show to him, as I think I can, that the argument he makes here, as to the disregarded duty of this board of State canvassers, given to them by an mistaken apprehension that they refused to act upon legitimate data; whereas the evidence they rejected was a signed certificate or affidavit of the county clerk of New York, who had no more right to make it than my distinguished colleague sitting upon my right; and I will be able to glean to much from the papers and citations submitted with these reports.

But, first, I desire to say that the duty of these State canvassers was purely a ministerial one, which Mr. Lyman Trumbull, for one, although a Democrat, understood quite as well, I may say without disrespect, as any gentleman upon this floor. Had as his politics are, sir, he is an accomplished lawyer, as those here who have met him at the bar must have had occasion to know. His duty and that of his associates, who he understood it and as I understand it, was ministerial, and gave no discretion as to the evidence by which results should be arrived at; a law of the State directing that the basis of their determinations should be the returns made by legal boards of canvassers. And to perform that ministerial duty they had two acts to do. The argument of the learned gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GATRELL] is based upon the idea that when they had performed the first of these acts, that covered the whole ground, and as to fill up the contemplation of this statute of 1851, and to render it necessary for this contestant to serve his notice. Now, sir, they were obliged, in performing their duty under the laws of the State of New York, in the first place, to make a "statement,"—a determination, or determination, and a statement of the whole number of votes cast for the office named in the return of the county canvassers, and in the ballot attached; and this, though that office was unknown to the law, as was the case in this instance; the office being for a member of Congress, and the office not existing, because it may mean a member of the other branch of Congress, and it may mean a member of this House.

This being the duty of the State canvassers in the State of New York in all cases, it was their duty in this instance, however definite the intention of the electors might have been made by accompanying documents. This duty they were supplied with the materials to perform; and we have their statement. This was their first duty. Their second duty was to determine the result of the election, and to state the result of the election, in the language of this act? No, sir; it was only one of the things, and the least important thing, this board of canvassers had to do. If gentlemen will look at the Revised Statutes of New York, they will find that after making a statement of the whole number of votes, it was the duty of the board of State canvassers to proceed to its second office, to wit—and now I quote from the Statutes—"upon such statements."—the statements that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GATRELL] seems to suppose are the determination of the election—"upon such statements they shall then proceed to determine and declare what person has been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such office." This is the duty of this board of State canvassers. It is the duty to which this act of 1851, in its first section, makes reference in these words, "he," the contestant, "shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officers, or the petition of the electors authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing of the determination there spoken of, and the determination spoken of in the statutes of New York, are one and the same. My argument is, that that is the function which these State canvassers have omitted to perform. It is the duty of the House to state the result of the votes cast, not that they have failed to analyze those votes, and specify how many were received by each man, but that they have been unable to perform that act which is the consummation referred to in this statute of the United States.

Mr. SPEAKER, this objection comes here in the nature of a demurrer. It is a technical objection, and, in order to consider it, we are to assume, of course, as a court of law would do in passing upon a demurrer, the truth of the facts presented by the petitioner. We are to assume them in general terms, without going into the question of whether the petitioner is not being definite in particularizing illegal incidents in the election; that wholesale fraud was committed; frauds and bribes which, beyond all question, would unseat a person who has assumed membership here, if he can get at them. The only question is, whether the case is so stated technically, because a justice was not given long ago, from investigating and adjudicating the merits of the case. I say, first, that this board of State canvassers, performing a ministerial duty, has done precisely what it should have done, and has neither stultified nor disgraced itself; and, secondly, that although the board of State canvassers has made a statement, which the gentleman from Georgia has read, of the whole number of votes cast, that board has made nothing like a determination of the election; that, on the contrary, has explained the reasons for not doing so, and concluded the explanation by this declaration:

"We cannot certify to the election of any person to the office of Representative in Congress in the said respective districts."

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GARTRELL) says the State canvassers have gone as far as they had the power to go. I admit it, and where does his argument lead him? If the fact of expending their power renders a notice necessary within twenty days of the election, what constant rights, how far would the argument and its consequences run? If in a particular case they should have no data from which to do anything at all; if all the returns should be lost, and they make no certificate, and some man stalks into this Hall, sits down, procures the Clerk to call him, and the Speaker to swear him in, does the gentleman from Georgia mean that, because no notice has been served, he cannot be unseated? Yet that is his argument. Because these canvassers have gone as far as they had the power to go—and that was to say that a certain number of men received an votes for Representative in Congress, but simply votes for that indefinite, floating, uncertain thing, member of Congress, and that, therefore, they were unable to declare any one elected Representative—the gentleman argues that the present contestant should have acted as if they had declared some person entitled to the seat. I assume that these canvassers have gone forward like honest men, had performed their duty as far as they were able. It suffices me to know that they came to the end of their power without making any determination, and that they refused to give any certificate provided for by law to the sitting member.

We are now asked to vote upon a technical suggestion—to wink as we said as not to see an enormous fraud—because the petitioner has committed an alleged formal mistake; because he had not the abundant caution, or the avidity, to go forward and inspect the records in Albany, and find out that these canvassers had counted the votes, and then assume that a refusal to certify was the same as a certificate of election, and serve his technical notice accordingly.

Mr. GARTRELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. GARTRELL. I am glad the gentleman is mistaken in his facts. The gentleman argues that it was hard to require the contestant to go from New York to Albany to hunt up the record and see what it contained. I would inform the gentleman that it was a fact, disclosed before the Committee of Elections, that the contestant—and it was admitted by Williamson himself—saw the certificate published in the city of New York in December, 1858.

Mr. CONKLING. With all respect to the gentleman from Georgia, I must confess my surprise that he should act as right upon the proposition as I was stating, by mentioning to me a fact like that. I am discussing this as a legal proposition; and what legal difference would it have made if, in this particular case, Mr. Williamson had been within ear-shot of the board of canvassers, so as to have said or had knowledge of their acts? I am stating this as a question of law, not applicable to this petitioner alone, but to all men, whether they have or have not in fact seen, what in law they are not bound to see, namely, publications, whether fugitive or otherwise, which appear in the public prints. I am considering the matter legally, as being a question of the rights of the citizen, and am saying, legally speaking, no certificate of election having been given to the sitting member, or—

Mr. GARTRELL. Do I understand the gentleman to maintain that it was the duty of the State canvassers to have notified the contestant? Mr. CONKLING. I was about stating what must have prevented the gentleman from Georgia supposing that I meant anything of that kind, namely, that when a statute, mandatory in character, makes it the bounden duty of canvassers, if they certify or determine anybody's election, to make triplicate certificates of that fact, and put one upon record in one place, another in another place, to send a third to a particular person, and to publish one, together with their preliminary statements; the proceedings, records, and publications, thus provided for, are the criteria, according to which the rights of knowledge of the election, on all parties have a right to go by, without resorting to other sources of intelligence, whether fugitive or official statements in newspapers, or anything else.

Therefore, I say, this contestant cannot win. Mr. GARTRELL. I ask the gentleman's indulgence. The gentleman speaks of fugitive articles published in the newspapers. Does not the gentleman from New York know that the statute of his own State, to which he is now alluding, requires the canvassers to send a copy of the board of State canvassers to publish the result of their determination? And does he not know further, that the certificate under which Mr. Sickles claims his seat was published according to the requirements of that act?

Mr. CONKLING. I rather think I do know that. That is my impression. The statute of the State of New York require the board of State canvassers to publish the official canvass; and I rather think the youngest voter, and the most illiterate in politics, to any nothing of law, in New York, would know that fact, for we are a reading people up there.

Mr. GARTRELL. Then I ask the gentleman not to ignore it in his argument.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, I have seen too many evidences of the sagacity of the gentleman who has no upon the stand at this moment to suppose at all that he suffers under the misapprehension of supposing that I ignore so palpable a thing as that in my argument, or that seriously he intends to intimate that anything I have said looks like ignoring so plain a fact. If I may repeat myself a moment, I will endeavor to make plain the argument. It was this: that the election laws give to every person interested in elections certain modes of ascertaining the results. Now, I need not enumerate these modes, for it is not necessary to my present purpose to do so, but to those accessible here—namely, the certificates of election, and the filing of them—this contestant has never, to this hour, been apprised of a state of facts but by the act of 1851; nor to this hour does such a state of facts in truth exist. In other words, though he may have read the official canvass; though that canvass may have contained the only statement made, that statement not amounting at all to a declaration or determination, but being an irregular, inconclusive statement—a statement of the results of the canvass in this particular case—even though, as I stated before, he may have been personally present and cognizant of the facts, all that does not at all break the force of the argument that he, as a candidate for office, as a citizen of the Commonwealth of New York, had the right to demand that he be furnished with legal certificates, and to refuse to go anywhere else, in order to ascertain his legal rights.

Now, I do not know that I make myself sufficiently explicit to convince the gentleman from Georgia that we have in New York an official canvass, and that the gentleman is not likely to be able to present to the House the view I am taking of the matter before us. The resistance made to the resolution allowing the contestant a hearing in altogether technical, although very narrow, altogether overreaching. Because a construction has been put upon an act of Congress, and upon proceedings of canvassers, which, I will venture to say, all partisan feelings aside, ninety and nine out of every hundred lawyers would have given them, because a critical argument may be made to show that by great sharpness, by special effort, and by good guessing, the petitioner might have been able to find out the election proceedings against little evasions here, this grand inquest of the nation is asked to alight its eyes to a case reeking with fraud and calling for investigation.

I conclude the remarks I did not mean to extend so far by saying that the board of canvassers, having a ministerial duty to perform, and properly refusing to go outside of the returns for sources of information, have stated precisely the true result: that is to say, that no man from the district in question did receive votes which entitled him to the office of Representative in Congress, and that therefore they were unable to perform the functions mentioned in the act of 1851.

This refusal to determine the election being filed and published, the petitioner was not bound at all, either in his own estimation, as he says, or by a fair construction of the act of Congress, to make a construction which it can well be tortured to bear, to serve his notice at the end of twenty days from any time that can now be fixed; and he may come here, as he does, regularly, and ask this House to enable him to take his usual place in the next of these New York city elections, which the gentleman from Georgia says are the means by which others upon this floor hold their seats. That may be true; but fortunately for these others, no witnesses have offered to confront them with illegitimate and defective of their right to remain here for an hour.

One word about this affidavit, and I have done. The gentleman from North Carolina says it would not be sufficient to put a man under a rule nisi. Very likely not. But as an affidavit of merits, as an affidavit of good faith, as an affidavit of the trial of a cause, it would prevent judgment, it would protect any right which an affidavit of merits is adequate to protect. Whether, as the gentleman denies, it would cause a great prerogative to be known—an injunction, for example, which would go only upon allegations resting on personal knowledge, is wholly immaterial here. In order to have a case postponed to procure testimony from witnesses, it is enough for the affiant to state, as is stated in this affidavit, that he has been aided by the witness, and learned from them that they can testify to facts material to this issue.

So much, with sufficient particularity, appears in the affidavit before us. Of course I do not mean to say what the facts may, on proof, turn out to be. I only say that on this proceeding we are bound to assume that this contestant, if allowed the opportunity, will make good his charge; and I affirm that this affidavit of Mr. McIntire, as aimed at that purpose, is good within any of the requirements and tests to which gentlemen sitting under the rule of good faith, before a court, are drawing up papers of this sort, whether in election cases or to be used in courts of law.

I hope, sir, that we shall be able to steer clear of the technical impediments that have been thrust in our way, and to arrive at the truth touching the rights and qualifications of the person most concerned in these proceedings.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move that this House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WIRTH, of Virginia. There is no quorum voted. I move a call of the House.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Grow in the chair.) There is no question pending before the House except the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. WIRTH. What is the condition of things? Does any member want to address the House? If not, what is the objection to adjourning?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. CONKLING, their Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed an act (S. No. 142) to secure the right of preemption to certain settlers on land temporarily occupied as an Indian

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1859.

NEW SERIES.....NO. 60.

reserve in Oregon, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; and also notifying the House that it had, on March 19, 1859, ordered the usual number of the following documents to be printed:

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a new land district in that State.

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of an extension of the period of the preemption privilege to actual settlers on the public lands in that State.

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail between Stockton and Mariposa, and all intermediate post offices.

Resolutions of the Legislature of California, requesting arms for the use of that State.

Mr. BURNETT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and ten minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 21, 1859.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. Geale.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented papers in relation to the claims of the administrators of James H. Matlock and Ann Matignon, for property destroyed by the Sioux Indians, at Spirit Lake, in Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TEN EYCK presented the petition of Caleb Swann and others, citizens of Hope, Warren county, New Jersey, praying the passage of a homestead bill similar to the one passed by the House of Representatives, securing to actual settlers on the public domain one hundred and sixty acres of land free of cost, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON presented two petitions of manufacturers and others, of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the tariff, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE presented the petition of G. W. Torrence, praying remuneration for moneys expended and losses sustained while in the military service of the United States during the war with Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Albert Atwell, in behalf of himself and others who had rendered military service since the passage of the bounty land law of 1855, praying bounty land; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the proceedings of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, asking the establishment of an assay office and a mint at that place; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MASON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia concerning revolutionary and other claims of that State on the Government of the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, asking for authority to construct a railroad from Georgetown, through Pennsylvania avenue, to the Navy-Yard; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. KENNEDY presented the memorial of John Harwood, praying to be allowed compensation for extra services performed as purser during the expedition to Paraguay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE presented the petition of Alexander Wood, administrator of William Wood, deceased, and of J. M. Stewart, deceased, J. B. Chaffin, A. P. Shingley, E. B. N. Streng, and John N. Dodson, praying indemnity for depredations committed by the Ink-pa-du-ah's band of Sioux Indians in Minnesota, in the spring of 1857; which was referred, with the papers in relation to the case, on the files of the Senate, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was Ordered, That leave be granted in withdrawal from the files of the Senate the petition of Joseph Yevulski.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 249, for the purpose of putting it on its passage. I do not think it will give rise to any discussion, and it is a bill of a great deal of importance to a constituent of mine.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senator will allow us to get through with the morning business, and then I shall make no objection.

Mr. LATHAM. I yield.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. BROWN. I reported back yesterday, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, a bill authorizing the corporation of Washington to borrow money for the erection of a market-house in this city, with amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives. I ask that the bill and amendments be printed, so that when it comes up Senators may understand what it is.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 258) authorizing the corporation of Georgetown to lay a special tax for distributing Potomac islands, by the Potomac river, which was twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, further correspondence in relation to the hostilities on the Rio Grande, reported in favor of printing the usual number; and the report was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the marble columns for the Capitol extension, reported in favor of printing the same; and the report was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement of the trade and commerce of the United States with the British North American Provinces, annually, since 1850, reported in favor of printing the usual number; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin, praying indemnity for the illegal seizure and confiscation of their property at Apia, in the Navigators' Islands, by U. S. Junken, United States consul at those islands, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 297) for the relief of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommended the bill for increasing and regulating the pay of the Navy, have directed me to report a new bill on the subject; and I notify the Senate that I shall move on Friday morning, as it is a bill of great importance, and I am anxious to leave the city, and am only detained here for that reason, to take it up and consider it then.

The bill (S. No. 299) to increase and regulate the pay of the Navy was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac H. Randall, praying compensation for extra services performed by him while a master's mate attached to the Japan expedition, under Commodore Perry, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 300) for the relief of Isaac H. Randall. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

Mr. GREEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between the judges of Utah and the Attorney General or the President with reference to the legal proceedings and condition of affairs in the Territory of Utah.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. HAYES, Chief Clerk, announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed, on the 24th of February, 1859, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) making an appropriation for inaugurating the equestrian statue of Washington; and, on the 22d instant, an act (H. R. No. 3) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th June, 1861.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

The message further announced that the House had ordered, this day, the printing of the following document:

Message of the President of the United States, transmitting a copy of the convention between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay—ordered at one o'clock, p. m.

Letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of correspondence relating to the charges made against A. D. Bonestell, United States agent for the Menominee Indians—ordered at one minute past one o'clock, p. m.

PROTECTION OF FEMALE IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 19) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers and other purposes, to report the same back with a single amendment, and to ask for its consideration now. The Senate have passed a bill on this subject, and the House bill is in every respect substantially the same, indeed almost literally, with the exception of one provision, which we think ought to be incorporated in the bill. I ask for its consideration, as I do not suppose it will give rise to any debate. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill, because it is precisely the same as the Senate bill, with two alterations, which I can state, and one of these alterations we propose to insert; that is, in relation to the testimony. The other is simply an alteration of the time within which a prosecution shall be had; that is, it is limited in the House bill to one year after the arrival of the vessel, and in the Senate bill is desired; in our bill it is limited to one year after the commission of the offense. We think the House bill preferable in that particular, and therefore we have proposed no alteration in that respect.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 19) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, for the better protection of female passengers, and for other purposes.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill back with an amendment in line two of section five, after the word "act," to insert the words "on the testimony of the female seduced, uncorroborted by other evidence, nor," so that the section will read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no conviction shall be had, under the provisions of this act, on the testimony of the female seduced, uncorroborated by other evidence, nor unless a indictment shall be found within one year after the arrival of the ship or vessel at the port for which she was destined when the crime was committed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. BAYARD. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 331) to repeal the third section of the act entitled "An act to increase and regulate the terms of the circuit and district courts for the northern district of the State of New York," approved July 7, 1838, have directed me to report it back without any amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass; and also to ask for its present consideration. I will state the reasons why I think it ought to be considered. The bill simply repeals a section which ought never to have been in the law. In 1838 Congress divided the northern district of New York into what were called three divisions. In these three divisions they required the jury trials, in criminal cases, to be had in the particular districts where the offense was committed. The consequence is, that it has entailed great expense on the Government; it has delayed criminal trials to the injury of the party charged, as well as causing increased cost to the Government; and its repeal is recommended in a long communication from the Secretary of the Interior, and also from the district attorney, setting forth the absolute inutility of the law as it stands, and the reasons why it ought to be repealed. It certainly ought to be out of the statute-book; and I hope the Senate will consider the bill, and will repeal that section. That is all the bill does, and that is all for one. I consulted the Senators from New York about it, and neither of them interposed any objection whatever.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, passed the bill. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. FITCH. I now move to take from the table Senate bill No. 262, reported from the Committee on Printing of this body, providing for a reduction in the prices allowed for the public printing, and providing for the binding of the public documents, reports, and Journals. Every Senator is doubtless aware of the alleged abuses under our present printing system; abuses which, if they affect the printing in no other respect, affect the price, and yield a price altogether disproportionate to the value of the work. I do not see how the bill can lead to any protracted debate. It simply proposes a reduction in the present prices. The committee would be very glad indeed to reform, if it were possible so to do, the present system entirely, but have as yet been unable to agree upon a plan for accomplishing that object. They have agreed to a general reduction of prices under the present system. That reduction is contemplated in the bill. If there is any disagreement, it can only be as to the amount. I move to take the bill from the table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 262) providing for a reduction in the prices allowed for the public printing, and providing for the binding of the public documents, reports, and Journals, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the prices established and allowed for the public printing by the act approved August 26, 1852, and by the several acts amendatory thereof—that is to say, for composition, presswork, folding, stitching, and inserting maps and plates—shall be reduced twenty per cent. and that the purpose of giving full force and effect to this provision, the Superintendent of the Public Printing is directed to cause the accounts of the Public Printer or Printers to be made out and rendered to him, as before, under the provisions of the act of August 26, 1852, and, before certifying them to the Treasury for payment, to deduct from the agree-gate amount of each account so rendered the sum of twenty per cent., or one fifth, and the residue is to be received by the Public Printer or Printers, as full compensation for the work stated in the account.

It further provides that all the documents, reports, and Journals, which may be directed to be bound, whether reserved or extra numbers, shall be bound by the binder or binders elected by the respective Committees on Printing of each House of Congress. The reserved numbers are to be arranged in the volume of suitable size by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for their respective Houses, and to be bound in calf or sheep as may be directed; if bound in calf, the cost is not to exceed the sum of — cents per volume for octavos, and one dollar and — cents per volume for quartos; and if bound in sheep, the cost shall not exceed the sum of — cents per volume for octavos, and — cents for quartos. The extra numbers of all documents ordered by either House of Congress, the size of which may not be less than two hundred and fifty pages, are to be plainly and substantially bound in such manner as may be directed, at a cost not exceeding twelve and a half cents per volume; if printed in octavo form, or fifty cents per volume if printed in quarto form. The binders are to give bonds, with approved security, to execute all binding which may be delivered to them with all proper dispatch, and in strict conformity with the samples or styles which may be adopted; and before the binders receive pay for the binding, they are to produce the certificate of the Superintendent of the Public Printing that it has been executed in conformity with the contract, and received by him.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. FITCH. I desire to amend the last section. If the Senator has an amendment to a previous section, I will yield.

Mr. HAMLIN. I propose to amend the first section. I propose in the tenth line of the first section to insert "five" after "twenty," so that it will read: "and the same are hereby reduced twenty-five per cent."

Mr. FITCH. I shall make no opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, though I am not authorized by the committee to accept it; for my individual opinion is, that perhaps the present price will bear that much reduction. I have been in testimony that the price has gone from thirty-three to fifty per cent., and if so, of course a twenty-five per cent. reduction will be well borne. I do not think we can safely reduce the present price below that, unless we assume that the Printer is to obtain profits illegitimately, by what is ordinarily called scalping, and it is hardly fair to legislate upon that assumption. I think a reduction of twenty-five can be borne very well.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am very glad to hear the chairman of the committee make that remark. I can say that the present rates of the Government are twenty-five per cent. with propriety. We ought not to act hastily. Too large sums have evidently been paid; but in establishing the rates which we shall subsequently pay, we ought not to diminish them below that standard which will produce an interior kind of printing, and a deterioration of the system did, when it was put out to the lowest bidder.

I understand it to be true that the printing is now done at thirty-three per cent. reduction from the present rates; but whoever may be the Printer for Congress has to assume very large responsibilities, and that sum, which is the difference between twenty-five and thirty-three per cent., it strikes me is no more than a fair compensation for the responsibilities which must necessarily be assumed. I think that a deduction can safely be made, and ought to be made. I will not take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I move a further amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, to make the reduction forty instead of twenty-five per cent. I have no doubt that the printing can be done with a profit at forty per cent. below the prices now paid. We have a strong instance of that in what has occurred within the last day or two, in relation to printing the Post Office blanks. I have seen the contract for the printing of the Post Office blanks cost the Government from forty to forty-five thousand dollars a year. I said, also, that one half that price was paid to some favorites of the Government, whereas the printer, who lived in New Jersey, somewhere in the neighborhood of New York city, received about one half the price actually paid for doing the work. Under the recent regulation of Congress, bids have been received within a day or two for performing this printing. The very man who has been doing the work, for which he got fifty per cent. of the price paid by the Government, has offered to do the same work now for seven per cent. the difference, or forty-three per cent. less than the Government has been paying. The work, at this price, will cost about three thousand one hundred and fifty dollars a year, and the saving in the four years for which that work is to be done at that price will be about one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, in round numbers.

Now to prove to my mind that his bid is pretty nearly fair, there are, I know, several other offers from responsible persons, proposing to do the work at a rate of eighty, eighty-five, eighty-seven, and ninety per cent. reduction. There have been the most stupendous frauds in proportion to the amount paid, in this business of printing, that have ever been perpetrated on the Government. I do not blame the printers—the workmen who got it. They had a right to get all the Government could give them; but I blame the Government for not only wanting, but understanding, the money of the people to give it to their favorites under cover of paying a price for printing.

My belief has always been, that the true way of having this work done was by contract to the lowest bidder, in 1845 and 1846 I saw the Government pass a bill making but one Printer for both Houses, and directing the printing to be allotted to the lowest bidder. We could have got along under that bill very well if there had been a slight alteration in it. The trouble was that the Committee on Printing did not see the necessity of making a provision for disperforming his contract properly. The consequence was, that the men who got the contract imposed on us, by giving us bad paper and bad materials; but if the Committee on Printing had had authority to discharge them and employ another, and if they had been bargaining the contractor with the cost of the work, we should have been able to get along. Why shall we not have our printing done by the lowest bidder, just as we do all our other work? The printing business is a perfect monopoly. The Government has done it the last few years, it is so simple that every man goes into the printing business now. Everybody, it seems to me, understands printing except members of Congress. Some gentlemen are put upon the Committee on Printing because they have happened to edit a country newspaper, and then they say they are printers; but these gentlemen know nothing of the business. The consequence is, that they are imposed on. The impression here, I know, is against the contract system, and therefore I do not propose it, but I propose to insist upon a reduction of forty per cent. on the present prices.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair would state that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not now in order. The motion of the Senator from Maine is to amend the first section of the bill, by changing the word "twenty," in the tenth line. That is, of course, with a view of completing the section. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania would be to strike out. It is in order first to complete the section before striking any part of it. Mr. CAMERON. Would not my amendment be in order to add fifteen per cent. more, and make the reduction forty instead of twenty-five per cent.?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maine proposes to change the word "five," if we leave that out and put in "forty," it would be inane, of course, because "twenty" would precede "forty" without striking out "twenty."

Mr. CAMERON. That is merely a technical objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say a word in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not think the suggestion he has made at all applicable to this bill. I am myself aware fully of the injustice and the fraud, which have been rampant in the printing branch of the printing system; but this bill, if I understand it, and I think I do—and if I do not I will thank the chairman to correct me—applies only to that printing which is done by the Public Printer. The contracts to which the Senator from Pennsylvania has alluded are other and distinct contracts, not coming within the provisions of this law; that work is done by printers other than the Public Printer. The law, in my judgment, ought to contain a provision to meet that case, but the law as it stands applies only to the public printing, not to the contracts that are made outside of the work which is done by the Public Printer; and this bill only proposes to amend the existing law by reducing the price which it allows to be paid.

Mr. FITCH. Perhaps the Senator from Maine may have forgotten that the printing of the Post Office blanks is now put out to contract, under a very recent special law. The old law of 1852 is no longer in existence as to them; but I desire to explain that presently, in response to the Senator from Pennsylvania. This bill has nothing to do with that matter. It relates to the printing of Congress and the Executive Departments.

Mr. HAMLIN. I concur with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that that class of contracts to which he has alluded forty per cent. would be no proper reduction; but on the aggregate amount of printing which is done by our Public Printer—and I have taken some pains to examine this matter, and I had long experience on the Committee on Printing—I undertake to say that that forty per cent. is a fair deduction. If you reduce the price to a rate below what is fair and just, you will produce more of evil than good. You will produce precisely that same evil which we all experienced here some years ago, growing out of the system of letting it to the private bidder at a low rate. I was in 1845, and what was the result of it? We abandoned it, because we could not possibly get along with it. Contracts were made to the lowest bidder, and, as the Senator says, they furnished bad paper, bad materials, and they cheated us in all we got; and then after the price was reduced they came in and showed us that they had been losers at their own game of cheating; and we voted large sums to make them whole, and you will do it again.

I take it there is no Senator here who is not willing to pay an honest and fair compensation for the work he has done. If you reduce the price to that sum, you produce that competition which will bring the men back here, and they will address themselves to your kind feelings and to your charities, to give them what shall be a fair compensation for the work they have done. If you do not, you attempt to make a contract below what are fair rates, and are considered so, will be equivalent in its results to the contract system of allowing any man to take it, without regard to his responsibility, or the manner in which he will do the work. The printing is well done now; it is faithfully done; and I think you may fairly estimate that it is done at as low rates as justice and equity require.

I repeat what I said before, whoever may be the responsible party for doing this work is entitled to a fair consideration for the work he does, and he must necessarily assume. The difference between twenty-five and thirty-three per cent., in my judgment, is no more than a fair compensation. I do hope and trust that, in remedying the existing evil, we shall not run into the error of extreme, and leave the matter worse than it now is.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say a word in response to the Senator from Maine. I agree with his principles in the abstract. I agree with him, that we ought to pay a fair price for doing the work; but I claim to know what a fair price is. The fact is, that this work is being done now for forty cents on the dollar, paid by the Government, as I understand, and I do not doubt it. If we leave twenty per cent. profit, I think that is enough on as large an amount of work as the printing will be doing this Congress.

The truth is, that there has been a constant attempt, and a successful one, too, to confuse the minds of members of Congress in regard to the public printing. All the bills since have been gotten up so that nobody could understand them. A very respectable gentleman, who is now a printer, (Mr. Rives,) I believe, swore before a committee here, a year or two ago, that the Post Office blanks could not be done for a less sum than fifty cents on the dollar; that they might be done for that, perhaps, but without any profit. As I told you before, the very man who has been doing that work for years, now comes and offers to do it for seven cents on the dollar—ninety-three per cent. less than the Government has been paying; and so it is with this other printing. It is not the same class of printing, to be sure, but the same principle will apply to this as to the other.

I repeat, I would rather have the contract system. I know it can be carried out fairly, and it would have been carried out fairly before if Congress had not been deceived. A combination was got up here to impose on them, and it succeeded in doing so. A man in my State got $30,000 for doing the contract; and he has been a rich man ever since. Put it down now to the price I propose—sixty cents on the dollar—and you will have your work done just as well as you have had it done before. If not, let us give it to the lowest bidder, and see how low it can be done.

Mr. FITCH. I shall respond but briefly to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to make the reduction still greater. He proposes forty per cent. reduction. He will defeat the very object of the bill. The present price will not bear that reduction. Indeed, I am not quite sure that it breaks the contract; and he has been a rich man ever since. Put it down now to the price I propose—sixty cents on the dollar—and you will have your work done just as well as you have had it done before. If not, let us give it to the lowest bidder, and see how low it can be done.

The remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania in relation to the contract system, can be answered perhaps more properly when it is proposed to rescind that system. It failed when it was in force. We did not do it, because it was the Senator says; it broke the contract. If it is resorted to again, the same combination will be made, the same sums will be renegeted, to the disgrace of Congress and all concerned.

The Post Office blanks are not included in this bill. They are ordered to be by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but this bill has nothing to do with them. We have provided by an amendment to a late law, introduced by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BAWES], for the printing of the Post Office blanks by contract, by acceptance of the lowest bidder. I learn from the Senator from Pennsylvania, are extremely low; he says seven and a half cents on the dollar. Well, they may be, and money can be made even then, for in our hasty legislation we omitted to provide any safeguard. We simply repealed the law of 1852—in itself a very loose law, and permitting very great abuses under it—but we provided against no abuse under the law which now exists. By repealing the old law, we repealed the prohibition against competition, when the alteration in the post bills simply consists of a change of a postage matter, and now they can get the same position on every order from every postmaster in the United States; and hence, if they took it at two and a half cents on the dollar, they would make money on the operation. But this has been the case ever since we have had the law. The reduction proposed by the Senator from Maine is accepted by the Senate, I desire to fill the blanks in the second section, and to move an amendment to the third section to make the reduction retrospective; to make it operate on all printing from the commencement of this Congress, as was contemplated when we elected a Printer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator from Maine, that twenty per cent. is a sufficient reduction. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to state that the printing was now done at forty per cent. I understand it is now done at sixty-seven per cent.

Mr. CAMERON. I am surprised that Mr. ANTHONY. I understand sixty-seven per cent. is the price at which the printing of the Senate is now done. There are descriptions of public printing that are liable to precisely the same abuse as the Post Office blanks; but I do not now know precisely what they are, nor how to get at them; but they will be made known, I suppose, in the process of investigation now going on. It is in evidence that there are descriptions of executive printing on which the profit is even larger than on the Post Office blanks, which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, have been bid for at seven per cent. on the price heretofore allowed by law. I understand the Senator from Indiana intends to move an amendment to the third section, to save the Post Office blanks from coming under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. FITCH. I do not really deem it necessary; but perhaps, to prevent any doubtful construction of this bill, it would be better to add to the amendment which I propose moving to the third section a still further clause, which I can prepare in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, to make the bill harmonious, I move to add "five," in the nineteenth line of the first section, after the word "twenty."

Mr. FITCH. The Senator will be compelled to carry his amendment a little further.

Mr. HAMLIN. I see it; but that is a distinct question.

Mr. FITCH. It is simply to make that line correspond with the amendment we have already adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the same line, nineteen, I propose to strike out the word "fifth," and insert "fourth."

It now says there shall be a reduction of "one fifth," that is, twenty per cent.; we have made it twenty-five per cent., and therefore it should be "one fourth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I move to fill the blanks in the second section, as so as to make it read:

If found in cash, the cost shall not exceed the sum of fifty cents for octavo, and $1.25 per volume for quarto; and, if bound in sheep, the cost shall not exceed the sum of one dollar and a half cent per volume for octavo, and seventy-five cents for quartos.

Mr. CAMERON. What is the price now paid for that binding?

Mr. FITCH. This is less than has been heretofore paid. I understand the work can be executed at these prices, which are about two or three per cent. less than the present rate.

Mr. CAMERON. I should like to double the amount of reduction. I move to decrease the price where it is $1.25, to one dollar, and so in proportion.

Mr. FITCH. The old price at which the work has been done heretofore for sheep octavo has been thirty-nine cents. We propose doing it at thirty-seven and a half, and I understand the work can be done for that. Quartos have cost seventy-eight cents for binding in sheep. Our proposition is seventy-five cents. The binding of calf octavo is now sixty cents; the blank is to be filled with fifty-nine, the lowest proposition which the committee has been able to obtain. Cottons have cost $1.20 heretofore; here it is $1.15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to fill the blanks with the sums he has proposed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I desire to amend the third section by adding:

And the reduction of price provided for in the first section shall be operative upon all the public printing from the commencement of this Congress. Provided, That nothing in this bill shall be construed to apply to the printing of Post Office blanks.

The Post Office blanks are now printed under a special law.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator from Indiana would leave out the word "So," it may, perhaps, be construed to say that the old prices shall be charged for the Post Office blanks.

Mr. FITCH. I do not think that will be the effect of it. We leave a law in force which we have very lately adopted, and which is now about to go into operation; but I am willing that the Senator should change the phraseology so as to accomplish the purpose in any form he proposes.

Mr. CAMERON. I propose to strike it out.

The existing law has not gone into operation yet.

Mr. FITCH. The amendment was made at the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, and the Secretary of the Treasury uniformly wrong," Opinion in Rodin Blum's case, p. 37.

Mr. Forward, who succeeded Mr. Erving, as Secretary of the Treasury, said:

"The treaty is to be expounded, not by the regulations of the Treasury Department, or the ministerial suggestions or laws of one of the parties to it. The reason is obvious. The parties to the treaty were upon equal terms."

"It results that the inquiry, whether the decision of the court allowing damages for the delay of compensation, was within the power of the Government, must be determined by the law of nations."

"The damages allowed in the Florida cases, in the shape of interest, were those which were the subject of the original wrong. They were an incident which intended and was inseparable from the principal, and the decision which suspended the interest was a denial of perfect justice, virtually and substantially, that the former must also be paid."

Opinion of April 26, 1848, no file with the papers.

Mr. J. C. Spencer, who succeeded Mr. Forward as Secretary of the Treasury, said:

"I am quite sure, that in considering the power of the Secretary to revise the decisions of the judges in Florida, upon claims under the above acts, I did not take into view the question whether the measure of compensation in those cases was to be fixed according to the rule prescribed by the law of nations, but rather regarded it as a question arising under our acts of Congress, and as a question of the power of the Government to make compensation in cases of claims by our own citizens upon our own Government."

"Whether the decision of the court in the Florida cases, in the shape of interest, was within the power of the Government, must be determined by the law of nations. The Florida claims, had reference to prospective interest accruing after the award was made, or to the allowance of interest, not named and not asked for, at the time of the award, for the loss of the property. And so far as my decisions may be quoted, they ought not to have any bearing on either of the questions before the court."

"I will never give an opinion, I should say, unhesitatingly, that the rule of compensation in the above cases should be obtained from the stipulations of the treaty with Spain exclusively, and that such rule should govern the Department as well as the courts." Report of Court of Claims in Rodin Blum's case, p. 112.

Judge Bibb, who succeeded Mr. Spencer, said:

"The question as to rule of damages under the law of nations, and the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain, was not presented to my mind, was not considered by me, was not introduced into the case by me, and I am making the orders for payments without interest. In so ordering, I signed an order drawn up by one of the clerks, according to form which had previously been observed in the cases."

"The question of interest upon the value of the property destroyed at the time of the destruction, and the question for the deprivation of the use of the property, was not presented or adjudicated by me in these cases, but passed and went on."

"If the question had been raised, I feel confident that I would not have committed so great a blunder as to have decided that, under the treaty, the acts of Congress were to carry into effect the treaty between the United States and Spain, an allowance of interest, at the legal rate of the country where the property was destroyed, and that the interest then had been committed, was not to be paid by the United States, as a just compensation for deprivation of the use of the property value at the time of the destruction." Report of the Court of Claims in Harrison's case, p. 114.

So after all, Mr. President, it seems that the interest portion of these judgments was rejected by the Secretaries of the Treasury, not because it was not right, not because it was not just, not because it was not justly due under the decisions of the courts of Florida and under the treaty, not because it was not a just portion of the damages according to the law of nations and the stipulations of the treaty, but merely because it was not in accordance with the usage and practice of the Department to pay interest, or because the attention of the Secretary was not called, at the time, to the peculiar nature of the case; and the claimants were remitted to Congress for redress; were permitted to Congress for a moment to be their due; for a relief which the Department was authorized and directed to grant by the payment of these judgments in full, interest as well as principal; for a relief which justice and equity, the laws of the land and the laws of nations, which the judgments of the courts, the obligations of the treaty, and the public faith, demand should be granted; for a relief which ought to have been accorded to them years ago by the Department, but which the usage of the Department forbade. I make no comment. The simple statement of the case carries with it its own appropriate commentary. But enough upon this point.

Now, as to the question of satisfaction. Admitting our obligation under the treaty to make reparation for the injuries caused by our troops in 1819-12, will it be contended for a moment that reparation, or, in the language of the treaty, "that satisfaction" is made to the suffering parties by merely paying them, forty years afterwards—forty years after the destruction of their property—the amount of value of the property at the time it was destroyed? Most certainly not. Sir, this Government undertook and promised, in terms, and in the most solemn form, to cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries which, by process of law, should be established to have been suffered by Spanish citizens and Spanish officers, on account of the operations of the American troops in Florida. This is the obligation into which we have entered by the treaty with Spain. It is clear, sir, that by "satisfaction," both parties understood and meant indemnity—full reparation as far as practicable—legal satisfaction, or that complete remuneration which not only the common and the civil law, but more especially the public international law gives for injuries of this character. The rule of damages for property taken or destroyed is the pecuniary value of the property at the time of its conversion or destruction, together with interest from that time, as an equitable measure of indemnity for the purpose of the use and enjoyment of the property meanwhile. This was the rule adopted by the district judges in Florida in these cases. This principle is the rule alike of the common law and civil law, and of the public law of nations. It is a rule of general application, whether the injuries are committed, or as between Governments and individuals, and obtains everywhere, in all our States and in all our courts of justice, as between private parties. Our own Government exacts the application of this rule as against foreign Governments, and will we hesitate to recognize its application as against ourselves?

When this Government entered into this obligation with Spain, did either party understand or suppose that the measure of satisfaction was to be made, or governed, or controlled, or in any way affected by a private regulation or usage of the Executive Departments of this Government; by a private usage unknown to Spain, unknown to the public, and of which nobody can be presumed to have had notice? Or, the rather, was it not understood by both parties, that the satisfaction stipulated for, was to be measured according to the public law of nations—the law known and recognized by the civilized world? Was it not understood that satisfaction was to be made according to the established usage of nations, and according to the law of nations? Report of the Treasury Department? Sir, there is but one answer to be given to these questions. Private rights, public justice, and national faith have but one answer to give to these questions; and we can readily anticipate that answer.

But further, although we, however, as between Governments or individuals, a liability for the value of property has been fixed, interest follows as a necessary legal consequence; not merely as an incident to the debt, ex nomine, but as a just measure of indemnity for the loss of the use and fruits of the property. This Government, in providing a judicial tribunal to establish these claims, and by paying the original valuation of the property as adjudged by this tribunal, and as being within the purview of the treaty, virtually recognized and admitted its obligation to pay interest. And the question of interest, in fact and in law, is foreclosed by the judgment of a tribunal of our own appointment. In legal phraseology, we are estopped from denying our obligation to pay the interest. Interest is as much, and to all intents and purposes is as just a part of the legal demand to which the parties are entitled, and for which judgment has been rendered, as the original cash value of the property itself; and the payment of this interest, and nothing short of it, will discharge the obligations of our own treaty engagements.

But further, although I regard the question so clear as to be placed beyond successful contradiction, that the treaty requires that the injuries alleged to have been suffered shall be established by process of law—that is, that they shall be ascertained by a court of law, or judgment, and by him to be paid or to be rejected, or to be paid or in part, as he may think proper, and that his determination in rejecting the interest portion of these judgments is to be taken as final and conclusive, what then? Final and conclusive upon whom?

Final and conclusive to what extent, and in what respect? Final, it may be, on the party before a court of law; and if, and if you care, may here be pleaded in bar of judgment. So, it seems, thought a majority of the Court of Claims, and they remitted the party to Congress. So, it seems, thought the Supreme Court of the United States in Ferreira's case, and dismissed it, rightfully enough, for want of jurisdiction, as the Court of Claims gave no appeal from the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, or from the courts in Florida, or from the Court of Claims to that tribunal.

But surely it will not be contended that the decisions of the Secretary of the Treasury are final and conclusive on the party when taken to Congress; especially when these decisions contravene the plain and admitted obligations of a treaty engagement. The decisions of the Secretary of the Treasury, however they may be regarded elsewhere, are no bar in this forum. They have not even the merit of argument or of reason when addressed to the judgment or to the discretion of the national Legislature. We can do right; we can do justice; we can decide upon principles of justice and equity; we can discharge our treaty obligations; we can do what is right and just, or the decisions of the Secretary of the Treasury to the contrary, nevertheless. The decisions of the Secretary are no bar to our doing all this. They are not final and conclusive upon the action of Congress. We are hampered by no departmental usage, by no local custom, by no private prejudice, against doing what we may deem to be right and proper in the premises; against directing, if we please, the interest portion of these judgments to be paid, and thus discharging a conceded national obligation. And, sir, no Secretary of the Treasury, let it be borne in mind, has ever assuming the exercise of a revisory power over the decisions of the judges, and rejecting the interest portion of these demands, has ever ventured to deny or to question the obligation of this Government to pay it; but the usage of the Department was in this respect, and it was, and it has left the parties to seek redress by an appeal to Congress; and here they are, and this is why they are here.

Let me say, further, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his present position, in his present interest, judiciously or quasi-judiciously, though you assume to invest him with a supervision over the decisions of the courts in Florida. The Secretary of the Treasury has never decided that the interest was not just; that it was not due; that it was not justly due; that it was not due under the courts and under the treaty. He has expressed no judgment, as such, upon the merits of the question. He has merely set aside, suspended the interest—rejected it, if you please; not by judicial or even executive or ministerial judgment against it, but merely on account of the force, as he supposed, of a rule of practice in the Department. That is no judgment in rem; that is no decision, to decree upon the merits of the question, and therefore is not conclusive or final upon anybody, and no bar before any tribunal. You might as well say, in such case, that it is no sense and as much logic and as much law in it—that if I refused to pay the interest on my note, the decision was final and conclusive upon the creditor; and that, if he sued me for the debt, I could not plead that decision in bar of his recovery. No, sir, there is no instance in which the Secretary of the Treasury decided that the interest was not due under the decisions of the courts in Florida and under the treaty itself; but the usage of the Department was in the way of their paying it. They adhered to the usage of the Department and remitted the parties to Congress. That is the true statement of the case; and that is all that has been decided. Yet it is insisted that the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury on this question is final and decisive, and conclusive on everybody.

Let us take another view of this subject. Irrespective of the question whether the decision of the judges in Florida was judicial and final; irrespective of the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury was clothed with the right to prevent over these decisions, still I maintain that it was the duty of this Government to discharge the unpaid residue of these judgments. Sir, it is enough that the original value of the property destroyed or taken by our own troops, and for which the owners were entitled to satisfaction, to full indemnity, has been determined by a tribunal of our own appointment, and to whom we assigned this specific duty. It is enough that the value of the property, at the time it was destroyed or took it, has been paid by the authorized officer of this Government, after exercising a supervision over the decisions of the courts in Florida, with all the evidence before him upon which these claims rested. In reality, sir, the only question remaining for us to decide is one of interest, as allowed by the judges, and disallowed or unpaid by the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, the only question remaining for us to decide is, whether we will indemnify the parties, whose property we seized from them by wrong force, and whose property and persons we have enjoyed that property; whether, in short, we will make satisfaction to the injured party according to the recognized rules of municipal and of public law, and according to the terms of our own solemn promise made to them forty years ago. That, sir, is the only remaining question; and it is a question, allow me to say without offense, which not only addresses itself to our judgments as legislators, but which addresses itself to our sense of justice as honest men.

Let me take still another view of this subject. Irrespective of the treaty; irrespective of all the laws of Congress in reference to the treaty; and irrespective of all these questions of construction that have grown out of the treaty and these acts of Congress, were these claimants now before us for the first time by original petition asking redress for the wrongs and injuries committed on them by our troops in 1812 and 1813, what would be our duty towards them? The answer is a plain one, which every honest mind will suggest. By force and violence, in defiance of all law and of all right, we invaded their territory, drove them from their homes, burned down their dwellings, despoiled them of their goods, beggared their households, and desolated their country; and in saying thus much, I but speak the truth, and but repeat the words of authentic history. Here let me formulate a statement by some reliable authority—the testimony of the judges themselves; the testimony of Colonel Smith, one of the leaders of this invading force; and the testimony of President Monroe. Here it is:

"Judge Smith says: 'The evidence further proved that the cattle, horses, swine, and movables of the plantations of this portion of the province, were, during this invasion, almost without exception, destroyed, depredated, and lost to the owners. The buildings, fences, and crops of many plantations were wholly destroyed; sometimes having been previously abandoned by their owners, and at other times having remained till the destruction commenced.'"

Judge Reid, after describing the previous flourishing condition of the province, says:

"This invasion, which caused in 1813, left the country desolate. Plantations, farms, houses, stock, poultry, tools, and implements—everything in the shape of property—had been pillaged or destroyed. The country was a desert; it was useless in comfortable culture. From the beginning of 1813, we reduced to extreme poverty in the course of fourteen months; and East Florida has never recovered from the shock it then received."—Solator's Report to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated March 7, 1851. Appendix, pp. 14, 15.

Judge Brown, in his decision in the case of Farrington, administrator of Paine, says:

"The difficulty of obtaining supplies for such a force led them at once to look to the resources of the country; and large droves of cattle, with which the country then abounded, were immediately and indiscriminately seized upon to relieve their necessities; and flogging parties, consisting both of regular troops and privates, were sent out in all directions to collect cattle and other means of subsistence for the Army."

"A trial of some of the more revolting instances of robbery and plunder and wanton destruction on the one hand, that occurred during this period, or of individual cases of hostility, civil, and savage, which characterized the war, and perhaps not proper in this general statement, though they might tend to illustrate the general character of the invasion, will be sufficient to say, that before or when the whole Spanish troops finally evacuated the country, the whole inhabited part of the province was in a state of complete devastation and ruin."

Colonel Smith, of the United States Army, who commanded the invading force, wrote to his Government:

"The inhabitants have all abandoned their houses, and as much of their movable as they could not carry with them."

He adds:

"The province will soon become a desert."—Solator's Clerk's Report, above cited, App., p. 13.

President Monroe, then Secretary of State, in a letter to Governor Mitchell, of 10th April, 1812, after alluding to the fact that the troops of the United States had been used to dispossess the Spanish authorities by force, says:

"I feel it as painful to recite them as it is to transcribe, because it is too painful to recite them."—American State Papers, Foreign Affairs, vol. 2, p. 571.

I do not think, Mr. President, I lay myself open to the charge of having overwrought this subject by the recital of the picture in our country's history. The original claimants were at that time loyal subjects of the Government of Spain. A few years afterwards, in 1819, by the treaty of cession they became loyal citizens of the United States. Some of them, still living, and many of their descendants and representatives are among the most respectable of our citizens in different States of the Union. Very few of them or their descendants remain in Florida, for very few of them ever returned to their desolated homes.

Were these claimants, I ask again, now before us for the first time by original petition, asking redress for these wrongs and injuries and outrages, what would be the clear and manifest duty of this Government towards them? Sir, the voice of reason, the dictates of humanity and of every honest mind, would respond to the question, that no man and no member indeed would be the measure of redress at that—we could do no less than to pay them the full value of their property so destroyed, together with the interest, from that time to the present. No man in the honest convictions of this Congress can say, we say, that we could do less, and that is all that the bill before you proposes.

But, it is said the claim is a large one; and so it is. It reaches nearly or quite two million dollars; but what of that, sir? I have only to answer, if the claim is just, if the claimants are just, if the law is, the greater is the wrong and the injustice in withholding it. If we are under the obligation of the pledged faith of this Government to pay it, the larger it is, the more important that obligation becomes.

But, it is said, sir—and I regretted to hear the old charge reiterated yesterday by the honorable Senator from North Carolina—that these claimants have already been fully paid, and overpaid, by an exorbitant valuation of the property alleged to have been destroyed, and for these judgments have been tendered, and which, to the extent of the original value of the property, as proved, have been, for the most part, paid to them. Sir, I will not answer by saying that we are foreclosed from going into this inquiry by the judgment and decision of a tribunal of our own creation; for my pettifogging or fraudulent claims have been allowed, let it be shown; let it be proved. It is incumbent upon him who makes the charge or the suggestion of fraud, to support it by proof, or withdraw the imputation, and henceforth to be silent.

But, sir, I will answer by saying that we have a threefold guarantee in these cases against fraudulent, fictitious, or even extravagant allowances for claims: first, in the well-known and acknowledged ability, fidelity, and high character, personally and officially, of the judges themselves; and secondly, in the guarantee in the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, under the assumed character of a revision of these judgments, after reexamining them all, reduced but very few of them at all, and those very few so slightly as in no degree whatever to impair the correctness or impartiality of the decisions of the judges. Who are these judges? I hear the question asked by some one near me. Judge Smith, sir, was from your own State. Mr. Foster in the chair: Robert Raymond Reid was from the State of Georgia; Isaac H. Hall, from the State of New York.

The high personal character of these men, and their eminent judicial qualifications, commanded the confidence of the public, as well as the confidence of the President and Senate of the United States, at whose hands they received their appointment. We have a further guarantee in the character of the claimants themselves, who are understood to be among the most respectable citizens of our country. They are personally strangers to me, with one exception; and I shall leave it to those who do know them to speak for them, and to say whether they are persons who would be likely to prefer fraudulent claims against the Government. The exception to which I refer is the late General Clinch, of Georgia, whose family, it is said, are among the claimants; a venerable gentleman, with whom it was my fortune to serve in the House of Representatives many years ago, whom I remember well, and with great respect, as a modest, industrious, honorable, and gallant servant and soldier of his country. In this connection, I will read a letter from Mr. Secretary Woodbury, showing his appreciation of the character, correctness, and impartiality of these judgments:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 7, 1838.

Sir: I have received a letter from Colonel Downing, in which he expresses an apprehension that you might be misled by some mistake in the original statement of the 26th of July last.

It seems to me that an inference may be drawn from that communication unfavorable to the claimants in respect to the amounts allowed in cases, and for damages coming clearly within the principles already adopted. As no such design was entertained by the Department in writing that letter to you or any other, I perceived cheerfully to state the fact; nor do I believe to add, although in some cases the amount of the awards may have been reduced here on particular items in consequence of the parties' own fault, the claimants so much as you allowed, or for any other special reason, yet, in general, I do not apprehend that your awards have been higher as to the items approved here than the evidence warranted. On the contrary, several instances have come under my notice, where, unless your local knowledge of our laws and things not appearing on the records of this Department, and which I do not think I have been justified in granting a larger sum for particular injuries than was allowed in the award.

But you are not acquainted with the country where the claims originated, with the value of property there, and with the character of the respective witnesses; and my chief object in this communication is merely to prevent any conclusion which is so supposed may be liable to be drawn from my former letter; that an opinion is entertained by this Department, in relation to the great care and diligence exercised by you in protecting the Government from the payment of damages, larger than actually sustained by the claimants. When the awards have not been questioned, it is generally held for either exact or much less than they have been fully explained either in your or the parties, or their counsel, and which have not been inconsistent with an examination here of the evidence, and the facts from the acts of the American troops in 1812 and 1813 should receive all the indemnity which the existing acts of Congress, and the former, settled construction of them, appear to justify.

Respectfully yours, &c., LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. RAYMOND REID.

In further proof of the reasonableness and fairness of the allowances of these accounts, I will read a transcript of the accounts as allowed by the judges in two cases which have been very much questioned, and in two which have come under my observation:

Transcript of the account in Ferrer's case, as allowed by the judge.

For loss of crops of 1812.....	$350 00
For loss of corn on land of the crop of 1811, say 100 bushels, at $1.....	100 00
Two horses and one mare, at $40 each.....	120 00
Hogs, say one hundred and fifty head, at $2 50.....	375 00
Beef cattle, say four hundred head, at $10.....	4,000 00
Stock cattle, say two hundred head, at $5.....	1,000 00
Household furniture and plantation tools.....	110 00
Poultry.....	25 00
	$6,080 00

Interest on this amount, at five per cent. per annum, from the 10th May, 1812, to the 30th June, 1853.....

Making all.....$12,706 83

—

Transcript of the account in Humphrey's case, as allowed by the judge.

Farming utensils.....	$70
Three horses.....	150
Destruction of buildings at the ship yard.....	1,500
One cotton gin.....	100
Crops of 1813.....	1,500
Crops of 1814.....	1,000
Total.....	$3,260

By reference to the several items of these accounts and the sums allowed to each, it would seem that they were but fair and just and reasonable, and within the ruling current market prices at the time. Judge Brown, in reporting his opinion in the Ferrer's case in 1851, in reference to this question, said:

"That on the invasion of the country by the patriots and American troops in March, 1812, and the time they laid siege to St. Augustine, he, like other inhabitants of the country, was abandoned by his plantation and his property there and in that vicinity, and took refuge in St. Augustine, and that during the time that the American troops and patriots were engaged in the war between the 17th March, 1812, and 10th May, 1813, (where the United States troops finally routed the patriots, and the patriots were frequently treated by parties of patriots and American troops; that his cattle and hogs were driven off and sold by them; that his horses were also taken, his growing crops of corn and potatoes of that year destroyed, his house burned, and everything on his place plundered or destroyed.

"The fact that he suffered these losses and injuries by the operations of the American troops in East Florida, and that he was from being in good and comfortable circumstances, reduced to a state of ruin and beggary in consequence thereof, and the particular manner in which these losses, will more fully appear by the evidence in the case; and without detailing it more minutely, but referring to the depositions accompanying this case, I would state that the depositions sustained by the proofs in the case, promising, however, that in this case I have not been misled by the vast quantity of property at that period, I am governed not more by the proof in this particular case, but the general testimony of the intelligent witnesses in the case, and the fact, heretofore decided and reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the general market value of corn, oil, sugar, horses, and other produce, at that period in the province of East Florida at this period."

Mr. President, without multiplying citations upon this point, I will only add that, from the most reliable sources of information, we are not only authorized in saying, but a sense of justice compels us to say, that these judges, in the discharge of their duties in the adjudication of these claims, appear to have been actuated by the strictest regard to the interests of the Government as well as to the rights of the claimants.

But it has been suggested further, if not directly asserted, that the aggregate amount of property alleged to have been destroyed, and as allowed by the judges, amounting to some eleven hundred thousand dollars, indicates a larger amount of wealth and population in that section of Florida than actually existed there at that time. Sir, it is a familiar historical fact that East Florida, at that time, contained more wealth, if not more population, and was generally in a more prosperous condition, than at any period before or since. A variety of causes, some of them special and temporary, contributed to this result. The destruction of affairs in all the European Governments—for this was at a time when Napoleon stood on the necks of half the potentates in Europe; our own hostile relations with Great Britain; our embargo and non-intercourse acts; the fire and health of the climate of Florida; the destruction of lands; the high price of her staple productions; and above all, her neutral position, at that time, affording uncommon facilities for an extensive and lucrative commerce, invited gentlemen of wealth and enterprise to that province; not only from the adjoining States, but from the most remote portions of Europe. All these causes contributed largely to the growth in wealth, population, and prosperity of Florida, at that period of time. For a more full and detailed account of the condition of East Florida at that period, I will only refer Senators to Forster's History of East Florida, published in 1821, where they will find a minute, accurate, reliable description of its commerce, its wealth, its population, its resources, its staple productions, &c. Sir, those who will inform themselves in reference to the condition of East Florida at that time, will require no further answer to the captious and unfounded suggestion that the aggregate property in East Florida at that period of time did not warrant the finding of the sum of $1,100,000 as the total valuation of the property destroyed by our troops. I would say, Sir, I entertain no manner of doubt that this sum falls short, very far short, of the actual injuries sustained.

But, Mr. President, I will tell the Senate no longer in this direction. I have been induced to discharge a duty, an unwelcome duty, I am obliged to say, assigned me, in the investigation and discussion of this case. How imperfectly I have performed that duty I am but too well aware. I confess that I can do no more in the examination of this case with my propositions strongly adverse to it. I had never examined it; I did not understand it. By some sort of vague and indefinite impression, I had been accustomed to associate it with the old Florida war claims, which are regarded in the public mind with so much contempt. However, as a member of the committee to which it was referred, I was specially charged with its investigation, and after as careful and thorough an examination into the origin and nature and foundation of these claims, as my limited time would admit, I was irresistibly led to the conclusion, yes, sir, to the clear conviction—that they were not only just and equitable, but that this Government was bound, by every consideration of honor, of justice, and of national good faith to pay them.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not wish, Mr. President, to enter into any discussion as to the merits of the case, or to multiply citations in support of my relation to a citation that I made from the decision of the Supreme Court the other day, to which I referred from memory, and in which I find my memory was more accurate than that of the Senator from Georgia. This very question in relation to the decision as to the amount due to the claimants under the Florida treaty came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Ferreira's case; and, if I understand that decision, it covers several of the points which the Senator from Georgia still argues as open questions. The Supreme Court, after considering the act of Congress which imposed upon the judges of Florida the duty of examining into the amount of these claims, imposed that duty upon them not as courts, but upon the judges as commissioners, proceeds to state:

"It is too evident for argument on the subject, that such a tribunal is not a judicial one, and that the act of Congress did not intend to make it one. The authority conferred on the respective judges was nothing more than that of a commissioner to adjust certain claims against the United States; and the office of judges, and their respective duties, are entirely separated from the investigation of the persons to whom the authority is confided, and the territorial limits to which it extends. The decision of a court of law is a judicial act, and the act of a commissioner is not. The act of 1824 calls it an award. And an appeal to this court from such a decision, by such an authority, would be a question of law, and not of fact, as is usually the case in the history of jurisprudence. An appeal might as well have been taken from the awards of the commissioners under the Act of 1790, which were recently sitting in this city."

"Nor can we see any ground for objection to the power conferred on the respective judges to sit as commissioners. When the United States consent to submit the adjustment of claims against them to any tribunal, they have a right to stipulate the conditions upon which they will do so. And they had a right, therefore, to make the approval of the award by the Secretary of the Treasury a condition of the award. And the United States are bound to comply with it. No claim, therefore, is due from the United States until it is sanctioned by him. It is only the claim against the United States, and not the claim against the individual, which is the subject of the award, if a claim, as allowed by the judge, is final and conclusive. It cannot afterwards be disturbed by an appeal to this court, or to any other way, without the authority of an act of Congress."

The question of the right of these parties to due process of law, under the treaty, was raised in this case and determined:

"It is said, however, on the part of the claimant, that the treaty requires that the injured parties should have an opportunity of being heard, and that the claimant is entitled to process of law in a judicial proceeding in a court of justice; and that the right of supervision given to the Secretary, under the decision of the court, is therefore a violation of the treaty."

"The Court think differently; and that the Government of this country is not liable to the reproach of having granted its faith with Spain. The tribunals established are substantially the same with those usually created, where one nation agrees by treaty to pay debts or damages which may be found to be due to the citizens of another country. This is not a judicial proceeding, but a proceeding in the nature of a claim. The case of proceeding ordinarily established on such occasions, and well known and well understood when treaty stipulations are made, is not understood. But it is not intended to be otherwise. It is a question between Spain and that department of the Government which is charged with the payment of claims, and with which the judicial branch has no concern."

Again the court says, and it strikes me with very great force when I hear gentlemen argue in relation to the conclusiveness of these adjudications of the judges in Florida:

"If the judicial branch of the Government had no right to be consulted in the execution of the treaty in this respect, and was of opinion that it required a judicial proceeding, and that the power given to the Secretary was void as in violation of the treaty, I would hardly have decided in the case of the claimant on this appeal. For the proceedings before the judge are as little judicial in his character as this before the court. The decision of the judge is not a judicial decision, and the decisions of the judge are open to the same objections; and neither the principal nor interest, nor any part of this claim, is a judicial claim, and the judicial branch has no concern."

It strikes me, therefore, Mr. President, that in the question of the conclusiveness of these claims, we must take the whole body of judges or commissioners, as we may choose to call them, established by Congress either in one sense or in the other. We cannot speak of the commissioners below as judges, and then of the Secretary of the Treasury as a commissioner. If the Secretary of the Treasury was a commissioner, then the judges below were commissioners. If the action of the judges below was the action of judicial officers, of a special tribunal created for the purpose of satisfying the Government in relation to the amount of claims actually due, then the Secretary of the Treasury was also a judicial officer for that purpose. The act of Congress, in other words, if I understand this judgment of the Supreme Court, is fairly thus interpreted: a tribunal was to be created under this treaty which was to adjudicate these questions. Congress created that tribunal; it created the law by which it was to be governed. It recognized principles of the law of nations, and in accordance with the well-established usage under treaties of this character; the tribunal established was, first a commissioner below to examine the matter, and secondly the Secretary of the Treasury as an appellate tribunal to revise his decision. This appellate tribunal was directed to make payments to carry into effect the judgments rendered by the inferior tribunal, if found to be just and equitable, and not otherwise. Upon the question whether this appellate tribunal was to be the Secretary of the Treasury—had any judicial power, any discretion, any right of investigating the judgments rendered below, the Secretaries had some doubt. They referred the question to the Attorneys General, and every Attorney General whose opinion I have seen, determined that it was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the judgment of the commissioner below, and to pay it if just and equitable, and to reject it if unjust and inequitable; and if he thought it partly just and partly unjust, to pay the part that he deemed just, and to reject the part that he deemed unjust. All the Attorneys General so determined. They determined that that was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the decision from which I have read, affirmed these opinions of the Attorneys General.

Now, what is the case as presented to us, at least as far as my mind is affected by these considerations? The case is this: these claimants had a tribunal appointed; they presented their claims before that tribunal; the tribunal, in some cases, allowed the claims, and in some cases refused them. The decisions below were without interest, as appears on the face of the report—in other cases, the judges or commissioners below allowed the claims with interest; in other cases, they allowed part of the capital and part of the interest. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his judgment, did what he deemed equitable to each claimant. That is the report of the judges. The Secretaries of the Treasury, in many instances, struck out part of the capital, and in every instance struck out the interest, on the ground that, in the judgment of those officers, the interest was not due. Now, the honorable gentleman from Vermont, who has just argued this case, says they gave bad reasons; that their judgments amount not, in point of fact, to any judgments at all; that they were the mere act of exercise of power, and that there was no reason for their judgments that it had not been the usage of the Department to pay interest on claims against the Government. Some of the Secretaries undoubtedly gave that as a reason—and, in my judgment, it was a very specious one. The Secretary of the Treasury admitted the case on their merits, and gave reported to us that, in their judgment, these claims are not due upon any grounds of equity or justice by the Government. Mr. Secretary Guthrie is emphatic on that subject. He says, that he has no objection to that matter, and he does not believe that there is any thing due, upon any ground of equity or justice, by the Government. These claimants have had the benefit of a tribunal created for the express purpose of examining and investigating their claims. The Secretary of the Treasury has given judgment of that tribunal from the relief allowed by the ninth article of the treaty, on the ground that their cases did not come within that article. I have not studied the subject sufficiently to form a decided opinion whether their cases did or did not come within that article. I have no doubt that they did not. I will not, however, argue that; I will not even state a decided opinion upon it.

Mr. TOOMBS. What did the Supreme Court say in that case from which you have read?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not think they say that at the present time. This case is now before the Supreme Court as the honorable Senator from Georgia does. The Supreme Court says that the act of Congress put their cases under the treaty; but the Supreme Court does not say that, according to the proper construction of the treaty, their cases were under it. It says Congress has given them the act of 1834, which puts their cases under the treaty by the act of Congress; but the court does not say that, in its judgment, without the exercise of the power of Congress on the subject-matter, these cases were within the treaty; and I apprehend that any gentleman who will examine these cases independently of any weight of authority, who will then on his own self, will find it not only difficult to come to the conclusion that they are under the treaty.

But I may again have not examined that point with sufficient care to give a decided opinion on it. I have not formed a decided opinion on it, and will not express one. This, however, I do say: whether they come under the treaty or not properly, Congress, in 1834, directed them to be examined and decided as if they were under the treaty, just as the other cases had been examined and decided. They have been so examined and decided just as the other cases were. They have been partially rejected, partially allowed. The Secretaries of the Treasury, upon whose decision Congress finally rested the discretion, have determined unanimously, without a dissenting voice, that they would not allow this interest. The Attorney-General has given and again confirmed the decisions of the Secretaries of the Treasury. The honorable Senator from Kentucky, for whose opinion we have all so much respect, gave an elaborate opinion upon the subject. Mr. Cushing gave another. All the judges have determined that, in their judgment, the Secretaries ought not to pay interest. The Secretaries themselves say they ought not. Mr. Guthrie finally says that, as regards the justice of the case, in his judgment, it is no equitable principle upon which they should insist as against the United States can be based. He says:

"I am of opinion that these injuries, being in the nature of unrequited damages, would not bear interest according to the principles of the common law."

He may be mistaken in that; but he goes on to say further—I lay aside his opinion of law; I will not reach that opinion of the justice of the case, and on that rests my vote. What is his opinion of the justice of the case? He says further:

"And, as the claims have been presented so early, and have been under examination for so long a time, when the security of witnesses could deal only in estimates, without a particular recollection of facts and values, the claims have been treated, without doubt, greatly more than the amount of actual injury sustained, and that there is no equitable principle upon which the claim of interest against the United States can be based."

His opinion, then, is, that they have received greatly more than the amount of damage which they actually suffered. He says again:

"As a general rule, the United States pays no interest. Many debts of the revolutionary and subsequent wars, &c., have been paid without interest, and, in the opinion of the Government, of great merit that it should have been so. It would make more than sixty millions to pay the interest on such claims, when no doubt could arise as to the truth of the statements."

"The payment of interest on these claims may lead to an increase of a claimant's interest in the Government, and a combined action to procure its allowance."

He thinks it dangerous to enter into the question; thinks there is no equity in the demand; and that there is a calculation, that if the Government were to pay a million and a half of past interest already received in 1834; and now, by an amendment that has been added to this bill, and which certainly passed unperceived by me until a friend called my attention to it this morning, you have actually added a clause to this bill giving interest on the arrears of interest again. The amendment of the Senator from Florida has been agreed to, which, at the first blush, seemed to cover nothing but a mere arrangement for the payment of this claim in a series of bonds, instead of paying it in cash; actually covers interest on the arrears of interest again. I think that the claim for interest itself, and the claim for interest on the interest, are equally unfounded. No far as I have been able to judge of this case, from what I have heard of it, from the explanations to which I have been subjected by the Senators on both sides, my deliberate judgment is that this money is not due, and I cannot vote for paying it.

Mr. HALE: I do not propose to detain the Senate more than a few moments, but I want to explain the vote I shall give. I confess that I came to the examination of this question with a desire, if possible, to vote in favor of the bill; but as I cannot do so, I want to state very briefly the reasons.

In the first place, I notice that the honorable Senator from Georgia who spoke the other day, and the honorable Senator from Vermont who has spoken to-day on this subject, have spoken as if they were bound by the ninth article of the treaty to give the claim a judicial hearing; as if the amount of their claims must be ascertained by judicial process. I understood, from the manner in which that idea was submitted, that the gentleman spoke as if they were giving the terms of the treaty. Now, sir, there is no such term in the treaty: there is nothing about a judicial process there at all; but it is simply that these claims should be established by process of law; and the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a case made before them, have decided that the reference to the district judges of Florida, with an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, was a fair, bona fide, and honest compliance with the terms of the treaty, and that the "process of law" which they were entitled to have, they have had, and there is nothing about a judicial process here. I do not speak of it myself, but such is the judgment of the Supreme Court, that exactly what the treaty gave them they have had—the process that is provided by the treaty has been afforded them. Well, sir, by that process, to which they were entitled under the treaty, this dispute claim has been refused; the judgment that we provided for them, and which the Supreme Court say was a fair compliance with the terms of the treaty, has decided against the very claim that is now made before us. In brief, that is the statement of the case.

Now, sir, I do not say that I am not a man to whom I listened with a great deal of pleasure, will allow me, I will say that a very large part of his argument was entirely unnecessary, because, as the case stands, the question whether the spoliation of 1812 and 1813 were embraced within the treaty is not before the Senate. Congress, by the act of 1834, especially provided that they should be so considered, and they have been so considered; and therefore the question whether they were originally intended to be included in the treaty or not is a doubtful question. Congress has brought them in, and made them within it, and they have been so considered.

A great deal has been said about the very great regard that is due to the character of these judges, and the character of these claimants. I do not know anything about it, but I want to read from a speech made in the House of Representatives, upon this very question, by the Hon. Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, in 1855; and if the Senate will listen to what Mr. Orr said, I think they will come to the conclusion that winter may have been the cause of the error of these judges, and that they have been the character of these claimants, there was a sort of looseness in many of the judgments which ought not very highly to commend them to the Senate. Mr. Orr said:

"Now, sir, I think the absurdity to which I have alluded, of the error of these cases, when the greatest care or caution was taken in examining these claims, and how liberally these sufferers have already been paid. The principle I shall refer to is that of Zephaniah Kingley, &c., &c. &c."

"In the claim of Zephaniah Kingley, the principle is stated that, for the loss of crops, two thirds the estimated amount is allowed."

"This is said in the principle of previous decisions."

"In this case, seventeen thousand five hundred pounds of ground and packed cotton were allowed, at fifty cents per pound, for the loss of crops, for the year 1812. The twenty-five thousand pounds of cotton in the seed, at fifteen cents per pound,.....

$12,500

"I ask the gentlemen to notice that the cotton for which these amounts were claimed and paid, was not for cotton that was destroyed, but for the cotton that was not destroyed, but was prevented from raising."

"What was the loss of this claim?"

"Mr. Orr: It was some time in the year 1812, I think. The precise date is not given. The act of 1834 shall ask the attention of the House of John Fryer, deceased, for losses sustained in 1812, and, by the way, that does not sound like a Spanish name. The treaty provided that the property, except Spanish subjects, should be entitled to the benefit of the provisions, or of the stipulations, which I read to the House at the opening of my remarks. Here is the claim:

"Award in the matter of the claim of the executors of John Fryer, deceased, for losses in East Florida, in 1812 and 1813."

For the crops of the Greenfield plantation for 1812, $80,867
For crops of the same plantation for 1813, or damages for being prevented from planting that year, say two thirds of the value of the crops of the same plantation for 1812,..... 54,725
Voted 1848, sir, there is another item even worse than this.....

Crops of the rice plantation on the St. Mary's, in 1812,..... 11,800

For crops of the same plantation for 1813, or damages for being prevented from making crops that year, say two thirds of the value of the crops of the same plantation for 1812,..... 7,734

For merchandise destroyed, (vide testimony), the testimony Richard's answer to forty-ninth interrogatory, which is included in the first position,..... 1,000

"Making $157,146, which has already been paid to this claimant, and now this bill proposes to pay the same claimant something more than $160,000 in addition. Two large items being left for crops that were never planted."

So that, if there were only $1,100,000 agreed to be paid in the whole, here we add $157,000 awarded to one man, the greater part of it for cotton that was never raised and never planted. Now, I mention that as not my own, but as the statement of Mr. Orr, of South Carolina, upon the character of these claims, and why they were not to be paid, no attorney of the United States being present, and they were such imaginary speculations as that as to the character of the crops that could have been raised, provided the man had planted. You might just as well pay any one of us damages for crops which we might if we had been here, have planted and raised. If you go into such wild speculation as that, there is no knowing where you will end.

But, sir, these gentlemen have had everything that they are entitled to. They went before an ex parte tribunal, one of our own neighbors, a judge sitting in their own neighborhood; took their own testimony, with nobody to contradict them—nobody to cross-examine them; filed their claims; the judges made their award, and it came up to the Secretary of the Treasury, being a part of the tribunal to judge, and the appellate part, and being a judge placed there within the meaning of the treaty, and within the provisions of the Constitution, as the Supreme Court say—and he disallowed the interest.

It was disallowed by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been disallowed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It has been disallowed by the Court of Claims. Now, after forty years, having received these enormous damages for mere speculative losses, for crops which they might have made if they had had a chance to plant them; they come forward and ask us for interest. There is something very appropriate in the suggestion that was made in some report from which the Senator from Louisiana read, that if we are going to pay interest at all, we will have to take all the claims, claims about which there is no dispute, and pay interest on them; pay interest on our revolutionary debt; pay interest on claims on which there is no word of civil, and against which there can be no successful demand, before you go back to rip up the affairs forty years old, and pay interest to these men, who have received every dollar that was awarded to them at the time by the tribunal appointed by law, and at the very time they asked it.

It seems to me, sir, the claim is preposterous. I am sorry that my ardent friend from Vermont, in stating his case, went quite so far as I understood him to go, and said that no man of honest judgment could question the propriety of paying claims of this character. I would have been glad to pay to these old men, who were to be paid to them; and the inclination of my judgment was in favor of them, from the fact that they had received the sanction of my honorable colleague, who reported this bill last year, and of the honorable Senator from Vermont, who has reported it again this year, to two gentlemen whose judgment and integrity I have the highest confidence; but, sir, I cannot, consistently with my own convictions, consent to put my hand into the Treasury to pay anything on these claims.

The bill was then read and was amended.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is this bill about to be put on its passage?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BAKER in the chair.) The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand there is an amendment, which was made in committee of the Whole, that has not been offered in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overlooked it. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to add to the bill:

With interest from the date of the award: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his option, pay the amount of such claims in certificates of stock bearing an interest of five per cent. per annum, redeemable in five years, or at the pleasure of the President of the United States.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. It compounds interest. This whole claim being a claim for interest, not for principal, the proposition now is to pay interest on interest. We have never compounded before.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. IVERSON. I think the Senator from Louisiana, as well as the Senator from Ohio, does not comprehend the amendment of the Senator from Florida. The amendment is not that; that the claims are allowed to be paid by paying the money out of the Treasury now for which the Secretary may issue the bonds of the Government, bearing interest.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is a part of it; but that is not the whole of it.

Mr. IVERSON. I so understand it.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Georgia will hear the first part of it, he will see that the Senator from Louisiana and myself are right, and he is evidently in error.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I must ask the Senate, with great reluctance on my part, to postpone this case to a further day. I have listened to those gentlemen who are in the majority, and I have heard to be heard on it. A great portion of that which I should otherwise have stated was said so ably yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina, that I shall not repeat that; but there are some points in relation to the law, and some points in relation to this treaty, which I think have been omitted in the present discussion. A part of them I have endeavored to obtain from the proper Department of the Government. I have not yet succeeded in obtaining all the information I desired; but I have really been laboring so much, and under fever during the last week, that I could not devote to this matter—though I have devoted a great deal of time to it—enough time to recall my reading of the last session, in order to make the remarks that I contemplate making in reference to this claim. I do not desire anything but to have a decision of the Senate on it at this session on fair and full discussions. I think there are some matters that have not yet been touched in relation to the question of whether these claims are within the treaty. I do not think I can be more explicit than I shall be prepared on Monday, or any day the Senate chooses to fix afterwards, to go on with this discussion, as far as I am concerned. If no other Senator desires to speak now, I ask the Senate to postpone the case until Monday, and to let the speakers of the next day open the case. I do not desire to prevent the action of the Senate—nay, I consider it essential that it should take place in reference to this bill, so that we may have, if possible, a finality in reference to these claims. I do not care about the day or regarding myself. I only say that I cannot get ready, owing to the facts I have stated, until Monday.

Mr. TOOMBS. I dislike very much indeed to oppose the motion of the Senator from Delaware. Four years ago the Senator from Delaware and the gentleman from South Carolina, then at the head of the Judiciary Committee, (Mr. Butler,) were directed by the committee to bring in a majority report against these claims. Subsequently the subject was called up, and at the latter part of the session. They are large in amount, and they are entitled to full consideration. It was then objected, and very truthfully, that there was not time to investigate them. In order to give time, the question was referred at the beginning of this session to the Committee on Claims, and a bill was brought in, and three weeks' notice, at least, was given of time for which it was made the special order. We have been debating it two or three days. The committee's attention has been turned to it officially for four years, to my knowledge. I do not think, at this stage of the proceedings—I have, it is true, some personal reasons—that it is fair in the Senator to ask the Senate to postpone the bill, and not let it now be determined whether the Government is to pay the claims, or whether it is to go on with his speech this evening or in the morning. I do not think it is a reasonable request to ask to postpone the bill until next week.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I do not like to seem ungracious to my friend from Delaware in arguing the matter. I, on the contrary, would very much like to hear him. I have known heretofore that he has attempted on several occasions to argue these claims, and he has never yet argued them. I should be unwilling to have a final decision before he argued them, if he really desires to argue them. But, in addition to what the Senator from Georgia has said, I would call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these claims were reported, I think unanimously, from the committee at the last Congress and on various occasions during the session before the Senate met, so that I have a decision on them; but the amendment of the claims sought, by every device known to us, to delay them, and they did delay them until near the close of the last session. Then, on one vote, they were referred to the Court of Claims, professionally for the purpose of postponing them, and the Senator from whom we could not be brought to a decision on them. I know that that is not the purpose of my friend from Delaware. I know he desires to discuss them, and have a decision on them at this session, and I presume some other gentleman desires to be heard against the claims this evening, and then we can postpone them until to-morrow.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock, when my colleague may have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. BAYARD. I certainly do not desire, as I stated, to delay the consideration of these claims. I do not desire to prevent a decision, on a full hearing, during the present session of Congress. I should not like to see it shut out of the Senate, for the former decisions would have disposed of them; but it seems I was mistaken. I found at this session that, on the 28th of February, the Committee on Claims adopted the report made at the last session, after the honorable Senator from Vermont had been present, and I am sure I am sure how long; but that report was not printed until the 5th of March, if I recollect rightly; for I inquired for it, and could not get it. I did not know, until it was printed, whether it varied from the former report or not; and I was not aware, until the report was made, that it was the intention again to press these claims at this session. Immediately after the report was printed the motion was made, two weeks ago from last Monday, to make this bill the special order. It was made at the close of the day, and was not made until I desired and intended to speak on it whenever in the course of the debate, I could; but, unfortunately for me, during the last week there has not been, since Wednesday last, a single day on which I have not had more or less of fever, accompanied by constant delirium of the system, arising from its passing off and coming on again. Notwithstanding that, to the neglect of my other business, I have taken occasion to reread the history of these claims, because, in the discussion of a case like this, I adhere to the principle that error latet in generalibus. I want the modifications I have endeavored to seek them. I will endeavor to bring the facts specifically on some of these points before the Senate, which to me (for I have no interest in the claims) have removed all doubt from my mind. I am sure that these claims are within the treaty or not, and I am sure they are; and I am sure that the Senate may decide differently; but thinking, as I desire to present the views I entertain, some of which have not been presented hitherto, and many of which have been in the mind of the honorable Senator from North Carolina of yesterday, which I have read to-day.

I have found it necessary to resort to the Department for what I consider essential facts for the illustration of this question; and owing to the circumstance that, in the State Department, where most of these papers ought to be, from its contracted accommodations, they have been thrust up into the garret, it is almost impossible to find any communication of the year 1812 or 1813, or even the year subsequent. There are some documents that I have longed to see. Extracts have been used from them for the purpose of giving an impression which I consider erroneous as to the state of the case. I certainly ought to have the means of getting them. I have taken great pains to do so. I have applied to the Executive and obtained his order to look for these papers. They have not yet been found; but there is some hope that they may be. I allude particularly to a document which I consider erroneous as to the state of the case. I am sure that the President supposes that he has seen in print. All I can say is, that if he has, I have in vain searched for it. I have found the instructions to General Matthews by the President of the United States, when he appointed him in 1811; but I have in vain searched for his answer, stating what he had done, and which the President removed him. I think it is but justice to the Government that the representation made by the officer appointed by them, and on which they acted, should be before the Senate. I have never seen it, in an extract from a report, and I have been assuming that fact in relation to the conduct of General Matthews which I have seen no evidence to warrant. Now, sir, I desire to obtain that. I hope I can do so. I certainly ought to be able to do so, for it was a communication to the President of the State, and should be in the State Department.

Again, there is another document which has been referred to—the letter of Colonel Smith, in command of the troops. A paragraph was used by Mr. White, as an extract from that letter, which on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, was an unjustifiable purpose; and I am inclined to think that the context of the letter would show that there was no foundation for the purpose for which it is applied. I may be wrong; but I want to see that letter. It is said by Mr. White, in a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, that he had been addressed to Governor Mitchell after he became commander, and that it was sent by him to the Secretary of State. I have asked that that letter might be obtained. I have not yet been able to obtain it. I desire to see it, and further search will be made. There are one or two other papers that I desire also to see, because, although I made up my mind previously against the allowance, I do not want to make it up now finally, if it is capable of change from the facts of the case. I desire to see them, and to have a certainty of facts—not assumptions.

I conceive that in the report of the committee I shall be able to point out what I consider errors—assumptions of fact, as well as assumptions of law. I may be mistaken in all this; but under these circumstances I do not think I ask too much indulgence of the Senate. I think I do not ask too much even from the friends of this bill. I will vote with them to make it a special order for any day next week that they please. I propose to discuss it, and I will not be able to do so, but I will do so all, I will take the hazard of it. If I do not well enough to do it, I will give up the discussion. Neither I nor any other man could control the accident of disease, that has disabled me from pursuing the investigation to the extent required, or to the neglect of other official business, that I have to attend to; and I think it would hardly be due to the position a Senator occupies in this body to compel me either to abandon the purpose of making any remarks on these claims, or to make them when I am unprepared to do so by the cause I have stated.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President, for two reasons, I rise to make a motion to postpone this bill. The first is, in order to give the Senator from Delaware a chance to discuss this question. He manifests great feeling and interest in it, and that is a reason why I should, especially, ought to understand it. I desire that he shall have a fair and full opportunity to discuss it. I move to postpone it to Tuesday next at one o'clock. My next reason is, that I wish to take the opportunity to allude to the case of the State of South Carolina, and I move, therefore, that this bill be made the special order for Tuesday next at one o'clock.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope that will not be done. If the gentleman from Delaware wishes to be heard, I do not object. I have been promised that speech a long time, and I wish to hear it, and I want to hear it. I propose to let him take an additional week, as I see it is to be postponed, and let us make it the special order, say for the 16th of April.

Mr. BAYARD. Well, take the 16th.

Mr. TOOMBS. It fits to be postponed, I will agree to that.

Mr. BAYARD. Whether it is next Tuesday or the 16th of April, I will consent to any time named by the Senate. Give me until Monday next, and I am willing to take any day afterwards. If it suits the Senator from Georgia afterwards to reply to me, though I am aware of his ability, I think he will find in this case, with all his power of reply, it will be difficult to overcome the facts which I shall present.

Mr. TOOMBS. Let us see about that when we get through.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to remark, inasmuch as I made the motion to postpone until to-morrow, that I am perfectly satisfied with the arrangement indicated by the Senator from Georgia. I wish to hear my colleague and I understand he is not prepared to go on this afternoon, and that was the reason I made the motion to postpone until to-morrow. With the consent of my colleague and the Senator from Georgia, if it is agreed to postpone the bill to a future day, I am perfectly satisfied, and withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on postponing the further consideration of this bill, and making it the special order for the 16th of April, at one o'clock.

Mr. MALLORY. I concur in the propriety of that order, and agree to it, although I shall not be here on the 16th of April, and the discussion must go on, so far as I am concerned, without my having any opportunity to reply. I shall be in Alabama. I trust not, however. But, sir, I admit that the bill ought not to pass without the fullest and fairest investigation; and I rely very much upon the Senator from Delaware for giving us that information which he says we have not before the Senate. I have been in the habit of arguing at these elections, for years, since I have been here, and I doubt very much whether the paper to which the honorable Senator alludes, the report of General Matthews, can be found. If it could, I think it would have been found before. Diligent search has been made for it. At all events, I trust Senators will by that time at least have familiarized themselves with the facts upon which the case depends and upon the principles which it involves, and that we shall have a decision upon it in April.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand that the homestead bill is now before the Senate. If not, I move that it be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next special order on the Calendar is Senate bill No. 1, the homestead bill. The Senator from Tennessee moves to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to grant to every person who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period therein specified.

Mr. GWIN. Now, I hope the bill will be laid aside informally, to enable my colleague to have a private bill taken up.

SAMUEL J. HENSLEY.

Mr. LATHAM. I asked the Senate this morning to take up the bill (S. No. 249) for the relief of Samuel J. Hensley. I want to make an explanation, which will be very brief, in relation to it.

The Secretary read the bill, which directs the payment to Samuel J. Hensley of $6,375, for twelve hundred and eighty-five head of cattle by him actually delivered in May, 1855, to the agents of the United States for the use of the Indians in California, as found by the Court of Claims.

Mr. LATHAM. The bill has been reported unanously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will allow the Chair to state the question whether the Senate will take up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say a word on that question.

Mr. MASON. That bill involves too much money to take it up in this hurry, and decide on it.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is another objection. I dislike exceedingly to interpose an objection to any request of the Senator from California; but this bill is far down on the Calendar, and it is large in amount. Not because it is large in amount, however, will I object; but I want to know what more merit there is in this bill than in the hundred which stand before it on the Calendar? If we go on and take up a bill here and a bill there, those that may have peculiar friends to sustain them, we leave all the rest behind. If there is great merit in this, let it stand on the Calendar to stimulate that Senator and his colleague, and all who know it to be just, to dispose of the preceding bills so as to enable us to reach it in the order of business. It seems to me that there is no good reason why we should wrest this out of its place and do injustice to others. I hope it will not be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to take up the bill for consideration.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 18, nays 23.

FURNISHING NORTH WING OF CAPITOL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized to have the north wing of the Capitol stored up with the necessary fixtures for use in conformity with the general style of those in the south wing) in the passageway, corridors, committee, office and other rooms; and also in the committee rooms, and in the offices of the members of the Senate, in their judgment, is necessary; and that the cost thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

There can be no sort of objection to it, I think, and I trust that it will be passed at once.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, it will lie over.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection. It is simply leaving it to the discretion of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON. I want to think about it.

Mr. MASON. I shall renew the objection, if it be withdrawn.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 21, 1860.

The House met at twelve o'clock, Mr. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. THOMAS H. STOCKTON. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE INTERFERENCE.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. HOARD, CAGE, BONHAM, BURNHAM, and DIMMICK, a committee under the resolution adopted on the 6th instant, to inquire relative to the alleged interference of the Executive with the action of the House.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill graduating the price of certain lands in the State of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ARTHUR EDWARDS AND OTHERS.

Mr. LEACH, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of report No. 163 from the Court of Claims, and that the papers in the case be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. What claim is that?

Mr. LEACH, of Michigan. It is an adverse claim, on the petition of Arthur Edwards and others.

RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. BOTELER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the construction of a railroad and telegraph communication from a point on the Mississippi river, south of latitude 35° to the Pacific railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

Mr. BOTELER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the construction of a bridge over the Potomac river at Georgetown; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a clerk to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ a clerk, at the usual compensation of four dollars per day while in the actual employment of said committee.

Mr. BURNETT. I object to that.

STATISTICS OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. KINGSIGHT asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, under the supervision of the comptroller thereof, for the use of the House of Representatives, one copy of the statistics of manufactures communicated by the President of the United States to the two Houses of the Congress of 1859, 1860.

Messrs. COBB, CRAIG, of North Carolina, and others, objected.

NEW YORK CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I call the attention of the House to the report by the Committee of Elections in the case of the New York contested election.

The SPEAKER. The business before the House is the consideration of the following resolution, reported by the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That A. J. Williamson, contravening the right of H. D. R. Rice, to be elected to the House of Representatives from the third district of the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Rickles, within ten days after the date of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said cases; and that the said Rickles be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Williamson, within ten days after the date of this resolution, a particular answer thereto; and that both parties be allowed sixty days after the date of the said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials; before some justice of the supreme court of the State of New York, residing in the city of New York, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 10, 1840; on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] is entitled to the floor.

SEIZURE OF MEXICAN VESSELS AT YERA CRUZ.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Committee of the House of the names of two Mexican vessels, in or near the harbor of Vera Cruz, by the United States ship Sturgeon, was in pursuance of orders from the President or Secretary of the Navy or of the acts of the officer in command or the Marquis has been, or will be, approved by the President. Also, that the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, communicate in the House copies of the orders and instructions under which our vessels in the Gulf of Mexico are now acting.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR RAILROAD PURPOSES.

Mr. LANDRUM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill making a grant of lands to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object, and insist on the regular order of business.

IMPROVING THE NAVIGATION OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report back a resolution which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, on the subject of improving the navigation of the Potomac; and to ask that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

invoked in aid of the law by virtue of which we are acting.

In the first place, let me inquire very briefly into the force and true meaning of the terms "member of Congress" and "Representative in Congress," for evidently upon a supposed difference in meaning of these expressions has originated the uncertainty in this case, and upon which supposed difference has been constructed the argument which occasions our difficulty.

I understand that virtually there is a difference between them; that they are convertible terms, and of equal constitutional effect; terms employed in common parlance, recognized habitually by the body of the people, with but one meaning, and obligatory in their use upon every returning officer throughout the United States, wherever and whenever they may occur. What, sir, is the significance of the common parlance? Why, that the sitting member is a member of Congress. I grant you that in strict verbal criticism the expression "member of Congress" is obnoxious to the charge of uncertainty; but it has as accepted, common, intelligible, and certain meaning, intelligibly employed by all.

But, sir, I maintain that if my colleague [Mr. CONKLIN] was correct in the position which he has recently assumed, that it does not follow that because a person is a member of Congress he must therefore necessarily be a Representative in Congress; yet, if there are certain facts and circumstances, as in this instance, connected with that designation, I contend that it is equivalent to the term "Representative in Congress."

Now, sir, the Constitution, at article one, section one, refers to "members of the House of Representatives;" at section five of the same article, in respect to their qualifications, their punishment, and their expulsion, the Constitution again refers to "members of the House of Representatives." But, sir, let me invite another consideration. The Constitution also directs that "members of Congress" shall be elected by the people of the States; but it also directs that Senators shall be elected by the legislatures of the several States. That, sir, if we shall have presented by any official document, as we have here presented, the fact that a gentleman was elected in one of the congressional districts of any State a member of Congress, the term "member of Congress" for such case would be a judicial act, by the House. That, sir, that "Representative in Congress," for, sir, it would be impossible, under the circumstances, that the gentleman could have been elected a Senator, for he would have been elected by the people in his congressional district; and I elected a member of Congress, evidently he could have been elected to nothing but a seat upon the floor of the House of Representatives. This is no technical argument; it is based upon a common-sense view of the case; and if I am able at this time to show that a member of Congress, within the common-sense construction of the Constitution, a Representative in Congress, then is the whole argument disposed of.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to this branch of the question, namely: what was it that the board of State canvassers of the State of New York declared? As a preliminary to this consideration, I should refer to the action of the House upon the matter in hand. There were six members elected from the city and county of New York, and each one of those members held and holds his seat by the same title which appertains to the sitting member from the third congressional district. Upon the same title these members were admitted to their seats without protest and objection. The House is, by the Constitution, the judge of the qualification and title of its members to their seats. It follows, then, that the evidence which was presented here in the case of Daniel E. Sickles was sufficient, in the judgment of the House, to entitle these gentlemen to seats upon this floor. If that may be assumed, and I contend that it is inferable from the action of the House upon the occasion of its organization, then the contention is disposed of from setting up that there was not an election, or that there was no legal determination to that effect. I grant you that if a protest had been presented, the question might have been far otherwise; for the sitting member would then have been construed as occupying his seat under the conditional protest interposed by the contestant.

With this preliminary observation, I proceed to argue, with great brevity, the character and nature of the paper or instrument which has been presented here, and upon which the sitting member claims title to his seat. It will be recollected by the House that the terms of the law of 1851 require that any person who intends to contest any election of a member to this House shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer, or board of officers, authorized by law, give notice, day by day, and I think, then, in daily writing, a paper which was signed by the board of canvassers of the State of New York is a legal, full, and efficacious determination of the result of the election in the third congressional district of New York; and I think, sir, that it will require no great stretch of legal force or reasoning to arrive at a corresponding conclusion, and to fortify it.

It will be recollected that the statutes of the State of New York require that the board of canvassers shall make a statement of the votes cast at any election for various offices; and that upon that statement they shall determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices, or either of them. Here are three distinct acts which are made imperative upon the board of State canvassers: first, a statement of the votes cast; second, a determination of the result of the election; and third, a declaration of the names of those persons who have been elected. I call upon the House to observe this, that the language of the Federal law of 1851 has specific reference alone to the determination of the judicial action, of the board, as to either their ministerial or mechanical action.

Will any one here rise in his place and maintain or argue that the counting of a number of votes is a judicial act? Certainly not; and the summary of the votes constitutes the statement, which is ministerial. Will any one here rise and declare here that the declaration of the name of the person who is elected is a judicial act? Not one; the man who would do so might as well point to yonder clock and declare that the hands of the clock are the motors of the action without, as here, the determination of the result of the election, the judgment of results is the source whence comes the declaration, and is the alone judicial power vested in the hands of the board of State canvassers. This they performed. They determined what the law required. I challenge any gentleman upon the opposite benches to gainsay that this board of canvassers did not perform their judicial functions and did not determine the result of the election.

Let us, sir, see what it is to which they certify. They certify, from the returns made to them, which I saw many votes were cast in such district, so many in another, and so on, through the whole six districts of the city and county of New York; and then, having made this statement, they determine in these words, namely:

We further certify, that, in said third congressional district, Daniel E. Sickles received the greatest number of votes for the said designation of member of Congress."

What is that, if it be not a determination? They have already calculated, already presented, already certified, a statement of the whole named and how many each one received. Having done that, they then determine that Mr. Sickles received the greatest number of votes in his district. Let me alight, at this point, to an authority which I take to be conclusive upon this line of the argument. It is so perfectly and so much borne out by the fact, as I am assured I may be pardoned for reading it. It is as follows:

"As it is the duty of returning officers, in the first instance, to decide upon the result of an election, and, in their judgment, an election has taken place, to make a return of the person elected, where they undertake to return themselves from this position, they make a conditional return, not by stating certain facts, but by raising the question of their legal operation in the judgment of the body to which the return is made. If the return is received as an unconditional one,"—Chauncy's Law and Practice of Parliamentary Disabilities, s. 174, and cases and authorities cited.

Now let me suppose here, that having determined what were the facts within the purview and force of this authority, the canvassers determined to submit these facts to the judgment of the House, and upon its strength it is clear that it is none the less a determination, and must be so considered in connection with the administration of all parliamentary law.

But I have done yet with this portion of the case. What might has the board of canvassers accomplished? Thus far, sir, we learn of their affirmative action. The statute of the State of New York requires that the board shall determine and declare. Does the statute then require that they shall do nothing but that which is to be declared; and yet that board proceeds to do something, in the negation of that other something which they undertake to prove not to exist, namely:

"That inasmuch as said officer was not legally designated in the returns of the county canvassers of the said county of New York to board, we cannot enter in Congress, in the said respective districts."

Where, sir, did they procure the power to certify that no one was elected? See in the statute the obligation imposed upon them to declare when a person is elected; but nowhere the power to certify that no one was elected. They having then, sir, performed their duty, and determined that somebody was elected, the man—if there was not one Solomon among them, these gentlemen disclose that there was at least one solemn goose—having determined in their official roles and performed the full functions of their office, proceed to declare—not it is presumed being thereunto controlled by either the people or the law, nor yet by a regard for the general good—which has not been done. Sir, that declaration is coram non judice, and is as worthless as so much blank paper. And I defy gentlemen from whatever part of the country they may proceed, with whatever official robes they may be invested, to maintain and prove that to be official which they are not authorized to declare by the law under which they act.

But, sir, let me come to another consideration regarding this statement of the board further:—We further certify that a certificate of the clerk has been presented to us, stating that all the returns returned to and filed in his office, as used at said election, for the aforementioned offices, were for persons in Congress, and not for members of Congress."

Sir, is the House not aware of the fact, that the returns, having been acted upon by the board of county canvassers, must necessarily be transmitted to the committee on the part of the House also aware, that that county clerk, with his archives before him, certified it to be correct in the board of county canvassers when they declared that the votes were cast for "members of Congress 1851." And of the board of State canvassers were thus officially enlightened, I will on this wise answer gentlemen upon the other side of the House, when unfavorably commenting upon this difference in the sources whence flowed information to the board of State canvassers, that the authority of the official record, filed in the county clerk's office in the county and city of New York, was equal authority with the returns of the supervisors of the city of New York, or of the board of county canvassers.

But I am not obliged, by stress of argument, to rely entirely upon either extrinsic aids. I recur to the position which I took in the first place in reference to the determination of the result of the election, namely: that the result of the election having been proclaimed by the proper authority when returning that so many votes, and of those that a majority had been cast for Daniel E. Sickles, the sitting member from the third congressional district of New York, was in legal effect a determination of the result of the election. What more? Was it necessary for them in addition to declare him elected? That would not have been a determination within the purview of the law of 1851. It would have been merely a sequence of the determination; and without that declaration the determination would have controlled the title to the seat. Then, sir, the conclusion is unavoidable, that this was a determination of the number of votes cast for member of Congress. And if it appears here upon the face of the determination that a majority of those votes were cast in this instance for the sitting member, it must follow, as well upon the statement of the returns, as upon a determination of the result of the determination referred to by the Federal law was made at the time this paper was signed—the 21st of December, 1858.

Then, sir, I think it may be safely concluded that this was a determination of the result of the election; that it has no been considered by the House; that upon that point both parties here are estopped by the decision of the House, and that the law under which we are acting is based upon such considerations, and was enacted for such reasons, as to preclude the propriety or the legislative possibility of opening a case which is broadly without any basis of law or equity.

But, sir, there is no other consideration which actuates me now, and which I will present before I resume my seat. It is this: I do not see how the contestant avoids the unpleasant dilemma to which these circumstances and facts reduce him. If there was no legal determination, then he has no title to his seat any more than the sitting member. But the sitting member enjoys the advantage that while neither, according to this supposition, is entitled to a seat, yet the House has determined under the circumstances, ex gratia, for many other reasons, to allow the sitting member to take and maintain a position here; so that if the contestant was thus hopelessly removed beyond the possibility of relief by the action of the House, and if it be conceded that he was not, by the determination of the board of State canvassers, entitled to a seat, I will ask you, in the name of heaven, to claim the relief which has been extended exclusively to the sitting member; or how, in the other, he can claim an advantage from an election which he himself is, from the necessities of his argument, the duty to concede to the sitting member. He has been culpably negligent, and is not entitled to the benefit of the Federal law. If he was not elected, the action of the House supersedes him, and my friend upon my right [Mr. Sickles] is entitled to his place.

Now I cannot see how the rights of this case can be tortured into any other channel than those legally applicable to the circumstances thereof; and I think I have conclusively shown—and I shall so continue to think, until the legal argument is overthrown—that here was the legal determination contemplated by the Federal law which has been cited, and which determination having been made in December, 1858, that the contestant now, at this late day, should take nothing by his effort to unseat the sitting member from the third district of New York.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should not occupy the time of this House in reference to this question, did I not suppose it related to interests and involved consequences beyond the personal rights of the sitting member from the third district, or the contestant who is now at issue before us. However worthy they themselves may be of our careful consideration, it has appeared to me during the whole of this discussion that it does involve principles of the greatest importance, and that we are now, at this time, about to establish a precedent, and about to give, in reference to this point, construction to the act of Congress, which will be of the highest importance hereafter, and which, therefore, we should take the utmost care to have correctly settled.

Sir, this discussion has taken a somewhat wide range; and it may be useful to call the attention of the House back to the precise points that are here in controversy. The question here, Mr. Speaker, is not, in the first instance, as to the right of the member who claims his seat or the rights of the other members from the city of New York to their seats here. It is in no respect a question for us to decide now, whether, on these certificates that were here presented, there is sufficient to authorize the House to give the seats to the Representatives from the city of New York. All that may be with regard to this question, it would not touch the points of this discussion. Neither, sir, is it a question whether the act of the board of State canvassers of the State of New York was or was not a wise, discreet, and correct act in itself; and very much of the discussion that has taken place in this matter, and which have been, it seems to me, avoided if this distinction had been kept in mind.

The question is not what the State canvassers should have done; but it is what the State canvassers did, when they were asked to do so, and that they have declined and refused to do, and on this question it is that we are to decide in this case.

It is quite unnecessary, and it would be quite superfluous in me to undertake to defend the conduct of the State canvassers—all of whom, I believe, are of the true Democratic faith—none of whom, I suppose, can be charged with having been actuated by any prejudice in this case against the members from the city of New York—all of which members, with one exception, are of their own Democratic family. Each one of these State canvassers was born in the purple; for I believe that the Democracy claim to be sovereigns in this country, and that all other parties are subjects. Each one of these canvassers was a man of the true faith; and I do not feel called upon to defend their action in this case. But, Mr. Speaker, is it so clear that their action is correctly denigrated here by the minority of the committee, as a "paltry palinode"? Is it so clear that the State canvassers had the right to do, or could have done, more than they have done in this case? Why, it seems to me the mere reading of the Constitution goes very far to defend their action in this respect. The Constitution of the United States provides, in the first place, that Congress shall consist of Senators and Representatives—two distinct classes—both of which, I think it must be admitted, are members of Congress. After declaring that Congress shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, the Constitution then proceeds to the second section, and there, in the first paragraph of language which is peculiar to that instrument, that no person shall be a Representative—not a "member," but a Representative—who shall have attained a certain age; and again, that no person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained a certain other age. It then proceeds to declare, in the fourth section, that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for "Senators and Representatives"—both of which are members of Congress—shall be prescribed, in each State, by the Legislature thereof. Then, in the sixth section, it provides that "Senators and Representatives" shall receive a compensation for their services; and again, in the same section, it speaks of them as "Senators and Representatives"—never, in any case, using the loose and indefinite term of "members of Congress," which term applies as well to Senators as to Representatives in Congress.

Now, sir, let us look for an instant at the facts. What did the board of State canvassers undertake to do? What was it their duty to do? The Constitution determines that the duty of the State canvassers is to determine the result of the election, and the statute declares that the canvassers shall make an statement of votes given for Senator and other officers, and another statement of votes given for Representatives in Congress—using the specific language of the Constitution of "Representatives in Congress," and not, of course, the expression "member of Congress," which is a generic term. On such a statement they shall proceed to do what? To adjudge? To adjudicate, as my honorable colleague [Mr. JoHN COCHRANE] says? Not at all. They shall proceed to declare and declare. They shall count the votes; and, as the result of their counting, they shall declare what persons have been, by the great number of votes, duly elected to such office. To what office? To the office of "Representative in Congress," and not to the office of "member of Congress."

What further shall they do? They shall then make and subscribe, on a proper statement, a certificate of such determination, and shall deliver the same to the Secretary of State. Now was the certificate of such determination ever delivered by them to the Secretary of State? The certificate delivered by them to the Secretary of State (for I shall immediately refer to this other statement) was the certificate that all the others of the thirty-three Representatives from the State of New York were elected, and accepted by the members from the city of New York. Then the statute proceeds to direct that "the Secretary of State shall, without delay, transmit a copy, under seal of his office, of such certified determination to every person therein declared to be elected, and to the Governor." Is it so clear that the certified copy of determination ever been transmitted by the Secretary of State to the sitting member in this contest, or to any of the sitting members from the city of New York? Never! never! There is no proof of it. There is no pretense of it. It is as clear as the fact does not exist. What more?

He shall prepare a general certificate under the seal of this State, and attested by him as Secretary thereof, addressed to the House of Representatives of the United States, in that Congress for which any persons shall have been elected, of the due election of the persons so chosen at each election as Representatives of this State in Congress; and shall transmit the same to the said House of Representatives at their first meeting."

Now, sir, in this "such certificate," as it is called in this statute, which was prepared by the Secretary of State, the name of the sitting member in this case was left out.

Now, what does the Federal law provide? It provides, with very singular coincidence of language—which was alluded to by my honorable colleague [Mr. CONKLIN] who spoke on the same side yesterday—that the party "shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officers or board of State canvassers authorized by any law to determine the same, give notice," and so forth.

Now, the honorable gentleman who has just taken his seat says that the decision of the county canvassers is sufficient; that that is a sufficient determination of the result of the election, even if the State canvassers should not act at all, if I understood his argument aright. Now, that determination was made by the county canvassers, I think my colleague says, on the 21st day of November, 1858. I would ask my colleague, then, if the thirty days began to run on that day—

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. My friend and colleague evidently misunderstood my proposition. I intended to say that the determination by the county canvassers was sufficient to determine the sitting member, and received a majority of the votes for member of Congress from the third district, was a judicial and legal determination of the result of the election in that district.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then I beg my colleague to have taken more pains to state the portion of his argument, he went even further than that, and, in order to make the case stronger, stated—I probably misapprehended him—that even the decision of the county canvassers was sufficient, and would have been even if the State canvassers had been given a declaration of duty.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I did not intend to be so understood.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Then, of course, my remarks are not appropriate on that point.

Now, sir, let us look for an instant at the action of the State canvassers. The returns came before them. They were called upon to perform their duty, and determine who were elected, according to this statute, as "Representatives in Congress." They found a large proportion of the returns from the counties of the State of New York declare the number of votes given for "Representative in Congress;" but they found that the votes from certain counties in the country, Tioga, Herkimer, and Cortland, I believe, and from all of the districts in the city of New York, were returns as having been given for "member of Congress." What, then, should they do? Were they called upon to say, the words "member of Congress" mean the same as "Representative in Congress"? Suppose the votes had been returned for "deputy in Congress," or "delegate to Congress," would the State canvassers have then declared the State canvassers to have declared that that meant the same as "Representative in Congress," though it would certainly have been more proper than the use of the general, generic term of "member of Congress," as synonymous with "Representative in the lower House of Congress?"

When once these canvassers, these counters of the votes, began to wander from the words of the statute and the Federal Constitution into the wide field of construction, where should they stop? They should have stopped there. But they did not; we are to make a return of "Representatives in Congress;" we cannot make such a return; we find no such votes; why shall we do? We will return the facts; we will not make this determination, which we cannot make according to the statute. It is as clear as the fact does not exist, with minute particularity, to the House of Representatives, who have the right, who have the jurisdiction, who have the constitutional power, to determine the question, and who, doubtless, will exercise it. It is as clear as the fact does not exist, as thought, as we thought, that these votes could be a question as to the propriety of the House of Representatives admitting these gentlemen upon the floor.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1860.

NEW SERIES.....No. 81.

There is no question that the State canvassers, all sensible men—one, the Attorney General, an eminent lawyer—must have taken that view of it; but they also took the view that they had no jurisdiction in the matter. Now, because the case was perfectly plain, had they a right, therefore, to assume jurisdiction, whereby the statute could give them; or because the case was so plain to this House that we decided upon it, even without a question, in favor to the members from the city of New York, are we thereby ousted of our jurisdiction by the very plainness of the case itself? Because a case goes by default, are we, therefore, deprived of the right to determine and adjudge the case in this House? I think not, according to any principle of law or parliamentary practice.

Now, the board of State canvassers not only do not determine, but they explicitly exclude the conclusion, from this statement which they send to this House, that they mean it to be a determination within the purview of the law. They are careful to use those words of exclusion, by saying that they do not undertake to determine, but place the facts before the House, in order that they may determine. Well, then, how do we stand? This House meets. That statement is sent to the Clerk. The Clerk undertakes—I will not say now whether with propriety or not—to enter the names of these members on the roll of the House, and to call their names upon the first call to order; and they are permitted, no one contradicting, to vote during the whole of the contest for the Speakership, and when that contest is at last happily closed, and the Speaker proceeds to administer the oath, no question is raised to this matter, and all the members from the city of New York appear at the desk and take the oath.

Sir, it has been attempted to be argued from this, that there was an acquiescence. How an acquiescence? By whom was this acquiescence? Certainly not by the members, inasmuch as they acquiesce, or express any want of acquiescence on that occasion? What right had the contestant to control the action of the Clerk? How could he have controlled it, if he had attempted to do so? Could he, the contestant, have approached the Speaker, and said to him, "Sir, I object to that gentleman taking the oath?" Suppose he had objected; to what end, to what effect would it have been? The question was not whether the sitting member had, upon the facts shown by this certificate, a right to take the oath and his seat. No one was intended to raise a question on that point. No one denied that there was sufficient in this certificate—I do not call it a "determination," but in this statement of facts—to authorize these persons to take their seats, if there was no objection to the validity of the election, arising from extraneous circumstances.

But what would have been the effect then produced? Why, sir, it would simply have been to have called the attention of the House to the statement, and if the House would then have entered into an argument in which my honored friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER], who has signed the minority report in this case, would have presented precisely the very same eulent argument which he did yesterday, for the admission of the sitting member, and the fullness of the House, and there would have been cited, with very great propriety, this quotation which has been made from Cushing's Law and Practice of Parliamentary Assemblies, which has been so much relied upon in this discussion, and which would then have had a preponderance which I have not seen in this argument. Then, when the question arose—if it ever did arise—whether the sitting member in this case, as well as the other members from the city of New York, should have the right to seats in this House, and to participate in its proceedings, then, as a conclusion upon the subject, we are instructed from Cushing's Law and Practice of Parliamentary Assemblies would have been read, that—

"It is the settled law of all parliamentary bodies, (see Cushing's Law and Practice, §. 174,) that whenever returning officers undertake to relieve themselves of responsibility by making a conditional return—that is, by stating facts, and referring the question of their legal operations to the judgment of the body—the return will be received, as an unconditional one."

This House would have received the return as an unconditional one; and upon this statement the member from the third district and his colleagues from the city of New York, there being no extraneous charges of fraud, would have been admitted to the floor of the House. And permit me to say that it seems to me it would have been a little more fair, if, when this authority was offered, it had been quoted, with the comma after the word "one," as it is found in the original, and giving the remainder of the sentence instead of inserting a period there. It would not then have had the same significance in its application to this case, which seems now to be claimed for it.

The entire sentence, as given by Cushing, is this:

"As it is the duty of returning officers, in the first instance, to decide upon the result of an election, and if, in their judgment, an election has taken place, to make a return of the result, they are authorized, where the result is not clear, to refer the question to the judgment of the body to which they are returning the result, by making a conditional return—that is, by stating certain facts, and referring the question of their legal operations to the judgment of the body to which the return is made—the return will be received, as an unconditional one; and the full effect, if any, of the special statement of facts, will be to give rise to an investigation of the merits of the election."

Now, sir, does it make any difference that no protest was made against the sitting member taking his oath, when every lawyer who has examined the question knows, when every parliamentarian knows, that the House, if the protest had been made, would unanimously have authorized him to take the oath? Take the strongest case possible, and suppose the case could be put in this constant had appeared at the bar of the House, and when the sitting member came forward to place his hand upon the holy Evangelist, had said: "Mr. Speaker, I protest;" and suppose that then the question had arisen, and the House, by a vote of a majority, had decided that the claimant had the right to take his oath; I say, suppose the House had so decided upon solemn argument—and that is the strongest manner in which the case can be presented to the House, and the sitting member to appear at the bar of the House, and say: "Now, for the first time, this member has been declared a Representative in Congress; now, for the first time, has this determination taken place; now, for the first time, am I in a position to ask for permission to take testimony?"

The question, Mr. Speaker, divides itself into two forms. First, under the circumstances of the case, could this contestant have given the notice required by the Federal statute of 1851, so as to have enabled him to take his testimony? Could he have appeared before a judge, and asked that judge have taken jurisdiction? Could witnesses have been subpoenaed and compelled to come? Could they have been visited with the pains and penalties of perjuries, if they had committed the crime of testifying falsely? I think not. And if the notice had been given, could the member claiming to be returned have been compelled to file his answer and proceed to proof? I think not, unless there had been some determination of the election as required by the statute. But it is not necessary to place this case on this extreme ground. It may be rested on other positions. I have not heard it declared, though I believe my colleague who has just taken his seat [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] did seem to imply such a conclusion—I say I have not yet heard it declared by any lawyer in this body, since the passage of 1851, that the House, and lately, upon this House, that it abrogates the constitutional provision that every House of Representatives has the right to judge of the election, and to determine upon the returns and qualifications, of its own members. I believe that will not be done. My honorable colleague [Mr. COCHRANE] is far too good a lawyer to lay down that proposition. It is a statute, undoubtedly, of very great propriety; it is a statute to which the House will ordinarily adhere; but it is not absolutely binding upon this House as a rule of action. They can depart from it whenever and under what circumstances they please. If so, then if we cannot settle in our own minds positively the question, whether this contestant could properly have given his notice and taken his testimony, it is for us next to inquire whether there are such circumstances in this case as will properly excuse him in the omission, and whether we should permit him to take testimony under a proper commission. Are there circumstances enough here, even if he could have acted earlier, to authorize us to excuse him for not having done so, in no doubtful a case as this; or is he to be shut out from the opportunity of going into the contest?

But it has been said that there are laches upon the part of this party. Now, sir, one of the main reasons of my rising to address the House, was, that I might state to the House upon this subject that it is within my personal knowledge that this contesting member was here, I think, on the second day of the session—certainly within the first week of the session—under the expectation that a Speaker would be elected, and desiring to bring this matter to the attention of the House at the earliest practicable moment. And still further, I will state that he was desirous that a protest should be made at the bar of the House against the sitting member taking his oath. But he was dissuaded from that, and dissuaded, as I thought, wisely. I think now, upon the contest ground that such a protest was idle, inasmuch as it was a protest against an act which, upon inquiry, the House itself would have to decide unanimously in favor of the sitting member, and upon the face of this informal statement of facts, I did not deem it wise, then, and when, for this very reason, the whole case is uncontrolled and unaffected by the act of 1851.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen upon this floor have argued the question as if the taking of a seat upon this floor was an admission of his right, when the whole question is outside of that; when, in fact, the question is whether the House will determine it, then, and when, for this very reason, the whole case is uncontrolled and unaffected by the act of 1851.

Mr. Speaker, something has been said of the injustice of this case. Let me say a word on that subject, and I will sit down. My honorable colleague and friend, who has just taken his seat, dwelt with his accustomed force and pathos upon the injustice and inconvenience of the case made by the contestant in its bearing upon the sitting member. Sir, as we are not all inclined to defend ourselves against charges which may have been made against us, and to be subjected to some inconvenience to vindicate our reputations and our character? What inconvenience is this sitting member now put to, upon the granting of this commission? Why, sir, the certificate was issued upon the 28th day of December, 1858. The gentleman now claiming his place here as a member was then a member of the last Congress. If the thirty days' notice had been given then, he would have been obliged to leave it, to contest this question among his constituents in the city of New York. Is it a greater hardship for him to have his seat now than it would have been then? Will the public business suffer more now than it would then for the want of the wisdom and talents of the sitting member? No, sir. If the question of injustice and inconvenience were a proper one to be mooted here, it cannot have the power and force which my honorable colleague has given it. The hardship, if anywhere, is upon the contestant.

Why? For want of a proper opportunity for these questions were fresh, when the evidence was easy of procurement, he is now obliged at this late day, taking the affirmative of the issue, having staked his reputation here upon sustaining charges which, if he fails, will recoil upon him with terrible force; he is now obliged at this late day, with this affirmative issue, with the burden of proof upon him, to take his testimony in the city of New York. Sir, the hardship, if any, and the inconvenience, if any, rest upon the gentleman who is contesting this seat, and not the sitting member.

default, and that he shall give a notice of ten days, and that in twenty days he shall reply to it; and that then both parties shall have sixty days to take testimony. How is he to take testimony? Under the act of 1851. What I desire some gentleman upon that committee to inform this House—this—and I hope I may have for a moment the attention of the committee, while I call their notice to this inquiry—that if the contestants within the act of 1851, so that he may now take testimony under it and according to its provisions, then is not hopelessly beyond the relief of this House by his omission to give the notice required by that law? Then, if you assume that the contestant is not within the operation of the act of 1851, and upon that assumption excuse him and say that he may now come in and contest, how do you benefit him by allowing him to take testimony under a law which you say does not apply to his case? I want some member of the committee to answer that question to the House. Either he is or is not within the act of 1851. The committee's own recommendation is vital to his case; because, if he is within the act of 1851, then everybody agrees that he is not entitled to be heard; for he took no steps to take testimony, or even to give notice. If he is not within the act of 1851, as you maintain in order to entitle him to the relief he now seeks, then how can you, by any resolution of the House, apply a law to his case, to which case that he is not entitled to be heard, is not applicable? Sir, I think the committee have, by their action, involved themselves in a dilemma from which there is no possible mode of extrication; at least, none occurs to my observation.

I wish to invite the attention of the House to another aspect of this case. It is claimed on the part of the contestant, it was argued very earnestly by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] and by my two colleagues from New York, [Messrs. MARSTON and COOPER,] and also by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who made the report, that Mr. Williamson, the contestant, is entitled to the relief which he seeks. I hold in my hand, sir, an argument in reply to the position taken by those gentlemen in this debate, which I think you would well regard as satisfactory, and which I am sure these gentlemen will admit to be conclusive; at least I am sure they will agree with me, that I am now citing a most respectable authority. I answer to the argument of those gentlemen—that this application came more than six months before the election was held, more than eleven months after the time for taking testimony under the law had expired, and after one half of the time of the service of the Congress had elapsed, the party never having previously examined any witnesses or taken any testimony in his own behalf, or having given any notice of his intention, or wish to do so.

Those, I think, are very conclusive reasons why this application should not be granted.

Mr. JOHN COCHRAN, of Illinois, my colleagues permit me to ask from what document he is reading?

Mr. SICKLES. I am not surprised that my colleague wishes to know from what document I am reading. I will inform him that I am reading from a report of the Committee of Elections made up by Messrs. CAMPBELL, DAWES, MARSTON, STRATTON, and McKNIGHT, the same gentlemen who made the report in my case; and the only difference is that this is a report made upon an application by Mr. Cooper, of Michigan, whose case is contested by Mr. Howard, for inter, and not made by Mr. Williamson. That is the only difference between the two cases. This is a report made by those gentlemen three days after they make a report upon Mr. Williamson's application for leave to not attend everything, and to be let in to do anything; after racking their brains for reasons to let him in, this chance is commended to their own lips, for they are under the necessity of answering their own argument, in order to defeat the application of Mr. Williamson, a member from Michigan for leave to take further testimony.

What else do they say? Because I put it to the House with great candor, and with entire confidence, that I rely upon the argument presented by the majority of the Committee of Elections, in the case of Cooper and Howard, to meet, conclusively and triumphantly, every reason they have given why my case should not be closed. I presume the committee will agree with me, that I am quoting the most respectable authority. What do they say? On page 2 they say:

"If either party in a case of contested election should neglect to give notice of his intention to be heard, he should give notice to the opposite party, and proceed in taking testimony, and preserve the same, and ask that it be received upon good reasons being shown, it doubtless would be allowed."

Now, sir, why did not Mr. Williamson proceed in the recess, and after the time expired, as the committee here say he might, to take his testimony, first giving me notice, and then coming here with his evidence and having shown due diligence, his application being to receive testimony properly taken, though not strictly according to the letter of the law, it would have been received? He does not say this; and therefore, adopting the language and the conclusions of the majority of the committee, he is hopelessly at fault.

Again, I allege that there has been laches in this case upon the part of the contestant; that he has postponed the time of taking testimony beyond a reasonable period, when the witnesses are not to be had. I maintain that here is such a flagrant default as should fairly exclude him from further hearing. What do the majority of the committee say upon that point? They say:

"To grant such postponement and protracted appointment would be to deprive the witnesses of the opportunity to have had equal and sufficient opportunity to present their full case, is practically to nullify the law."

And further:

"If such application rests upon no stronger reason than the laches of the party seeking the same, it should be promptly rejected."

Now if they had only applied that law, so well stated, to the case of Williamson, this House would not have been troubled with this discussion. They go on further and say:

"To do otherwise, is to disregard the rights of parties and constituents, to trifle with the privileges of the House, and to make the labors of your committee interminable and useless."

True, sir—and; only I ask leave of the committee to apply their good law to my case, and to give me the benefit of it.

Again, they speak:

"It is due to every interest concerned, that the rights in dispute should be settled, and parties held to a reasonable diligence."

A second Daniel come to judgment. Diligence! diligence! Why, sir, you would have supposed there was no such word in the vocabulary of those gentlemen when they were listening to the application of a man who had kept secret his purpose of contesting a seat for sixteen months, giving no notice, and taking no steps. Diligence, forthwith! Here then come more:

"It is due to every interest concerned, that the rights in dispute should be settled, and parties held to a reasonable diligence under the laws of the land, in the prosecution of their respective claims."

Mr. Williamson was diligent, I suppose, in coming here seven months after the election, though he had not previously taken a step towards contesting the seat.

I will refer to the facts in this Michigan case, simply for the purpose of showing the application of their laws to this controversy. It seems that that case all the witnesses were examined on the last six days of the sixty allowed by law—that is to say, the contestant, Mr. Howard, allowed fifty-four days of the time to elapse and never examined a witness. He reserved his batteries to the last six days, and then consumed the whole time in getting the witnesses examined. He reserved his best and strongest witnesses to the very last day; and Mr. Cooper's application was for leave to rebut the testimony of witnesses examined upon the last day of the sixty. And yet the committee may have regarded the committee accuse Mr. Cooper of want of diligence in not producing his witnesses for examination; and they commend the diligence of Williamson, who slept for sixteen months, and never summoned or named a witness. I hope that, however indifferent the committee may have regarded the multitude of precedents cited to them illustrating the views of former Houses of Representatives, they will not question the application of the law from their own lips. Why, sir, such inconsistency might, with propriety, excite surprise and amazement. True, sir, a committee always has, in the examination of those cases, certain latitude and certain discretionation. But, sir, I must say that this discretion becomes expansive with the exigencies of Mr. Williamson, and contracts according to the convenience of Mr. Howard. It is like the famous test of Prince Archem, which could be spread out when necessary, so that the great majority could repose beneath its shade; but which could be folded up, when there was no longer a necessity for its use, and become a toy fit for the hand of the most delicate lady.

Lord Campbell, in his Lives of the Chief Justices, relates an incident in the career of Lord Mansfield, which is full of instruction to the majority of this committee. An English peer had been appointed a colonial Governor; at that period these Governors were chancellors and judges in the colonies; and the "bure" in question not having much experience of law, went to Mansfield and asked him to give him a few hints before he set out upon his mission, which would enable him to get along upon the bench. Mansfield very kindly complied, and among other advice, told him always to hear all that both sides had to say; to listen patiently, and to take time to deliberate, and then to decide in justice required; but never, never, by any chance, to write an opinion, or to give a reason for his decision.

I commend the advice of Mansfield to the majority of this Committee of Elections. Whatever hereafter you may have to decide, decide it; hear patiently whatever argument may be adduced before you; take time for deliberation, and render your decision; but after the two decisions which you have thus far communicated to the House—the only ones which I have seen—the advice of Lord Mansfield to the tyro, never write any more reasons for your judgment!

Here the hammer fell!

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from New York will be allowed to proceed with his remarks. I make that motion.

Mr. GROW. I must object to the violation of this hour rule.

Mr. DAWES. How long does the gentleman require to conclude?

Mr. SICKLES. I will take about twenty minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should state that the other side, in concluding, can have more time than the hour, if they desire it. Certainly, in such a case as this, the gentleman ought not to be stunted in time.

Mr. SICKLES. I will not abuse the indulgence of the House. I am indebted very much to its courtesy.

Mr. DAWES. Do I understand the gentleman to be limited as to time?

Mr. SICKLES. I think I can conclude in fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. GROW. I shall object, unless the time be fixed.

Mr. SICKLES. Well, say twenty minutes.

Mr. GROW. This case has taken two days already, while it ought not to have taken as many hours.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the gentleman being allowed twenty minutes longer?

Mr. SICKLES. I prefer thirty minutes.

Mr. GROW. I do not object to the gentleman having thirty minutes.

There being no objection, thirty minutes were allowed.

Mr. SICKLES. Now, sir, I invite the attention of the House to another feature in the resolution reported by a majority of the committee. They say, in the resolution, that the sitting member should be allowed twenty days to take issue upon the case as presented to him by the notice of the contestant. I invite the attention of the House to this feature of the resolution. The law of 1851, and all the precedents of the House, give thirty days to the sitting member to answer the case presented by the contestant. The papers show—the contestant shows—that he has been preparing his case for sixteen months. It appears he employed counsel immediately after the election. So the Committee of Elections say in its report on page 2. And, sir, the Committee of Elections came to this extraordinary conclusion, and embodied it in their resolution, to give to the contestant sixteen months to prepare his case, to make his allegations, and then they cut short the sitting member ten days of the time allowed by the law itself to meet the case of the contestant. By law, the contestant is obliged to specify the grounds of contest within thirty days after the declaration of the result of the election; and thirty days then is sufficient time for the sitting member to respond.

But here is a case, sui generis, without a precedent. The contestant avers that he commenced to make preparations right after the election. The committee, in their report, say no one employed counsel, and he set to work to make inquiry. He collected his witnesses; and the committee indorse the proposition that he is entitled to all this time to make out his case, although he lulled me and all others into confidence and repose as to my conduct by allowing me to believe that no contest was to be made. And yet, having allowed him sixteen months extra time to prepare his case, they cut me short of ten days of the ordinary time allowed by law to every person to meet such a case. Is that justice? Why can you not mete out to me some share of that same liberality which induces you to give him sixteen months to get ready for the contest? What constrained the committee to diminish my time to meet the issues thus presented with an alacrity only equalled by their readiness to extend the time of the contest? Sir, I will be for the gentleman who is to follow, to explain these extraordinary inconsistencies. I will not allow myself even to suggest, by way of conjecture, a reason, lest I might do some injustice to some one or more members of the committee. But, sir, that explanation is needed; that the inconsistency is extraordinary and inexplicable on its face, I think is apparent.

Now, sir, as much of my argument I have addressed to the proposition that the contestant is not entitled to any relief at the hands of this House. I deny that there is any one here that he has proceeded in good faith, or that he has proceeded with due diligence, or that his case comes within the ordinary usage of the House.

I say further, that the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, upon their own authority, must be considered in several respects to be of the slightest value. According to the case cited on the other side, the contestant should be required to set forth the names of the voters whose votes he impeaches, and the resolution should be recommended to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to make the required inquiry. A case of probable cause can be presented for the consideration of this House; and this position, I repeat, is sustained by two authorities cited by the committee themselves—that is to say, in the brief of the contestant, which they append to their report.

Second, sir, the resolution does not require the contestant to give any notice of the taking of depositions. It is left to inference as to whether he is required to do that or not.

Third. It is indispensable in the taking of testimony in a case like this, to enlarge the class of judicial officers before whom depositions may be taken; for while the law of 1851 allows these depositions to be taken before quite a numerous class of judicial officers, the resolution before you concentrates power to take depositions in the hands of the least likely to have the leisure for extra-official duties, which is a novel and extraordinary proceeding.

Fourth. Under the circumstances of this case, the time—any days—allowed for taking testimony should be equally divided between the contestant and the sitting member; otherwise, looking to the long delay that has occurred and to the circumstances of the case already stated, there is no guarantee whatever that even at the expiration of the time now allowed the case could be in any better situation to be tried than it now is.

These four amendments I insist are indispensable; and further, unless the committee are prepared to show that this case does fall within the act of 1851, then I say the resolution must be rejected, leaving the proposition an impracticable thing. It proposes to allow a man to stand under a law to take testimony in his case, when you declare that that law could never be applied to his case. The committee ask the House, by their position, to apply a law of Congress to cases, ex post facto, which the law, they themselves argue, was never applicable.

Sir, let me ask gentlemen upon the opposite side, if it is possible now, after the passage of this resolution, for the contestant to proceed, under the act of 1851, and take testimony, why could he not have proceeded under the act of 1851 and taken the same testimony before? Can the action of this House possibly make that law any more applicable now than it was originally? Not at all, sir. If the law of 1851 applies sufficiently to the case to enable the contestant to go on from this time forth and take testimony under it, then it applied equally as fully to the case before the sitting member a year ago, at the time when he should have done it, and take this testimony. It will be necessary for the committee to meet these dilemmas in which their own action has involved them, before it is possible for them, with any propriety, to give a vote of the House upon their own proposition.

In every view, therefore, I maintain that the contestant is beyond any hope of relief, any just or proper claim for relief, from this body. He could to deprive himself of the advantages of the act of 1851 by his own silence, because it was a matter of pure volition with him whether he would give notice of contest or not. There is a reason, I know, suggested why testimony was not taken; but none whatever which proves that the party could not, if he had seen fit to do so, have given the testimony. I do not rather to be told that, when he sought the advice of counsel upon this point, it was to ascertain if he could avoid giving the notice; not whether he could give it? Did he need a lawyer to tell him that he could address me as lawyer, friend, neighbor? Sir, I believe you are not fair elected; I believe that you are not disinterested voters; and I intend to contest your seat! Would any gentleman need a lawyer to tell him that he might do to an opponent between whom and himself the most kindly relations had always existed? Would he need a lawyer to advise him to do that? No, sir, his own manhood and sense of fair-play and candor would have told him at once that it was right and just.

What did he need a lawyer for? Was it not rather to advise him whether or not he could keep his case open to make his case, to stand up, at least ten months after the election, to give him time to perfect his case, and to allow his opponent to slumber upon his rights, which he supposed to be undisputed, until all recollection of the circumstances connected with the election had in a great measure been obliterated, and the chances of success may have gone away; and then, in an unguarded moment, to unmask his battery and pour out his deadly, destructive fire upon an unprepared opponent. I leave it to the good sense of the House to whether that was not the purpose for which he wanted the services of a contentious attorney. I maintain that there are very few lawyers in the city of New York—in my opinion there are none—who would give the advice alleged to have been given in this case. A prudent lawyer, a safe lawyer would have said, "Give your notice; it can do you no harm, and may protect you; it will make your application to take testimony, and take it if you can; no harm can result from it; if you will ever have a case you have got it now; if you find the courts unwilling to take testimony, the report of the committee in stating the law for specific provisions in your case; but be sure to bring yourself within the provisions of the law; be sure to give your notice." No lawyer, I venture to say, would have given any other advice than that. And I say more. I deny that any lawyer ever did advise the contestant that he ought not or could not proceed in the manner stated in the act of 1851.

I deny that any lawyer has said that he has given any such advice. Mr. Williamson himself has not alleged that he received any such advice; the committee in their statement of the case alleges no such thing, and the affidavit of the lawyer states no such thing. There has been an entire misapprehension upon that point by all who have supposed otherwise. I refer gentlemen to the memorial of Mr. Williamson, and I deny them that point. I say nothing that alleges that I was so advised. No such thing can you find; but mark what his cozened attorney does say, for he is the only witness produced by the contestant; and when a lawyer turns witness you are bound to suppose that he does so with full knowledge of the force of language and the meaning of terms. What does he say? I have no hesitation in criticizing with some degree of closeness the attorney in this case, for whenever an attorney brings himself into court as the sole and only witness for his client's case, he places himself there as a target. What does he say?

"That in consequence of the omission of the board of State canvassers to determine and decide, if, any one, was elected to such office in the said district at the said election, the said board was required to give the said testimony and proceed to take the testimony in the manner prescribed by the act of 1851, and that he therefore had no way to compel the attendance of any witnesses, and that, consequently, unless it could be obtained from them voluntarily."

He swears simply to an allegation of fact, not that he advised Williamson that he ought not; but the attorney says that Williamson was unable to give notice, and that was the grounds of contest. Williamson does not allege that he ever received any such advice; the attorney does not allege that he ever gave any such advice; and yet the excuse is invented for him that he was so advised and so misled.

Mr. DAWES. I move the previous question, Mr. BRANCH. I will suggest to the gentleman that the House looks thin now; but if the previous question is seconded, it will not be in order to move that there be a call of the House. I prefer, therefore, that the gentleman should await himself until the House is called, and then call him under the rules of occupying an hour in closing the debate.

Mr. DAWES. I shall not occupy an hour. Mr. BRANCH. Then I will suggest that the previous question be now ordered; and that, by common consent, the gentleman should call him under the rules of occupying an hour in closing the debate.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to that. No objection being made.

The SPEAKER announced that he would consider that as the understanding upon the part of the House.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. DAWES. I will not avail myself of the privilege granted me under the rules of occupying a question which all others are cut off from debating by the previous question, beyond what is absolutely necessary, and strictly in reply to that which has been offered, and to which there has been no opportunity for reply.

It will be remembered that in the main argument of the sitting member against the report of the majority of the committee, allude to his complaint as to the phraseology of the resolution which the committee have reported, and especially to the fact that he here complains that, while the law of 1851 gives to the contestant thirty days to file his notice of contest, and to the sitting member thirty days more to file his answer thereafter, we have deprived him in this respect of ten of the thirty days to which he would have been entitled under the law. I have only to say that, because the committee yielded thus far to his argument as to the length of time to which this resolution extended this case, yielded so far to his own argument as to cut down the contestant twenty days and himself ten days in merely filing the preliminary papers, and in making his answer, that I now expected to hear him then come into the House and make that yielding of ours to his argument a cause of complaint against the resolution.

One other objection to the resolution is raised by the sitting member, and that is this: while the committee have their report upon the fact, as they say, that this case is outside of the law of 1851, they yet require this testimony to be taken under, and by authority of, the law of 1851. I commend the sitting member to a more careful reading of the resolution itself, in which he will find no such reason. It is the law of 1851 that he complains of, which this testimony shall be taken, independent of the statute of 1851. It says that it shall be taken before a judge of the supreme court of the State of New York; but in all things else in the manner provided in the statute of 1851. I will not say that this is a quibble, because my friends of the other side have appropriated that word entirely to themselves. I only say, if the sitting member fails to understand, when it is proposed to take testimony in the manner written down in a particular place in a statute, that it does not mean to take testimony under, and by virtue of, the authority made in any such statute; if he fails to understand this of himself, I, of course, shall fail to make him understand it.

various districts did not cast ballots or votes illegally for him.

"That a large number of persons, not residents of said congressional district, but who resided within the same, and persons who temporarily resided in the same, and who were absent at various docks, and who were not legal voters in the said district, were employed and paid by the ticklers or his agents to cast ballots or votes on many occasions for the said Sickles in said district."

I call the attention of the House to these facts, which the contestant says he is prepared to prove. And further than that, the petitioner attaches to his petition an affidavit, marked "A," in which Mr. McIntire says that he has it from the lips of men who refuse to give affidavits voluntarily, that the sitting member paid them money to vote for him, and to procure others to vote for him, who were not entitled to vote. Mr. Sickles says there is no allegation of fraud. He is pleased to meet this affidavit in this wise:

"The affidavit of one McIntire, appended to the petition, ought to be disregarded."

"He says he was employed as attorney, but he does not describe himself as an attorney-at-law; nor does he state his residence or place of business."

"He does not state that, as counsel, he advised Williamson to any course of proceeding whatever."

This is the way that he meets the allegation of the petitioner, supported by the affidavit of a person who says that he has heard persons state that they were paid by the sitting member for voting illegally and obtaining illegal votes, and that he is ready to substantiate the statement with proof.

But the sitting member cites in his brief an authority which he deemed conclusive in this matter. He has set it out in full in his brief, and the majority of the committee have reiterated the same authority, cited in the same terms in the minority report, by taking the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] referred, and read it as conclusive on us. Now, I ask the members of the House to turn to this authority as quoted in the brief of the sitting member, found on page 15 of the report, and which is copied verbatim into the minority report, and to look over it while I read the paragraph from the book from which it is taken. Mr. Cushing says:

"As it is the duty of returning officers, in the first instance, to decide upon the merits of the case, and in their judgment, an election has taken place, to make a return of the person elected, by whom they undertake to receive the votes from the electors, and to make a return of the return, that is, by stating certain facts, and relieving the question of their legal operation to the judgment of the body to which the returns are made, it will be necessary, as an unconditional one; and the only effect, if any, of the special statement of facts will be to give rise to an investigation of the merits of the election."

These last words were not included in the citation, as made by the sitting member in his brief; the majority of the committee fall into the same error in quoting the same citation, and so did the gentleman from New York this morning. Now, take this authority, and follow it. It provides that this special statement of facts shall have the effect of giving the House notice, and putting them upon their inquiry into the merits of the election. That, sir, is what the majority of the committee propose to do by this resolution—to inquire into the merits of an election. Now, sir, do not attempt to anybody any question of this question, I am exceedingly regret, however, that they stopped at the semicolon, and omitted to cite what followed the semicolon, and that the House might have the whole benefit of the citation, and of the authority of Mr. Cushing.

But, Mr. Speaker, I know the House is weary of this case. I simply want them to understand that the proposition of the majority of the committee is to provide, by the method prescribed in the resolution, for taking testimony before a judge of the supreme court of the State of New York, whether it be true, as this petitioner says, that the sitting member holds his seat by his own fraud. I want it to be understood that the sitting member himself is opposed to this proposition, because so long a time has elapsed. He says that, after such a lapse of time, it is impossible to do justice and equity to permit this inquiry to be made; that is to say, that the longer he can enjoy the fruits of his fraud, if fraud there be, the more unjust and inequitable it will be for us to disturb him by an investigation; the time can sanctify and sanction a fraudulent taking possession of a seat in this body, as a Representative of a constituency entitled to be represented here according to their own wish and voice. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the question is one of more than ordinary importance. Has it come to this, that fraud, corruption, and bribery can be allowed to be charged against a member of this House as the means by which he obtained his seat as a member of the House, and yet it does not excite the indignation, nor even the concern of members, so that they do not even care to inquire into the truth of the allegation? And have we become so indifferent as to feel that it is the waste of time to go on and insist upon prompt and vigilant and all-searching investigation that shall ride over all form and all quibble and all pretense, that are not absolutely necessary for the protection of the rights of those who are thus accused, and reach the core of such a fraud?

It is the practice of the British Parliament, when such allegations are made in good faith against any member of Parliament, to suspend his functions as a member until they shall be investigated. Under the law of 1851 number of contest must be served within thirty days. Now, man who is enjoying the fruit of his own fraud may be able to conceal the evidence thereof until after the thirty days; and suppose after that time that evidence shall come to light: shall all parties be shut out from investigation of the question of the means by which the success of the man guilty of the fraud in keeping it from the knowledge of anybody for thirty days? According to the rule applied here by the sitting member, and according to the rule adopted in this case by the majority of the committee, you can cover up your fraud until the night of the frauds by which he holds his seat for only thirty days, he is forever afterwards safe in his seat. I do not believe that the House will apply any such rule upon any such charges.

"I have no feeling in this case myself; I desire that the report of the committee in this case should be adopted, unless the House believe that it is due to themselves and due to the country that it shall be known that they do care whether or not it is true that any member of this House holds his seat by vote of his own fraud. If the House do care to have the country understand that they regard the purity of the ballot-box enough to investigate the question whether it be tainted or not, then let the House, and not the committee, take care of its own reputation."

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I will meet with the concurrence of the House. The previous question has been sustained and the main question ordered, and I do not, of course, now propose to make any remarks. I move that the whole subject be laid upon the table, and now I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether it is his desire to take a vote on this question this evening? It is now four o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. It has been my desire, for the last week, to have this case disposed of at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BRANCH. The gentleman from Massachusetts will understand that we are obliged to have a call of the House before we can go to a vote. It is now four o'clock, and, as there will be a call of the House, I will be kept here for a very late hour of the evening. I would like to say that he allow the case to go over until to-morrow morning. The previous question has been sustained, and the main question ordered, and it will come up as the first business in order in the morning. If it meets with the concurrence of the gentlemen on the other side, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn. I gave notice yesterday, as I have given notice every day for the last week, that I would call this case on at a particular time. Yesterday I gave notice that I would call the previous question on it at two o'clock to-day. I have done so that everybody might be present if they saw fit. I trust that everybody is present, and prepared to vote. I do not know, however, whether I do not know whether or not they are on the one side or the other of this question is absent; but I do feel that it is the duty of every member of the House to attend upon its sessions, and to give his vote upon questions properly before it when they come up. I cannot consent to an adjournment.

Mr. BRANCH. The gentleman, then, objects to this matter going over till to-morrow?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANCH. Then I withdraw my motion that the House adjourn, and move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. BOCK. The motion to lay upon the table is a preliminary motion, and not a final one. Let us take the vote upon that, and if it is not carried, then some arrangement may be made.

Mr. BRANCH. My object is to adopt such a course as will meet with the concurrence of the House. If it is the wish of the House to go on and dispose of this question, then I am ready for it, and am willing to remain here. The question will come up regularly in order in the morning if we now adjourn, when the House is fresh, and all the members are in their places; and it does seem to me that we had better adjourn this evening, and postpone the whole subject until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This case was set down for yesterday; and it has run over into this day. The case of Cooper and Howard was fixed for to-day. If the House goes through with the pending case, it is in my intention to call up the case of Cooper and Howard. I trust that this pending case will be disposed of. Gentlemen are here on all sides, and ready to dispose of it.

Mr. BRANCH. It is true that this case was fixed for to-day. To-day, as that notice was given that the previous question would then be called; but the fact that the previous question was not called at two o'clock, at the time designated, may be the reason for the thinness of the House. I will not, however, consume the time of the House by calling up this case, and I will leave the House. I have already withdrawn the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STANTON. Will not the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table answer the purpose of a call of the House?

Mr. BRANCH. I make the motion that the whole subject be laid upon the table as a test question, and, of course, it will first be necessary to have a call of the House.

Mr. STANTON. If the motion to lay upon the table fails, that is not conclusive.

Mr. BRANCH. We do not wish it to fail; we mean to carry it and dispose of this matter, and make an end of this controversy, which, I believe, will meet with the sense of a majority of this House.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House adjourn. The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion that there be a call of the House; and it was agreed to. The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the following gentlemen were present: Mr. DAWES.

Members: Charles F. Adams, Adams, Aitken, Brown, Burlingame, Burrage, Case, House, Flint, Clarendon, Clark, C. Cochran, Corwin, Davidson, H. Winter Davis, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Jay, Hall, J. McIntire Davis, Holman, Howard, Irvine, Jackson, Keith, Knicker, Larnabee, Leske, Longacre, Gilbert B. Martin, McQueen, Latham, Morris, Morris, Pennington, Reynolds, Rogers, Russell, Spaulding, Stillworth, Stevens, Thacker, Thomas, Vance, Van Wyck, Wade, Webster, and Wilson.

Pending the above call,

Mr. BUFFINGTON stated that his colleague, Mr. ADAMS, was paired with Mr. McQUEEN; that his colleague, Mr. BURLINGAME, was paired with Mr. LARABEE; and that his colleague, Mr. AITKEN, was paired with Mr. VANCE for the day.

Mr. KEITT said: Mr. Speaker, I have paired off for to-day with Mr. WEBSTER. He is in favor of the extension of time, and I am against it. I suppose that the motion to lay upon the table involves the same issue, and I have therefore made this statement.

Mr. LANDRUM stated that he was paired for this week with Mr. LONGNECKER on all political questions.

Mr. HUTCHINS stated that his colleague, Mr. WADE, was paired with Mr. LEAKE for the day.

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that his colleague, Mr. STEVENS, was paired with Mr. CLEGG; that his colleague, Mr. DAVIS, was paired with Mr. WILSON; and that his colleague, Mr. HALL, was paired with Mr. MALLORY.

Mr. COOPER stated that he was paired with Mr. WOOD.

Mr. WINSLOW stated that Mr. DAVIDSON was paired with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. MONTGOMERY stated that Mr. RIGGS was paired off with Mr. BABBITT.

Mr. KILGORE stated that Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, was paired with his colleague, Mr. CATE.

Mr. SPINNER stated that his colleague, Mr. ELY, was paired with Mr. KKKEL for the day. Mr. STANTON said: An hour or two ago, I paired with Mr. JACKSON. I am informed that Mr. HICKMAN has paired with Mr. McCLELLAND. Mr. McCLELLAND and myself are present, and desire to vote. By consent, therefore, we have paired Mr. JACKSON with Mr. HICKMAN.

Mr. HOWARD stated that he was paired with Mr. BERARDUCCI.

Mr. ASHMORE stated that Mr. STALLWORTH was paired with Mr. IRIKKE.

Mr. BRANCH. I ask the Clerk to read over the names of those who are absent and not paired.

The Clerk read as follows:
Messrs. ABRAM, BROWN, CLARK B. COCHRANE, CORWIN, H. WINTER DAVIS, ELLERY, S. MARTIN, PENDLETON, and J. MORRISON HARRIS.

Mr. BRANCH. I move now that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

Mr. BRANCH. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BONHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Thomas L. Anderson, Ashmore, Ayres, Barkdale, Barr, Barnes, Beeson, Bingham, Boutwell, Boutwell, Braden, Branch, Brewster, Burch, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clifton, Cobb, John Cochran, Cox, James Corbin, Burton Craig, Crawford, Craig, Reuben Davis, De Barre, Doggett, Fawcett, Foster, Garret, Gilmer, Hamlin, Hamilton, Harnden, John T. Harris, Hawkins, Hindman, Holmes, Houston, Hughes, Jenkins, Jones, Louis, James M. Leach, Logan, Loring, Mackey, Charles D. Martin, Maynard, McClelland, McKim, Milton, Montgomery, Myrdum Moore, Nelson, Nickles, Noel, Peyton, Phelps, Pope, Quarles, Reagan, James A. Roberts, Russell, Schwartz, Scott, Simms, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Wadsworth, Wadsworth, Vallandigham, Whiteley, and Wood—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Green Adams, Aldrich, William C. Anderson, Barry, Bingham, Blair, Bixby, Bryson, Buffum, Buchanan, Butterfield, Campbell, Carey, Charles Colfax, Conkling, Corvode, Dawes, Delano, Durin, Dunn, Edwards, Ellery, Etheridge, Fenton, Fern, Foster, French, Graham, Green, Gurley, Hale, Haskin, Hinton, Holmick, Howard, Humphrey, Hughes, Jenkins, Johnson, Keating, Keyser, Kilgore, Killebrew, DeWitt L. Leach, Lee, Louisa, Lovjoy, Marston, McKean, McKnight, McPherson, Millward, Moorhead, Morrill, Edward J. Morris, Morse, Watson, Thompson, Tilden, Potter, Potte, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Royce, Sherman, Sedgwick, Sherman, Sowers, Spenser, Stanton, Stokes, Stratton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Train, Trimble, Vandever, Verree, Walden, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Ellish B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Wells, Windom, and Wood—94.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the call,

Mr. CURTIS stated that he had paired off for the remainder of the day with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. HERDIE stated that on this vote he was paired off with Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri; otherwise he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. MORRILL stated that on this vote he was paired off with Mr. CRAWFORD.

Mr. QUARLES said: I have since learned that I have been paired off with Mr. PETTIT until today; otherwise, I should have voted against the homestead bill the other day. I vote in the affirmative upon this proposition.

Mr. LOOMIS stated that he was paired off with Mr. COCHRANE.

Mr. FARNSWORTH stated that he was paired off with Mr. MERIS, of Illinois.

Mr. CRAE stated that he was paired off, upon this vote, with Mr. HARKIN, who was called away upon business.

Mr. L.L. said: I was not within the bar when my name was called, for the reason that I was paired off with Mr. KELLOGG, of Illinois. I should, otherwise, have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. I ask leave to move that I was not in when my name was called, thinking I was out of order to adjourn.

Mr. TOMPKINS. I object.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina. I should have voted in the affirmative.

The result was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McCLELLAND. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BEFFINGTON and BLANCH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye thirty-nine; a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Thomas L. Anderson, Ashmore, Ayres, Barkdale, Barr, Beeson, Bingham, Boutwell, Boutwell, Braden, Branch, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clifton, Cobb, John Cochran, Cox, Burton Craig, Craig, Reuben Davis, De Barre, Doggett, Fawcett, Foster, Garret, Gilmer, Hamlin, Hamilton, Harnden, John T. Harris, Jones, Louis, James M. Leach, Logan, Loring, Mackey, Charles D. Martin, Maynard, McClelland, McKim, Milton, Montgomery, Myrdum Moore, Nelson, Nickles, Noel, Peyton, Phelps, Pope, Quarles, Reagan, James A. Roberts, Russell, Schwartz, Scott, Simms, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Wadsworth, Wadsworth, Vallandigham, Whiteley, and Wood—91.

NAYS—Messrs. Green Adams, Aldrich, Allen, William C. Anderson, Barry, Bingham, Blair, Bixby, Bryson, Buffum, Buchanan, Butterfield, Campbell, Carey, Charles Colfax, Conkling, Corvode, Dawes, Delano, Durin, Dunn, Edwards, Ellery, Etheridge, Fenton, Fern, Foster, French, Graham, Green, Gurley, Hale, Haskin, Hinton, Holmick, Howard, Humphrey, Hughes, Jenkins, Johnson, Keating, Keyser, Kilgore, Killebrew, DeWitt L. Leach, Lee, Louisa, Lovjoy, Marston, McKean, McKnight, McPherson, Millward, Moorhead, Edward J. Morris, Morse, Watson, Thompson, Tilden, Potter, Potte, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Royce, Sherman, Sedgwick, Sherman, Sowers, Spenser, Stanton, Stokes, Stratton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Train, Trimble, Vandever, Verree, Walden, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Ellish B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Wells, Windom, and Wood—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the call,

Mr. CARTER stated that Mr. BOUTWELL was paired off with Mr. FEAR.

Mr. EDWARDS stated that he was paired off with Mr. WADSWORTH for the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. ENGLISH stated that he was paired off for the rest of the day with Mr. WALDRICK.

Mr. HAMILTON stated that, after the present vote, he was paired off with Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan; that he voted in the affirmative on this vote.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM stated that he was requested by Mr. LAWRENCE to announce that he was paired off with Mr. HOARD.

Mr. STANTON, of Pennsylvania, stated that he had paired off with Mr. PETTIT upon this vote.

Mr. BARR moved to dispense with the reading of the yeas and nays.

The motion was agreed to; and the result was announced, as above recorded.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That A. J. Williamson, contesting the right of Hon. D. E. Pickles to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Kentucky, be and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Pickles, within ten days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that the said Pickles be, and he is hereby, required to answer upon the said Williamson his answer thereto in ten days thereafter; and that the Committee be authorized to demand the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and demands; and the justice of the superior court of the State of New York, residing in the city of New York, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in an act of February 19, 1851.

Mr. BURNETT called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Green Adams, Aldrich, William C. Anderson, Barry, Bingham, Blair, Bixby, Bryson, Buffum, Buchanan, Butterfield, Campbell, Carey, Charles Colfax, Conkling, Corvode, Dawes, Delano, Durin, Dunn, Edwards, Ellery, Etheridge, Fenton, Fern, Foster, French, Graham, Green, Gurley, Haskin, Hinton, Holmick, Howard, Humphrey, Hughes, Jenkins, Johnson, Keating, Keyser, Kilgore, Killebrew, DeWitt L. Leach, Lee, Louisa, Lovjoy, Marston, McKean, McKnight, McPherson, Millward, Moorhead, Edward J. Morris, Morse, Nixon, Ohio, Palmer, Pettit, Potter, Potte, Rice, Christopher Robinson, Royce, Sherman, Sedgwick, Sherman, Sowers, Spenser, Stanton, Stokes, Stratton, Tappan, Tompkins, Train, Trimble, Vandever, Verree, Walden, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Ellish B. Washburn, Israel Washburn, Wells, Windom, and Wood—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Thomas L. Anderson, Ayres, Barkdale, Barr, Beeson, Bingham, Boutwell, Burnett, John B. Clark, Clifton, Cobb, John Cochran, Cox, Burton Craig, Reuben Davis, De Barre, De Barre, Doggett, Fawcett, Foster, Garret, Gilmer, Hamlin, Hamilton, Harnden, John T. Harris, Hawkins, Hindman, Holmes, Houston, Hughes, Jenkins, Jones, Louis, James M. Leach, Logan, Loring, Mackey, Charles D. Martin, Maynard, McClelland, McKim, Milton, Montgomery, Myrdum Moore, Nelson, Nickles, Noel, Peyton, Phelps, Pope, Quarles, Reagan, James A. Roberts, Russell, Schwartz, Scott, Simms, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Wadsworth, Wadsworth, Vallandigham, Whiteley, and Wood—64.

Flower, Foush, Garrett, Gilmer, Harnden, John T. Harris, Hinton, Holmick, Houston, Hughes, Jenkins, Jones, Louis, James M. Leach, Logan, Mackey, Charles D. Martin, Maynard, McClelland, McKim, Milton, Montgomery, Myrdum Moore, Nelson, Nickles, Noel, Peyton, Phelps, Pope, Quarles, Reagan, James A. Roberts, Russell, Schwartz, Scott, Simms, Singleton, William Smith, William N. H. Smith, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Wadsworth, Vallandigham, Whiteley, Woodson, and Wright—64.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the call,

Mr. HALE stated that he had paired off with Mr. ROBERTS.

Mr. CLOPTON stated that Mr. BOWMAN was paired off with Mr. KILGORE, and that Mr. CRAW was paired off with Mr. STANTON.

Mr. JUNKIN stated that he was paired off with Mr. BOWMAN.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, stated that Mr. GARNETT was paired off with Mr. STANTON.

Mr. HUMPHREY stated that he was paired off with Mr. MILLS.

Mr. SPINNER stated that Mr. ASHMORE was paired off with Mr. LEONARD.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE stated that Mr. SHERMAN was paired off with Mr. PHELPS.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, stated that he was paired off with Mr. ETHERIDGE; that Mr. ETHERIDGE was in favor of the resolution, and that he was opposed.

The result was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I wish to notify the House that House bill No. 21, for the codification of the revenue laws, is printed; and I hope gentlemen will provide themselves with it.

And then, on motion of Mr. WHITELEY, (five o'clock and twenty minutes, p. m.), the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 22, 1860.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. GURLEY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, communicating, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, copies of the correspondence between that Department and Townsend Harris, minister resident of the United States in Japan, concerning the proposed diplomatic mission from Japan to the United States; which was laid on the table; and a motion by Mr. DAVIS to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of Mr. Holliday and others, asking that he be admitted to the Senate, praying that their rights of entry thereon may be secured; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a petition of citizens of Jefferson county, Wisconsin, praying a breach of the natural route from Lake Michigan to the Pacific Ocean, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Brooklyn, New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in, and monopoly of, the public lands of the United States; and that they be laid out in farms and lots of limited size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEWARD presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying Congress to pass a law to prevent all further traffic in, and monopoly of, the public lands of the United States; and that they be laid out in farms and lots of suitable size, for the free and exclusive use of actual settlers; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of Mrs. Arabella Riley, widow of Major General Riley, praying for a pension; which was ordered to lie on the table, a bill for her relief having been already passed by the Senate.

He also presented the petition of Frances M. Webster, widow of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Lucien B. Webster, late of the Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HIGLER presented the petition of Richard B. Jones, late consul general of the United States at Alexandria, Egypt, praying compensation for judicial services rendered under the act of August 11, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Alpheus T. Palmer, of Maine, a lieutenant in the war with Mexico, praying an increase of the pension heretofore allowed him; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TOOMBS presented the petition of William J. Young, of New York, praying the enactment of a homestead law and a bankruptcy law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a letter of J. W. Zealan in relation to the proposals of Spear & Co. to transport the United States mails monthly between New Orleans and Vera Cruz; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HEMPHILL presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, praying the incorporation of Captain John G. Tod, of the late navy of Texas, into the Navy of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, praying the establishment of a mail stage route from Austin to some point on the overland mail stage route from St. Louis to El Paso; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, requesting the Senators and Representatives of the State in Congress to procure the reimbursement of funds expended for the protection of the frontier, and making other requests, with reference to the frontier, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was ordered, That the petition of Eliza E. Quesen, widow of the late Major Edmund A. Quesen, assistant quartermaster in the United States Army, praying the percentage may be allowed her upon money disbursed by her husband, with the adv. rev. report of the Committee on Claims thereon, be recommended to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 257) further to amend an act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 190) in relation to mission claims at Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 237) for the relief of Anthony Schlender, reported it without amendment.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred a communication from C. T. Sneed, in favor of increased mail facilities in the State of Iowa, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, as the matter is properly cognizable by the Executive Department; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph R. Walker, praying to be indemnified for money lost in its transmission by mail, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the president and members of the Pacific railroad convention, held in San Francisco, California, in September, 1859, on the subject of a continental railroad from the Pacific ocean to the valley of the Mississippi, asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the presentment of the grand jury of the United States for the district of South Carolina, at Greenville, in relation to the desecrations on the mail in that district, the unfitness of the post office building at Greenville for the purpose, and the necessity of providing a new building for a custom-house, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to move that a communication from the Post Office Department to the committee, in reply to a letter from the committee, communicating information with respect to what is known as the Butterfield contract for overland mail service between the Atlantic and the Pacific, be printed; and the committee recommend that the contract to which the information refers be printed in connection with it.

Mr. HALE. And also the letter of the Postmaster General to the Attorney General.

Mr. YULEE. Yes. They are all together. The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 218) to authorize protection to be given to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 248) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize protection to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano," approved 18th August, 1856, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

From the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 303) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize protection to be given to citizens of the United States who may discover deposits of guano," approved 18th August, 1856; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

RIGHTS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, whatever information he may have concerning the report of August Edick, native of Prussia, and a naturalized citizen of the United States, from that country, in or about the year 1857.

REORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. NICHOLSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate a copy of the memorial of Brevet Lieutenant Colonel B. B. Roberts, of the United States Army, relating to a reorganization of the militia of the United States, under a revision of the laws of Congress, in conformity with the Constitution.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FOOT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 301) for the relief of Alexander Cross; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRIGHT, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 304) for the prosecution of the work upon the extension of the United States Capitol; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTES IN KANSAS.

Mr. YULEE. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred House bill No. 326, to establish mail routes in the Territory of Kansas, have directed me to report it back without amendment; and perhaps it would be as well, as it merely establishes post routes in the ordinary manner for a portion of the country which is only just now settling up, the Pike's Peak country, to pass the bill at once.

The bill was considered as a Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to the third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETURN OF UNCALLED-FOR LETTERS.

Mr. YULEE. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution which was adopted by the Senate at the instance of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] in relation to the return of letters uncollected for, have directed me to report a bill on that subject.

The bill (S. No. 302) in relation to the return of undelivered letters in the post office was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that that bill may be out on its passage now.

Mr. GWIN. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. YULEE. The bill simply provides that persons desiring the return of letters which they mail, may, by indorsing on them their name and address, be entitled to a return of them without additional charge, if they are not called for at the office to which they are directed within thirty days after their receipt.

The bill was read a second time, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON MARKET-HOUSE.

Mr. BROWN. I appeal to the Senate to allow me to dispose of some amendments to a bill which has passed both Houses of Congress. All we want now is the concurrence of the Senate in the House amendment, with some amendments to it proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I will state why I am urgent about it. The city authorities have advertised for contracts; the bids have all been made, and they are ready to enter into the contracts. The instant we pass this bill, the working season is coming on, and they are exceedingly anxious to close their contracts, so that the persons to do the work may go right on. Delay now is almost ruinous to it. The bill does not involve the Government in any sort of responsibility whatever, and I hope they will be allowed to get it through this morning. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 192) authorizing the corporation of Washington city to make a loan and issue stock for $200,000 for building a market-house. The House amendment was to strike out all the original bill after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That all the ground lying between Seventh and Ninth streets, containing the lots of the late John A. Smith, now and hitherto used and occupied for the Cattle market, and the same is hereby, ceded to the corporation of Washington, on condition that it shall be used within two years after this act takes effect, erect thereon a market-house, together with such other buildings as in the sound advice of the corporation may be deemed necessary. The said house to be so constructed as to admit foot passengers free of charge, and to contain a room to be used on the north side, market wagons and other vehicles on the south side only, with means of exit for the same on Seventh and Ninth streets, and on the north side of the lot, on Seventh and Ninth streets, and the sidewalks and pavements thereon. And for the purpose of erecting such market-house, the corporation of Washington may use the majority of the freeholders and householders, who are legal and competent voters within said corporation, shall vote as hereinafter provided in favor thereof; it shall be lawful for said corporation to create a debt in such form as may be found expedient, not exceeding the sum of $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, any restriction in the charter of said city or existing laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 2. And he it further enacted, That at the first annual election held in said city after the passage of this act, the person or persons receiving the vote of each voter in such election, who are freeholders or householders of said city, shall proceed to such voter the following question, to wit: "Are you in favor of creating a debt of $200,000 for the building of a new market-house and other necessary structures, whether yes or no, shall be set down upon the poll-list opposite the name of such voter, and, in case a majority of the freeholders and householders of said city, question in the affirmative, then this act shall take effect, and continue in force, until repealed."

